TYLER, Justice pro tem.

Action to recover the sum of $1,050 paid under an executory contract of sale of personal property.

[1] The case was twice heard in the court below. The first judgment was in favor of plaintiff in the sum of $487.45. A new trial was granted, and judgment then went in favor of defendants, respondents herein. This appeal is from the latter judgment, and it is taken upon the judgment roll alone. It appears therefrom that on July 6, 1927, defendants were the owners of the business known as the Latz Hotel, in the city of Modesto, together with all the furniture and other personal property connected with the operation thereof, and a leasehold interest of the premises. On said last-mentioned day plaintiff, Ella E. McKinney, entered into negotiations with defendants for the purchase of the same. Pursuant to such negotiations, the parties went to the office of one E. H. Zion, an attorney at law, and had him prepare a contract of sale which the parties signed. The agreement was left with the attorney in escrow, with instructions to deliver it to plaintiff when she had performed an act provided for by the terms of said agreement, which required that she clear the title to certain real property owned by her, and execute a mortgage thereon in favor of defendants as security for the payment of the balance of the purchase price; a small deposit being made at the time. Before the title to the real property was cleared and before either the mortgage or said instrument of sale was delivered by the escrow holder, the building in which the rooming house was located was destroyed by fire, and all of the property which was the subject-matter of the sale, with the exception of some slight salvage of the value of $35, ceased to exist. Defendant vendors carried insurance on the property amounting to the sum of $2,540. The purchase price agreed upon by the parties for the business was the sum of $3,500, and at the time of its destruction plaintiff had paid on account thereof the sum of $1,050, the amount for which she here sues. The agreement of sale provided that the destruction of the property by fire or otherwise should not relieve plaintiff from liability to pay the purchase price agreed to be paid. It also provided, however, that the agreement was not a contract of sale, and that title to the property should remain in defendant vendors until full performance of the conditions thereof. It was plaintiff's contention below, and is here, that title to the destroyed property never passed, for the reason that the written instrument was never delivered and therefore never became effective, and that, this being so, title to the destroyed property was at all times in defendants, and the loss followed the title and must therefore be borne by defendants who are bound to return to plaintiff all moneys paid under the contract. It is an elementary law of sales, in the absence of special agreement to the contrary, that, under an executory contract of sale, the loss falls on the vendor as the risk accompanies the title. In such case the vendor is excused from the performance of his contract by reason of the destruction of the thing, but he cannot retain money already paid on account of the proposed purchase, or recover the moneys remaining unpaid. Under such circumstances the buyer cannot be compelled to pay the price, and, if he has paid, it may be recovered. Although the purchaser is not liable to the vendor for the purchase price, he must account for profits made by him from a use of the property while in his possession under agreement of sale. Kirtley v. Perham, 176 Cal. 333, 168 P. 351. Respondents do not dispute the correctness of this principle, but they claim that the written instrument, though not delivered, was carried into effect by the conduct of the parties in partly performing it.

In this connection the record shows that on July 7, 1927, the day after the agreement was signed, plaintiff went into possession of the premises and complied with all of the terms and provisions of the contract, and received the rents accruing from the business from said day to the 10th day of January, 1928, when the premises were destroyed, except that she failed to have the title to the property, upon which she had given a mortgage, cleared as provided for in the escrow agreement. It also shows that defendants had performed all of the acts and done all of the things required to be done by them under the terms of the contract; that besides delivering possession they paid off, as they had agreed to do, a chattel mortgage upon said business so agreed to be sold.

The trial court found that under these circumstances it was not true as alleged that no contract for the purchase of said property was ever completed between plaintiff and defendants, and that it was not true that the consideration for such contract had failed totally or at all.

[2-4] As conclusions of law the court found, in substance, that the contract was duly and legally executed by the plaintiff and defendants, and that, having entered into possession of the premises, plaintiff was bound by the terms of the contract, one of which was to the effect that the destruction of the property by fire or otherwise should not relieve the vendee from liability to pay the agreed purchase price. In reaching this conclusion we are of the opinion that the trial court committed error. Whether or not the contract had become executed at the time of the destruction of the property depends upon the intention of the parties. If the transaction is as here, evidenced by an instrument in writing, the intention of the parties is to be determined primarily by reference to the written document. Hull v. Ray, 80 Cal. App. 284, 251 P. 810. In such a case, where the facts are not disputed, the question whether the agreement becomes operative is one of law for the court to decide. An executory contract is converted into an executed one by the performance of the act or the fulfillment of the condition which is necessary for this purpose. Until then the agreement does not become effective. This rule, however, is subject to the general rule previously stated, that the question is one of intention of the parties. Here there is nothing in the record to show that any waiver of the terms of the agreement with reference to the conditions under which the contract would become effective was ever made.

[5] It is true that the vendee went into possession and began to make payments in accordance with the terms of the contract, and defendants performed certain conditions they had undertaken to perform, but the contract provided they should do these very things, and still under the terms of the escrow agreement the contract was not to become effective until plaintiff had cleared the title to her real property and mortgaged it to defendants to secure the purchase price, a condition which was never fulfilled. A contract in writing takes effect only upon its delivery to the party in whose favor it is made. Civ. Code, § 1626. Undoubtedly defendants were of the opinion that the terms of the agreement would be carried out when they agreed that plaintiff should go into possession, but they did nothing that deprived them of the protection afforded to them by the escrow agreement, which provided that no delivery of the agreement of sale should be had until the conditions above recited were performed by plaintiff. The delivery never having been made, the agreement was inchoate and incomplete and never became effective. The provision contained therein, that the destruction of the property by fire or otherwise would not excuse payment, had therefore no binding force or effect. This being so, the title remained in the vendors, and the case is controlled by the rule above stated, that the loss follows the title.

From what we have said, it follows that appellant is entitled to the return of the amount of her payments, less the profit, if any, she may have derived from the use of defendants' property.

For the reasons given, the judgment is reversed.

FISH v. FISH et al.

L. A. 13399.

Supreme Court of California.

July 14, 1932.

1. Appeal and error ⇐71(4).

Order allowing receiver's account fixing fees of receiver and attorney and directing sale of property to pay fees held final and appealable.

2. Appeal and error ⇐71(4).

Reservation of right to disallow any sale made by commissioner did not render interlocutory order directing sale and fixing fees of receiver and attorney.

3. Appeal and error ⇐458(2).

Appellant who appealed from final order and gave adequate stay bond held entitled to have threatened sale stayed pending appeal.

In Bank.

Suit by Grace E. Fish against Frank N. Fish, wherein William A. Jacobson was appointed receiver, and Arthur S. Guerin was named as the receiver's attorney. From an order allowing and settling receiver's account, fixing fees of receiver and his attorney, directing sale of certain property in receiver's hands to pay fees, directing disposition of balance of proceeds, and ordering discharge of receiver and release of his surety, plaintiff appeals. On appellant's application for writ of supersedeas to stay sale by commissioner pending appeal.

Writ granted.

L. B. Stanton, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Arthur S. Guerin, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

WASTE, C. J.

Application for a writ of supersedeas.

Petitioner brought this action for separate maintenance and division of property. Respondent Jacobson was appointed receiver and respondent Guerin was named as his attorney. The defendant husband failed to appear in the action, but by private arrangement the property rights of the spouses were fully settled. The receiver thereupon filed his report and final account with the trial court, praying that the same be allowed and settled, that the disposition of the property in his hands be directed, and that his compensation and that of his attorney be fixed and payment thereof ordered. Petitioner appeared in opposition to the settlement of the account and denied that the receiver had taken possession of certain properties listed in his report, denied that $1,000 constituted fair or reasonable compensation for the receiver, denied that the reasonable value of the services of his attorney was $2,500 or any sum in excess of $100. It was further urged in opposition to the settlement of the account that the receiver never at any time had in his possession property of a value to exceed $3,500 and that there had been an understanding and agreement between the parties as to the receiver's compensation, which agreement petitioner had at all times lived up to.

At the conclusion of the hearing thereon the trial court made its minute order and thereafter made and entered its formal order allowing and settling the receiver's account, fixing his compensation and that of his attorney, directing a named commissioner to sell, subject to confirmation, certain property in the receiver's hands to pay said fees, directing the disposition to be made of the balance of the proceeds derived from such sale, and ordering the discharge of the receiver and the release of his surety. Petitioner duly noticed an appeal to this court from such order and posted an adequate and proper stay bond.

Alleging that the court below, through its commissioner, threatens to sell the property pending the determination of such appeal, plaintiff filed her application herein for a writ of supersedeas. An order was issued upon such application directing the trial court, its commissioner, and the receiver and his attorney to show cause why a supersedeas should not issue as prayed for. On the return day the respondents orally demurred to the petition and by way of brief subsequently filed urged, principally upon the authority of Illinois Trust & Sav. Bank v. Pacific Ry. Co., 99 Cal. 407, 33 P. 1132, that the order appealed from is merely interlocutory in character and therefore nonappealable. For this reason they contend that a supersedeas should not issue.

[1] We cannot accept respondents' solution of the problem presented. Decisions recognizing the right of appeal from an order, where that right does not rest upon the express provisions of section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure, are numerous and proceed upon the theory that the order is in effect a final judgment against a party in a collateral proceeding growing out of the action; that is to say, is so far independent of the suit itself as to be substantially a final decree for the purpose of an appeal, although there has been no final decree in the action. Anglo-Calif. Bank v. Superior Court, 153 Cal. 753, 96 P. 803. Orders requiring the payment of money by the party complaining, or the doing of an act by or against him, are usually regarded as final as against such party and may be appealed from by him. Colma Veg. Ass'n v. Superior Court, 75 Cal. App. 91, 95, 242 P. 82. The order here appealed from not only allowed and settled the receiver's account, but, over petitioner's opposition, fixed the receiver's compensation and that of his attorney at a stated sum and provided for a sale of the receivership property to pay the same. Petitioner, as plaintiff in the principal action, has an interest in the receivership property and is vitally affected by any decree disposing of the same. The order for the sale of the receivership property, for the purpose designated, is certainly an order "for the doing of an act against" petitioner, because, if carried into execution, it will deprive her of a portion of the property or the proceeds derived from the sale thereof. We are of the opinion, therefore, that the order is in effect final as to the matters therein determined and may be appealed from.

Substantially the same character of order was held to be appealable in the following cases: Los Angeles v. Los Angeles C. Water Co., 134 Cal. 121, 122, 124, 66 P. 198; Grant v. Superior Court, 106 Cal. 324, 39 P. 604; Grant v. L. A. & P. Ry. Co., 116 Cal. 71, 47 P. 872; Leeper v. Superior Court, 62 Cal. App. 736, 739, 217 P. 811.

The order entered in Illinois Trust & Savings Bank v. Pac. Ry. Co., supra, which case is relied on by respondents, has been properly distinguished from the type of order here under consideration on the ground that it did not direct "the payment of any money, or the performance of any act by or against" the complaining party, and therefore lacked one of the essential elements of a final judgment. This distinction is pointed out in Los Angeles v. Los Angeles C. Water Co., supra, page 124 of 134 Cal., 66 P. 198, 200, and in Free Gold Mining Co. v. Spiers, 135 Cal. 130, 131, 67 P. 61.

[2] We find no merit in respondents' further contention that the order here involved is interlocutory and nonappealable because it reserves to the trial court the right to confirm or disallow any sale made by the commissioner therein named. A similar reservation appeared in the order under consideration in Leeper v. Superior Court, supra, but the order was nevertheless properly held to be in effect a final judgment and therefore appealable. Obviously, such a reservation does not affect the finality of that portion of the order fixing the compensation of the receiver and his attorney and directing a sale of the property to pay the same.

[3] Having duly presented an appeal to this court from the order above designated and having filed a proper and adequate stay bond in the trial court, it follows from what has been said herein that the petitioner is entitled to the assistance of the reviewing court to effect such stay pending the determination of the appeal.

For the foregoing reasons, respondents' demurrer to the petition is overruled and a writ of supersedeas directed to be issued.

Where there is no collusion, and defendant's testimony, though conflicting with plaintiff's in many details, in more important matters is corroborative thereof, and plaintiff's testimony is also corroborated by other testimony, corroboration is sufficient (Civ. Code § 130; Code Civ. Proc. § 2079).

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Leon E. Gray, Judge.

Action for divorce by Winfred T. Wilson against Florence E. H. Wilson, wherein defendant filed a cross-complaint. From an interlocutory judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Harry I. Stafford and Edward A. Cunha, both of San Francisco, and Allen C. Cunha, of Oakland, for appellant.

Andros, Hengstler & Dorr, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

An appeal from an interlocutory decree of divorce.

Plaintiff charged defendant with adultery committed with two persons named in his complaint, and also with extreme cruelty. Defendant denied the charges, and as a separate defense alleged condonation, and also by way of cross-complaint charged the plaintiff with extreme cruelty toward her. There was also in issue the validity of an agreement settling their property rights.

The trial court found the complaint to be true and the allegations of the answer and cross-complaint to be untrue. It also found the said agreement to be valid and binding. An interlocutory decree of divorce was awarded the plaintiff, and he was also given the custody of the two minor children of the marriage.

Defendant contends that certain of the findings are unsupported; namely, the findings that she committed adultery and was guilty of extreme cruelty, and that the court erred in awarding the custody of the children to the plaintiff.

As to the first charge, plaintiff testified that, while he was residing in Oakland, his wife and children were temporarily occupying a house at Saratoga, where he visited her weekly. On the occasion alleged he arrived at Saratoga at night, and found his wife's and another automobile parked in the driveway of his house. The house doors were locked, but he forced his way in and found his wife with a certain man named Fry, both being partially dressed. Fry attempted to hide under a bed. Plaintiff then charged his wife with adultery, which she admitted, and Fry stated: "Well, I guess I went too far with your wife." A brother of plaintiff testified that defendant admitted the above facts to him, stating, however, that she had not committed adultery on that occasion, but that such had been her intention but for the arrival of her husband. At the trial defendant admitted that Fry was with her on the occasion testified to by plaintiff and that he kissed her, but she denied any acts of adultery. Fry also testified that he was present on that occasion, and that he kissed the defendant, but denied any other improper acts. Defendant contends that there was insufficient corroboration of plaintiff's testimony to justify a finding that she committed adultery with Fry.

[1, 2] No divorce can be granted upon the uncorroborated statement, admission, or testimony of the parties (Civ. Code, § 130); and in an action for divorce on the ground of adultery a confession of adultery, whether in or out of the pleadings, is not of itself sufficient to justify a judgment of divorce (Code Civ. Proc. § 2079). It has been held, however, that the principal object of the rule requiring corroboration is to prevent collusion; and, where it is clear that there is no collusion, and the defendant's testimony, though conflicting with that of plaintiff in many of its details, in the more important matters was corroborative of the plaintiff's testimony, which was also corroborated in certain respects by other testimony, the corroboration is sufficient. Smith v. Smith, 119 Cal. 183, 48 P. 730, 51 P. 183; Andrews v. Andrews, 120 Cal. 184, 52 P. 298; McMullin v. McMullin, 140 Cal. 112, 119, 73 P. 808. And it has been held that the fact that a defendant has vigorously contested the suit dispels any idea of collusion between the parties in the procurement of the divorce. Hill v. Hill, 106 Cal. App. 309, 289 P. 227.

[3-6] Adultery may be proved by circumstantial evidence as well as by direct evidence (Aston v. Aston, 14 Cal. App. 323, 111 P. 1035); and in divorce actions corroboration of every act sworn to by plaintiff is not required, but evidence, circumstantial or direct, tending to confirm plaintiff's testimony upon a considerable number of material facts, is sufficient (Percy v. Percy, 188 Cal. 765, 207 P. 369). In Koenigstein v. Koenigstein, 53 Cal. App. 673, 200 P. 730, it was held that in proving adultery by indirect evidence a criminal disposition or desire in both the mind of the defendant and the particeps criminis, and an opportunity to commit the crime, must be shown; and proof of an adulterous disposition on the part of the defendant and an alleged paramour, coupled with an opportunity for them to commit the offense, has generally been held sufficient. 19 Cor. Jur. Divorce, § 357, p. 139. Here we have testimony of admissions by defendant both of the act charged and the disposition to commit such act. Such testimony, while not sufficient alone, was admissible (9 Cal. Jur. Divorce and Separation, p. 643), and is corroborated by that of Fry that, with the exception of defendant's children, who were on an upper floor, he was alone in the house with defendant on the night alleged, and, without apparent objection on her part, indulged in familiarities. These facts tended to show an adulterous inclination in both, and his testimony was properly considered in determining the fact of adultery; its weight being a question for the trial court. 19 Cor. Jur. Divorce, § 364, p. 141; 9 Cal. Jur. Divorce and Separation, § 128, p. 780; Brenot v. Brenot, 102 Cal. 294, 36 P. 672.

[7, 8] The second charge of adultery involved defendant's conduct with one Prest. It was testified by the owner of an apartment house in Los Angeles that defendant occupied one of the apartments in company with Prest for about a month, and this was corroborated by a real estate agent who rented the premises to the couple and who testified that defendant was introduced to him as Prest's wife. Another witness testified that defendant and Prest lived in an apartment adjoining the one occupied by him. In addition, detectives testified to an occasion when defendant entered Prest's room in a house in Oakland. The detectives were in an adjoining room. They entered shortly afterwards and found the two together. Defendant was lying upon a bed with her clothing disarranged. The deposition of Prest was also taken. He testified that in company with defendant he visited Los Angeles and lived there with her for some time. He admitted having sexual relations with her there and elsewhere. The taking of his deposition having been continued for a few days, upon its resumption he denied the truth of his previous statements. Defendant admitted at the trial that she was in Los Angeles at the time testified to and that she lived at the apartment house mentioned; also that she was there introduced as Mrs. Prest. She denied, however, any misconduct with Prest. There were also introduced in evidence letters written by defendant to Prest containing words of endearment and suggestion. Defendant contends that the evidence of Prest and the detectives was entitled to but slight weight, and that the testimony as a whole was insufficient to support a finding of adultery.

The credibility of the witnesses and the weight to be given their testimony were questions for the trial court, and the evidence, which the court believed, was ample to sustain the charge. The evidence supporting the charges of adultery also sustained plaintiff's allegations of extreme cruelty.

[9] The court found that defendant's allegations of cruelty on the part of her husband were untrue. The cruelty alleged consisted of physical violence and the application of vile epithets. This was testified to by defendant, and she was corroborated by another witness. The plaintiff denied the alleged physical violence, but admitted that on the occasion when Fry was found in his home he applied to his wife epithets which would be calculated under ordinary circumstances to cause his wife extreme mental suffering; but the court no doubt believed the circumstances were such as to excuse his conduct; and, in addition, it was testified that on the following day defendant stated that she had no fault to find with her husband. The facts were sufficient to show an absence of mental suffering on this account.

A few days after the incident at Saratoga, the parties entered into an agreement settling their property rights. There was no community property of the marriage, and the agreement required plaintiff to pay defendant $100 a month for two years.

This promise was accepted in full satisfaction of all claims against him. The court found that the agreement was made voluntarily and without fraud, duress, menace, or undue influence, and the record discloses nothing which would necessitate a contrary conclusion. These findings are also supported by the evidence.

[10-13] The court awarded the custody and care of the two minor children to plaintiff for a period of six months, further provision being made that defendant might visit them at all reasonable times and have them with her for one day each week; also that, if defendant should visit Sacramento during any week, she might have them with her for two days. The children are a girl and a boy, aged six and four years, respectively. While presumptively a mother is entitled to the custody of children of tender years (Luck v. Luck, 92 Cal. 653, 28 P. 787), nevertheless the controlling consideration is the children's welfare, and this question is one for the trial court, whose conclusion will not be set aside in the absence of a clear abuse of discretion (Bancroft v. Bancroft, 178 Cal. 352, 173 P. 582; Cammack v. Cammack, 205 Cal. 674, 272 P. 288). Here,

In view of the facts, the award was not only for the best interests of the children, but fair to the spouses, and we see no reason for disturbing it.

The conclusions of the trial court are fairly sustained by the evidence, and no error has been shown which would warrant the reversal of the judgment.

The judgment is affirmed.

PRENTICE v. ZUMWALT.

Civ. 4509.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

July 8, 1932.

Rehearing Denied Aug. 6, 1932.

1. Replevin ⇐72.

In replevin for farm machinery, evidence held to sustain finding that defendant seized and retained machinery unlawfully, oppressively, and maliciously.

Evidence disclosed that plaintiff returned a binding machine which he had bought from defendant because it would not work; that $365 represented by an unsecured note remained unpaid on the purchase price after defendant resold the machine; that defendant purchased from the bank a $500 note secured by the mortgage on the farm machinery in controversy, and then without notice to plaintiff sent four men to seize the farm machinery over plaintiff's protest; and that thereafter defendant refused plaintiff's tender of the mortgage indebtedness, defendant's intention clearly being to use the secured note and mortgage to enforce the payment of the unsecured disputed one.

2. Replevin ⇐81.

It was necessary for replevisor to establish malice in fact to sustain judgment for exemplary damages (Civ. Code, § 3294).

3. Replevin ⇐75.

Statute relating to damages from breach of contract entitled replevisor of farm machinery to such damages as would fully compensate him for detriment proximately caused by unlawful seizure and detention (Civ. Code, § 3300).

4. Replevin ⇐81.

Replevisor held entitled to exemplary damages in reasonable amount within jury's discretion for farm machinery seized and unlawfully, oppressively, and maliciously retained (Civ. Code, § 3294).

5. Replevin ⇐81.

Replevisor held entitled to exemplary damages for defendant's retaining, after replevisor's tender of mortgage indebtedness, property seized under mortgage even though seizure was legal (Civ. Code, § 3294).

6. Chattel mortgages ⇐237.

Replevisor's tender of full indebtedness, secured by mortgage under which replevied property was seized, to defendant who refused it without qualification, held valid tender (Code Civ. Proc. § 2076).

7. Pleading ⇐126.

Where replevisor alleged that value of use of property detained was $25 for each day it was detained, defendant's denial that value was $25 per day for each day it was detained constituted admission that plaintiff's loss was $24.99 for each such day.

8. Pleading ⇐409(4).

Replevisor voluntarily offering evidence of amount of loss pleaded waived defendant's negative pregnant admission as to amount of loss.

9. Damages ⇐220.

Form of verdict in replevin held not invalid because it failed to segregate actual damages from exemplary damages.

10. Replevin ⇐82.

Evidence held to support $400 verdict as actual damages replevisor sustained from detention of his farm machinery.

Evidence disclosed that the replevisor was about to commence leveling a five-acre tract of land the day after the machinery was taken, for the purpose of preparing it for planting alfalfa, which would have taken about ten or fifteen days; that he was deprived of the use of his tractor and other farm machinery for nineteen days; that it would cost him $25 a day to rent machinery necessary to carry on his work; that he spent $40 for trucks and employed two men to return the machinery; and that one of the castings was broken.

11. Replevin ⇐81.

$1,150 punitive damages for detention of farm machinery held not excessive under evidence.

12. Appeal and error ⇐1004(1).

Although there should be reasonable proportion between punitive damages and actual damages allowed replevisor, jury has discretion with regard thereto which will not be disturbed unless sum allowed is clearly excessive.

Appeal from Superior Court, Colusa County; Ernest Weyand, Judge.

Replevin by Frank Prentice against I. G. Zumwalt. From the judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

U. W. Brown and Alva A. King, both of Colusa, for appellant.

George R. Freeman, of Willows, for respondent.

Mr. Justice R. L. THOMPSON delivered the opinion of the court.

The plaintiff brought suit to replevin farm machinery alleged to have been unlawfully, oppressively, and maliciously seized and held by the defendant. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $1,550. A judgment was rendered accordingly. From this judgment the defendant has appealed.

It is contended the judgment is not supported by the evidence; that the plaintiff is not entitled to recover possession of the property for the reason that the farm implements were lawfully taken by the defendant, and the plaintiff failed to tender the necessary amount to release the lien pursuant to which they were seized; and that the amount of punitive damages which was allowed is excessive.

The defendant owns and operates a farm implement business at Colusa. His son, George Zumwalt, is employed in the business with the authority to accept and collect debts which are due to the enterprise. The defendant is a farmer who lives near Willows. In 1927 the plaintiff bought from the defendant upon an executory contract a binding machine. Part payment was made on the purchase price thereof. The following June it was returned by the plaintiff for the reason that he was unable to operate it successfully. The defendant subsequently resold the machine. A balance of $365, represented by an unsecured promissory note, remained unpaid upon this binder. This note was retained by the defendant. The plaintiff refused to pay it. At the same time the plaintiff owed the defendant another bill on open book account, for the purchase of other farm machinery. The plaintiff made a payment of $400 on this last-mentioned account, insisting that it be credited to that account. The bookkeeper gave him a receipt for this sum, applying the payment as requested. The defendant disregarded this demand, and, without the plaintiff's knowledge, credited the payment to the repudiated note of $365 and accumulated interest. The plaintiff also owed the Bank of Willows the sum of $500 represented by a promissory note secured by chattel mortgage on the farm machinery which is involved in this suit. The mortgage contained a clause authorizing the mortgagee, "at its option * * * (to) remove and sell and dispose of the same (mortgaged machinery) at public or private sale without any previous demand of performance or note to the mortgagor of any such sale whatsoever, notice of sale and demand of performance being hereby expressly waived by said mortgagor."

On October 18, 1930, without the plaintiff's knowledge, the defendant purchased this note and mortgage from the Bank of Willows, stating that he was about to bring suit against the plaintiff on the balance of the $365 note, and desired to attach the machinery described in the chattel mortgage; that he wanted to prevent the first lien of the chattel mortgage from defeating the validity of his proposed attachment. The indorsement on the bank note shows that a payment had been made to the bank the day before it was purchased by the defendant, leaving a balance due thereon of $457.76. Having acquired this bank note and mortgage, the defendant wrote the plaintiff demanding the payment of the other repudiated note for $365 which he held. The plaintiff and defendant met and conferred regarding this unsecured note. Nothing was said about the Bank of Willows' note and mortgage. They were not mentioned. The plaintiff flatly refused to pay the unsecured note, saying that the machine which he had returned "would not work."

Without previous notice or demand upon the plaintiff to pay the Bank of Willows' note, the defendant, on April 2, 1931, sent four men and two trucks to the plaintiff's ranch with directions to seize and bring back the machinery. Over the strenuous protest of the plaintiff, the machinery was loaded and hauled away. During the time consumed in loading the machinery, the plaintiff hastened to his neighbor, Mr. C. F. Mason, and arranged to borrow from him the sum of $475 with which to pay the defendant in full for the Bank of Willows' note. Mason went with the plaintiff and tendered the check in payment of the note. The workmen refused to accept it, saying they had no authority to do so, but, on the contrary, were directed to bring the machinery back. The plaintiff then tried to communicate with the defendant by telephone. He was unable to do so, but succeeded in communicating with his son, George, offering to pay the Bank of Willows' note in full. George refused the tender. The machinery was then hauled away. The following day the plaintiff and his neighbor, Mason, took $510 in cash to the defendant's place of business and offered to pay the note in full. George again refused the offer. The plaintiff said he offered to pay "whatever the face of the mortgage was, plus the interest. I figured the mortgage, interest and everything would hardly be $500." The evidence is undisputed that Mason then had $470 in cash, and the plaintiff had $40 additional. In none of these conferences regarding the payment of the bank note did any of the parties object to the amount tendered or the manner of the proposed payment.

April 6, 1931, the plaintiff's attorney wrote to the defendant reciting the circumstance of the arbitrary taking of the machinery, and the offer to pay the full amount of the mortgaged indebtedness. He then said: "Notwithstanding your unlawful taking of his property, Mr. Prentice is still willing to pay you the amount due on the promissory note above mentioned." That same day the defendant purports to have sold the machinery, valued at about $1,600, to his son George, for $515. April 8th the defendant's attorney answered the above-mentioned letter, saying that the plaintiff still owed the defendant a balance of $406.78 on the unsecured note which was in dispute, upon which he had commenced a suit in the justice's court for $299.99, and that "all Zumwalt wants is the amount of the mortgage together with the amount sued on in the Justice's Court. He will not ask for the expenses of going after the machinery and bringing it down here, but Prentice will have to take the machinery from here to his own place."

The clear import of this letter is that the defendant was using the secured bank note and mortgage to enforce the payment of the disputed note. It amounted to a refusal to surrender possession of the machinery even upon full payment of the secured debt unless the plaintiff also paid the note which was in dispute. The defendant was therefore unlawfully using a secured debt as a club to enforce the payment of another disputed claim. The tender was refused and the machinery was retained.

The plaintiff then commenced this suit to replevin the property and to secure actual and exemplary damages based upon the unlawful, oppressive, and malicious seizing and retaining of the farm machinery. A bond was furnished and the machinery was returned. A jury found a verdict of $1,550 in favor of the plaintiff. A judgment for that amount was accordingly rendered. From this judgment the defendant has appealed.

[1-4] The jury was warranted in assuming from the evidence that the defendant seized and retained the plaintiff's farm machinery unlawfully, arbitrarily, oppressively, and maliciously. It was necessary for the plaintiff to establish the existence of malice in fact, on the part of the defendant, to sustain a judgment for exemplary damages for seizing and retaining the farm machinery. 8 Cal. Jur. 865, § 108. Section 3300 of the Civil Code entitled the plaintiff to such an amount of actual damages as would fully compensate him for the detriment proximately caused by the unlawful seizure and detention of the machinery. He was entitled to exemplary damages, in a reasonable amount within the discretion of the jury, pursuant to section 3294 of the Civil Code, which provides that:

"In an action for the breach of an obligation not arising from contract, where the defendant has been guilty of oppression, fraud, or malice, express or implied, the plaintiff, in addition to the actual damages, may recover damages for the sake of example and by way of punishing the defendant."

[5] The appellant asserts that, since the above-quoted clause of the mortgage authorized the holder thereof, in the event of default, to "remove and sell" the property without demand for payment or notice, his taking of the machinery was lawful, and may not furnish the basis for exemplary damages. It is, however, apparent that, while this harsh clause of the mortgage may have rendered the seizing of the machinery technically legal, the withholding thereof, after a valid adequate tender was made of the full amount for which the property became security, caused the lien to become automatically discharged, and the refusal to thereafter surrender the possession of the property to become illegal. Bogue v. Roeth 98 Cal. App. 257, 261, 276 P. 1071; 26 R. C. L. 654, § 39. A refusal to surrender the possession of the property when an adequate valid tender was made, rendered the defendant liable for all damages which accrued therefrom.

The implied finding of the jury that the defendant's conduct in seizing and illegally retaining the farm machinery was prompted by implied malice, finds ample support in the evidence. The jury had a right to presume that he invested nearly $500 in purchasing the Bank of Willows' note because it contained a harsh clause of which he might take advantage to wrongfully enforce the payment of another disputed claim. He kept the purchase of this note a secret from the plaintiff. He seized the mortgaged property for a technical breach thereof without demand of payment and without notice. He directed his employees to "get the property." He sent four able-bodied men and two trucks to make sure they would not be prevented from taking the machinery from the plaintiff. He refused a tender of the full amount of money due on this secured indebtedness. In effect, his attorney admitted in his letter of April 8th that they were holding the property, not alone to secure the mortgaged indebtedness, but as an oppressive means of arbitrarily enforcing the payment of another disputed note. After notice of an offer to pay the entire debt secured by the mortgage, he sold the property, without notice, to his son for about a third of its value. These circumstances furnish adequate evidence of implied malice and oppression.

[6] The record discloses ample evidence of a valid tender of the full amount which was due upon the Bank of Willows' note secured by chattel mortgage. From the indorsement on the note it appears there was but $457.76 due thereon October 17, 1930, with 8 per cent. interest from that date. This aggregated the sum of $474.56 which was due June 2, 1931, when the machinery was seized and the first tender was made. The check was for the sum of $475. The plaintiff said he also had with him about $40 in cash of his own in addition thereto. Neither the amount of the tender nor the manner of the proposed payment was objected to. The following day a tender in cash of the full amount of the indebtedness which was due on the note was made to George Zumwalt, who refused it without qualification. The tender was therefore adequate and valid. Section 2076 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides:

"The person to whom a tender is made must, at the time, specify any objection he may have to the money, instrument, or property, or he must be deemed to have waived it; and if the objection be to the amount of money, the terms of the instrument, or the amount or kind of property, he must specify the amount, terms, or kind which he requires, or be precluded from objecting afterwards."

[7, 8] In response to the defendant's contention that the evidence is insufficient to show that actual damages were sustained, the plaintiff asserts that the answer which was filed in this case admits the accruing of actual damages in the sum of $25 a day for each day the plaintiff was deprived of the use of the machinery. The complaint alleges: "That plaintiff has been deprived of the use of said property and that the value of the use thereof to plaintiff is the sum of $25.00 per day for each day the same is detained from him." In his answer to this allegation the defendant "denies that the value of the use of said personal property to plaintiff is the sum of $25.00 per day, for each day the same was detained from him, or that the plaintiff suffered any damage at all by reason thereof." It is claimed this language constitutes an admission that plaintiff's loss by reason of detaining the property was $24.99 for each day he was deprived of the use thereof. This is a correct construction of the pleadings. 8 Cal. Jur. 894. But the defect in the answer in this regard was waived by the plaintiff in the present case, by voluntarily offering evidence of the actual loss sustained on that account. This procedure on his part amounted to an admission that the pleadings actually tendered the issue of the value of the loss of time during which the machinery was detained from the owner. The plaintiff may therefore not rely on the technical defect in the denial which is contained in the answer. 49 C. J. 843, § 1244; 21 Cal. Jur. 273, § 190.

[9-12] The form of the verdict is not invalid because it fails to segregate the amount of actual damages from the sum which is allowed as exemplary damages. There is ample evidence of actual damages which are not disproportionate in amount to the balance of the verdict which represents the exemplary damages allowed. Clark v. McClurg (Cal. Sup.) 4 P.(2d) 149. The plaintiff testified he was about to commence leveling a five-acre tract of land, the day after the machinery was taken, for the purpose of preparing it for planting to alfalfa; that he was deprived of the use of his tractor and other farm machinery for a period of nineteen days; and that it would cost him $25 a day to rent the machinery necessary to carry on the work. It also appears the plaintiff expended $40 additional to hire trucks with which to return the machinery; that one of the castings was broken; and that he employed two men for one day in returning the machinery. On cross-examination the plaintiff admitted it might not have required more than ten or fifteen days to level the alfalfa land. There is, nevertheless, substantial evidence to support a verdict of at least $400 actual damages which were sustained by the plaintiff. This leaves a balance of $1,150 which represents the amount of punitive damages which was allowed by the jury. We are unable to say this amount of punitive damages is disproportionate to the amount of actual damages which is sustained by the record. While it is true there should be a reasonable proportion between the amount of exemplary damages which is allowed and the sum of actual damages, there is a discretion reposed in the jury with regard to the amount which is allowed which will not be disturbed on appeal unless the sum clearly appears to be excessive. Wilkinson v. Singh, 93 Cal. App. 345, 269 P. 705; 8 Cal. Jur. 866, § 109. Under the circumstances of this case, the amount of exemplary damages which was allowed by the jury does not appear to be excessive.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Robert B. Lambert, Judge.

Suit by Michael Riskind and wife against the Frank Meline Company, Inc., Adolph C. Fera, and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs against named defendants, defendant Fera appeals.

Affirmed.

P. W. Thomson, of Los Angeles (Paul Washburn, of counsel), for appellant.

Irving S. Baltimore and A. Feldman, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

Mr. Justice PLUMMER delivered the opinion of the court.

The plaintiffs had judgment for the rescission of a certain contract for the purchase of real estate in the county of Los Angeles, and against the defendant Adolph C. Fera, in the sum of $10,186, and against the Frank Meline Company, Inc., in the sum of $1,550, with interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from October 12, 1927. From this judgment the defendant Adolph C. Fera appeals.

The appeal is based upon the judgment roll alone.

The findings of fact disclose that, within two years prior to the filing of the complaint, the plaintiff Michael Riskind entered into a contract with the Frank Meline Company, Inc., a corporation, for the purchase of lots 8 and 9 in block 23, tract 6783, in the county of Los Angeles; that subsequent to the execution of this agreement the defendants caused to be assigned to the plaintiff an agreement of sale of said real property, executed on the 6th day of January, 1927, between Oliver Wylie and Sarah E. Wylie, as sellers, and Adolph C. Fera, as purchaser; that the conditional contract of sale of said premises provided for the payment of $27,000, upon which at the time of the assignment unto plaintiffs there remained a balance due of $20,250, payable in semiannual installments of $5,062.50 each, commencing with January 16, 1928; that under and pursuant to said agreement the plaintiffs paid to the defendants the sum of $10,750 on or about the 16th day of January, 1927, and made further payments against said property in the sum of $235.68; that of the sum of $10,750 paid as aforesaid, $1,550 of said payment was retained by the Frank Meline Company for their services as agent of Adolph C. Fera.

It is further found that the defendants represented the value of said property as in excess of $31,000, and that the reasonable market value of said premises at said time was not in excess of $22,500.

It is further found that the defendants, prior to the entering into the agreement just referred to, falsely and fraudulently represented to the plaintiffs that a terminal market would be erected directly across the street from said property, at an investment of $250,000; that land therefor had been purchased; that plans therefor had been completed; that said work was actually commenced on or about March 1, 1927, and that the same would be completed by the end of the year 1927; that all arrangements had been completed for the erection of said market; that a bond issue for the building of said market had been underwritten by a Chicago concern; and that the erection of said market would greatly enhance the value of the property involved in this action.

The court further found that all of said representations were false; that the plaintiffs relied thereon, and were induced thereby to make the purchase. Judgment went for rescission and for the return of the payments made on the contracts.

As grounds for reversal, the appellant alleges error on the part of the trial court in permitting the filing of an amended complaint nunc pro tunc, and that the complaint as filed does not state a cause of action. Practically the greater portion of the appellant's argument is directed to the alleged error of the court with reference to the filing of an amended complaint.

The record shows that the original complaint was filed on the 28th day of January, 1928, that the defendants demurred thereto, and same was overruled, and that the defendant and appellant Fera filed an answer thereto on the 21st day of March, 1928. Thereafter it appears that the plaintiff prepared for filing an amended complaint and served the same upon the appellant on the 20th day of March, 1928, the amended complaint bearing the following indorsement: "The undersigned, attorneys for defendant Adolph C. Fera and Mabel J. Fera, hereby agrees and consents to the filing of the within amended complaint. Dated March 20, 1928. (Signed) P. W. Thomson, Attorney for said defendants." By some means not disclosed in the record, the amended complaint was not filed, and thereafter, on the 26th day of December, 1929, the court in which said action was pending made and entered the following order: "It appearing to be a proper case therefor, it is hereby ordered that the within amended complaint may be filed, and that same be filed nunc pro tunc as of March 22, 1928. Dated, this 26th day of December, 1929. (Signed) Elliot Craig, Presiding Judge."

The record shows that on the 3d day of April, 1928, a stipulation was entered into between the attorneys representing the plaintiffs and P. W. Thomson, representing the appellant in this action, to the effect that the answer theretofore filed by said defendants might be deemed and considered as the answer by said defendants to the plaintiffs' amended complaint.

The action came on for trial on the 15th day of January, 1930, and resulted in a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs, as above stated.

[1] The appellant now contends that the nunc pro tunc order of the court was void, and that the court had no power to antedate the filing of the amended complaint, or to permit the filing of an amended complaint which would antedate the actual date of its filing. The record shows, first, a consent to the filing of the amended complaint on the part of the attorney for the appellant. If we agree with the appellant that that consent went only to the fact that the amended complaint should be immediately filed, our attention has not been called to a single fact which shows that the appellant has been in any way prejudiced by the delay in filing of the amended complaint to the filing of which consent had been given. Further, if it be conceded that the nunc pro tunc order of the court as to the date of the filing of the amended complaint, in so far as it admitted the amended complaint to speak as and of a date prior to its actual filing, nevertheless there is nothing in the record which shows that the appellant made any objection thereto, interposed any motion to strike out the amended complaint or vacate the nunc pro tunc order, nor ask for any additional time to file any further or other answer thereto, than as evidenced by the stipulation to which we have above referred.

We do not need to pass upon the validity of the nunc pro tunc part of the court's order. The appellant stipulated, as we have said, for the filing of the amended complaint, and, if it be considered as filed only as and of the date of the court's order in December, 1929, it appears that the trial of the action was not begun until more than half a month thereafter, and here, again, the record is entirely silent as to any objection being entered or made by the appellant against the trial court proceeding with the trial of the action based upon the plaintiff's amended complaint.

[2] We do not need to cite authorities to the effect that the trial court had the power to permit the plaintiff to file an amended complaint during the month of December, 1929. The fact that the cause had been at issue for a number of months in no wise militated against the authority of the court to permit the filing of an amended pleading upon application therefor, so that whether the amended complaint speaks as and of March 22, 1928, or December, 1929, is wholly immaterial.

[3, 4] Paragraph 6 of the amended complaint contains allegations of statements made by the defendants, found by the court to be false and to have been fraudulently made to induce the plaintiffs to enter into the contracts heretofore referred to. With reference to the property across the street which was to be improved by a market and so enhance the value of the lots involved in this action, the complaint alleges the following fraudulent and false statements: "That the land therefor had been purchased; plans therefor completed; that arrangements had been completed for the erection of the market; that a bond issue for the building of said market had been underwritten by Peabody Hoeteling & Company of Chicago; that many of the tenants of the then-existing wholesale Terminal Market at Seventh and Central avenue, Los Angeles, California, whose leases had but a short time to run, had executed leases on the new market." Only a quotation of the foregoing statements is necessary to demonstrate that they are expressions of facts as then existing, and not of mere opinions, and were not mere "sales talks," as claimed by the appellant, or immaterial representations. The plaintiffs could not, by looking at the property, discover the falsity of the statements set forth in the amended complaint, and found by the trial court to have been made. The cases cited by the appellant as representations of buildings in course of construction, where the purchaser has an opportunity to see for himself, are not pertinent here, and it would serve no useful purpose to review them. Every one of the representations which we have quoted were of such a character that examination of the premises would not disclose their falsity. The law is well settled that, where a material representation relied upon is found to be false, it is sufficient to support the judgment. This court so held in the case of Stone v. McCarty, 64 Cal. App. 158, 220 P. 690. See cases cited on page 167 of 64 Cal. App., 220 P. 690, 693. To the same effect is the case of Jackson v. Meinhardt, 99 Cal. App. 283, 278 P. 462. See, also, Mitchell v. Tuttle, 102 Cal. App. 16, 182 P. 534. In the opinion in the Mitchell Case, supra, a number of authorities are cited upholding the rule which we have just set forth.

[5] It is well-settled law that the filing of an amended complaint supersedes the original pleading and requires no citation of authorities.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Crail, Judge.

Proceedings by the Citizens' National Trust & Savings Bank of Los Angeles, as executor of the estate of Charles W. David Tannenbaum and Charles M. Cassin, both of Los Angeles, and W. H. H. Gentry, of Sacramento, for respondents.

FRICKE, Justice pro tem.

Appellant, as executor of the estate of Charles W. Spitly, deceased, filed objections to the report of the inheritance tax appraiser, directing the objections against the valuation by the appraiser of 2,400 shares of preferred and 22,300 shares of the common stock of the Richfield Oil Company and against the amount of the inheritance tax fixed as the result of such valuations. Respondent interposed a general demurrer to the objections, and the demurrer was sustained without leave to amend.

The appraiser valued the preferred stock at $21⅞ per share and the common stock at $25⅝ per share. Basically it was contended by the objections filed by appellant that these figures did not represent the fair market value for the purpose of computing the inheritance tax, while respondent contends that these figures, being the prices at which the securities sold on the stock exchange, represent their market value and are conclusive. The filed objections recite that the appraised values were the sale prices of such shares on the stock exchange on the date of decedent's death, but allege further that the sales on the stock exchange were made at such prices "on the basis of erroneous, false and misleading information about the affairs and financial condition" of the Richfield Oil Company, whose published financial statements grossly overstated its assets, net income, and profits, and understated its liabilities, and that had the true facts been known the stock, both preferred and common, would have sold at a price not in excess of $4 per share. The objections also allege that on the date of decedent's death the price of the shares on the stock exchange was inflated and artificially stimulated as the result of the operations of a pool.

[1] The value of the securities in question is their value at the time of the death of the decedent, and any subsequent appreciation of depreciation in their value is immaterial so far as the issues here are concerned. Estate of Hite, 159 Cal. 392, 395, 113 P. 1072, 32 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1167, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 1014; Riley v. Howard, 193 Cal. 522, 528, 226 P. 393; Estate of Miller, 184 Cal. 674, 686, 195 P. 413, 16 A. L. R. 694. The arguments of counsel based upon the decline in the stock market prices of the stock after decedent's death are, therefore, inapplicable.

[2] The California Inheritance Tax Act provides that the tax shall be "upon the market value" of the property upon which the tax is imposed (section 2 as amended by St. 1929, p. 1835), and that the appraiser shall report to the court the "clear market value" (section 16 as amended by St. 1929, p. 1848). The term "clear market price" is synonymous with the term "fair market price" (In re Dupignac's Estate, 123 Misc. 21, 204 N. Y. S. 273), and "fair market price" means not only that the price be ascertained by sales, but that the sales so made and the subject matter of the sales are to be considered. Walter v. Duffy (C. C. A.) 287 F. 41.

[3, 4] Appellant does not contend, nor do we hold, that the value of corporate shares may not be proved by evidence of the prices current upon the stock exchange. Such evidence is admissible to prove the value of stock shares (People v. Schwarz, 78 Cal. App. 561, 578, 248 P. 990), but we are aware of no authority which holds that stock exchange prices are conclusive evidence of value. Appellant does contend, however, that where, as here, the value is based solely upon stock exchange prices, such valuation may be objected to and successfully attacked by proof that such stock exchange prices are the result of misinformation disseminated by the corporation whose shares are under consideration, the result of pool selling or buying, intended to cause and causing sales at purely speculative prices, or a combination of both factors. It may be conceded that there is no universal touchstone for determining the value of shares of stock applicable to all cases. If information, believed by those who receive it to be true, but which is in fact substantially false and misleading, caused prospective buyers and sellers of a corporate security to form similar erroneous conclusions as to the value of the stock and, relying thereon, a substantial number of sales were made on that basis, the selling price on the stock exchange would not be a proper index of the true value of the security, and the same might be said if the selling price was the result of deliberate juggling, wash sales, or other device intended to fix the buying and selling prices at a figure other than the true value of the security. The standard of market value as a true criterion of value rests on the premise that voluntary buyers and sellers, familiar with the factors of value, have formed opinions as to the value of the property sold which they themselves consider of a reliability sufficient to induce their parting with their money and property. Where, however, it appears that buyers and sellers in their market dealings have formed their opinions as a result of their reliance upon information as to the factors of value, which information is in fact false and untrue, then such opinions are false opinions and the sales made pursuant to such opinions cannot be considered as correctly indicating the value of the property and any value based upon such sales would be a false value.

In Phillips v. United States (D. C.) 12 F. (2d) 598, 601, the court defines "fair market value" "to be the value of the property in money as between one who wishes to purchase and one who wishes to sell; the price at which a seller is willing to sell at a fair price, and a buyer willing to buy at a fair price, both having reasonable knowledge of the facts." (Italics ours.) In Heiner v. Crosby (C. C. A.) 24 F.(2d) 191, 193, the court says: "Sales made at a particular time and place may be significant, but the price paid is not necessarily decisive of fair market price or value. The fact of sales, in itself and without regard to the circumstances under which the sales were made, does not conclusively establish either statutory fair market price or value. Sales made under peculiar and unusual circumstances, such as sales of small lots, forced sales, and sales in a restricted market, may neither signify a fair market price or value, nor serve as the basis on which to determine the amount of gain derived from the sale." See, also, Ray Consol. Copper Co. v. U. S., 268 U. S. 373, 45 S. Ct. 526, 69 L. Ed. 1003; Walter v. Duffy (C. C. A.) 287 F. 41, and cases there cited.

The effect of the ruling of the trial court, sustaining, without leave to amend, the objections to the report of the inheritance tax appraiser, is tantamount to a ruling that proof of the value of shares of stock in a corporation by evidence of the prices of that security upon the stock exchange is so conclusive that it cannot be attacked by proof that such prices were not based upon the true factors of value, but rested upon the slimy foundation of false statements and a manipulation of the stock market. With this we cannot agree.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to the trial court to overrule the demurrer.

BARNARD, P. J.

This is a motion to dismiss an appeal upon the ground that the judgment appealed from has been paid and fully satisfied.

In a complaint containing only one count, the plaintiff sought to recover a balance of $10,484.91 for certain work done for the defendant city under a written contract, the further sum of $16,759.82 for extra work alleged to have been done in connection with the work covered by the contract, and an additional $10,193.15 for damages alleged to have been caused by the interference of the defendant's agents with the work in question, making a total demand of $37,437.88. The defendant admitted that it owed a portion of the contract price and tendered into court $10,379.18, which amount the plaintiff refused to accept. At the close of the plaintiff's case, the defendant moved for a directed verdict for the amount previously tendered, and "for the purposes of this motion only" conceded that interest on this amount should be allowed for about one year. While the matter of interest on the amount tendered was in dispute, the defendant contending that the plaintiff was not entitled to interest thereon, since he had refused to accept the same when it first became due, the inclusion of such interest in the amount of a directed verdict being thus authorized, the court directed a verdict for an amount covering the $10,379.18, plus interest in the sum of $726.54. The jury returned a verdict as directed, and judgment was entered for $11,105.72 and costs, on October 28, 1931.

On October 31, 1931, the plaintiff was notified that the amount of the judgment would be paid upon the receipt of a duly executed satisfaction of judgment. On November 2, 1931, the plaintiff's attorney sent a satisfaction of the judgment to the attorney for the defendant, authorizing him to file the same when he had forwarded the amount of the judgment and costs, and further stating "we hope you will do all that you can to assist us in obtaining the money at the earliest possible date." The amount of the judgment and costs was paid to, and accepted by, the plaintiff's attorney, and on November 14, 1931, there was filed in the clerk's office an instrument which, omitting the formal heading and the acknowledgment, reads as follows:

"No. 66718.

"Satisfaction of Judgment.

"The Judgment herein having been paid, full satisfaction is hereby acknowledged of said Judgment entered Oct. 28 '31 in Book 87 Page 8, of Judgments, in favor of M. N. Subsequently, on December 16, 1931, a notice of appeal was filed by the plaintiff, being the appeal to which this motion is directed.

[1, 2] As a general rule, a party may not accept the fruits of a judgment and at the same time appeal from the same. Estate of Ayers, 175 Cal. 187, 165 P. 528, and cases there cited. An exception to this rule is recognized where the appellant is conceded to be entitled to the thing which he has accepted and where the appeal only relates to an additional claim on his part. San Bernardino County v. Riverside County, 135 Cal. 618, 67 P. 1047; Walnut Irr. Dist. v. Burke, 158 Cal. 165, 110 P. 517, 518. The appellant here claims to be within this exception to the general rule.

It may first be observed that the appellant, in accepting the amount paid, has received more than the amount to which he was concededly entitled, in that he has received $726.54 interest and his costs of suit. If the respondent was correct in its contention that the appellant had improperly refused to accept the correct balance when the same became due, the appellant was not entitled to this interest. While this interest was included in the amount of the directed verdict, this was conceded by the respondent for the purpose of that motion only, and it was never admitted by the respondent that the appellant would be entitled to the same, except in connection with this particular judgment. In taking an appeal after accepting payment of the judgment entered under these circumstances, it is not true that the appellant is, in fact, appealing only after receiving something to which he is concededly entitled, and about which there is no controversy. If the appeal were to be considered and the judgment should be reversed upon the ground that the motion for a directed verdict should not have been granted, upon a rehearing of the case, it might be found that the appellant was entitled only to the amount tendered into court, in which event he would neither be entitled to the interest nor the costs which he has received.

In Walnut Irr. Dist. v. Burke, supra, the following rule was quoted with approval: "If all the provisions of a judgment are connected and dependent, so that a part cannot be reversed without a reversal of the whole, a party cannot proceed to enforce such portions of the judgment as are in his favor, and appeal from the part which is against him. In such case the right to proceed on the judgment and enjoy its fruits, and the right to appeal, are not concurrent, but wholly inconsistent, and an election to assert one right is a waiver and renunciation of the other."

[3] In the case before us, the appellant, in his notice of appeal, states that he appeals from the judgment "and from the whole of said judgment." The judgment was entered upon a directed verdict for a specific amount, and the judgment cannot be reversed without reversing it all, and the appeal was taken from the whole thereof. Under the rule thus stated, we are unable to see how the judgment in question can now be separated in the manner contended for by appellant.

A further rule is thus quoted and approved in Storke v. Storke, 132 Cal. 349, 64 P. 578, 580: "'A party may also waive his right to appeal from a judgment or order by acts which are wholly inconsistent with the assertion of the right. Thus, if all the provisions of a judgment are connected and dependent, so that a part cannot be reversed without a reversal of the whole, a party cannot proceed to enforce such portions of the judgment as are in his favor, and appeal from the part which is against him.'"

[4] If it be assumed that this appellant had the right to accept the amount paid and thereafter appeal from the judgment, we think he waived this right by accepting such payment upon condition that he satisfy the judgment and by executing and authorizing to be filed a full and complete satisfaction thereof. As was said in Estate of Baby, 87 Cal. 200, 25 P. 405, 22 Am. St. Rep. 239, "when a judgment has been satisfied, it has passed beyond review, for the satisfaction thereof is the last act and end of the proceeding." In our opinion, the acts of this appellant are inconsistent with the retention of a right of appeal. The judgment having been satisfied of record, nothing remained from which to appeal.

For the reasons given, the appeal is dismissed.

July 12, 1932.

1. Municipal corporations ⇐607.

Ordinance providing for removal of rubbish, granting exclusive right of its removal in designated zone, and preventing accumulation thereof in large quantities held valid exercise of police power.

Such ordinance was a valid exercise of the police power because considerations of public health and safety suggest the prompt removal of rubbish, because the exercise of the police power in timely prevention of a nuisance is preferable to its use for purposes of abatement after a nuisance has come into existence, and because the police power develops, within reason, to meet the changed conditions of a developing commonwealth.

2. Municipal corporations ⇐589.

Police power is coextensive with necessities of situation and as broad as public welfare.

3. Municipal corporations ⇐607.

Ordinance governing rubbish removal, defining "rubbish" as "waste material and refuse of every character collected or accumulated within city, except garbage," held not invalid for uncertainty in defining "rubbish."

Such definition is not uncertain by being sufficiently comprehensive to include material of value over which the police power of the city does not extend, because the provisions of another ordinance show what substances are excluded as garbage, because there was no dispute between citizens of the municipality, and the official rubbish collector as to what constituted rubbish, and because the definition of rubbish as "waste material or refuse" comprehends an abandonment of the property as valueless. "Refuse" generally is that which is refused or rejected; anything worthless or useless.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Refuse," see Words and Phrases.]

4. Municipal corporations ⇐607.

Any action by city to avoid fire hazard of accumulated rubbish would be lawful unless finding that accumulated rubbish constituted fire hazard was without basis.

5. Municipal corporations ⇐607.

Method to be employed in handling of rubbish and preventing its becoming nuisance was for city's determination.

Application by John Pedrosian for a writ of habeas corpus to be directed to the Chief of Police of the City of San Bernardino to secure release of petitioner from custody under commitment for violation of rubbish removal ordinance.

Writ discharged; petitioner remanded.

Joseph R. Rensch, of San Bernardino, amicus curiæ.

William Guthrie, City Atty., and Wardwell D. Evans, Deputy City Atty., both of San Bernardino, for respondent.

HARDEN, Justice pro tem.

Petitioner is detained by the chief of police of the city of San Bernardino by virtue of a warrant of arrest issued by the police court of said city based upon a complaint filed therein charging him as defendant with the violation of the provisions of Ordinance No. 1456 of said city. The complaint alleges that the defendant has unlawfully engaged in the business of collecting and removing, and that he has unlawfully collected and removed, rubbish from the exclusive zone of said city without having a contract with or consent of the city so to do, at a time when there was in force and effect, pursuant to said ordinance, a contract between said city and the Johnson Rubbish Company granting to said company the exclusive privilege of collecting and removing such rubbish.

Important provisions of the ordinance are:

"Section 1. The word 'rubbish' shall be deemed to include all waste material and refuse of every character whatever collected or accumulated within the city of San Bernardino, except garbage. * * *

"Sec. 5. That any contractor as herein defined, during the time that he shall fully and faithfully keep and perform all the terms, covenants and conditions of the contract awarded to him, shall have the exclusive right to collect, remove and dispose of all rubbish accumulated within said exclusive zone.

"Sec. 6. That it shall be unlawful for any person, firm or corporation to collect or remove any rubbish from said exclusive zone during the time any contract shall be in force for the collection and removal thereof pursuant to the provisions of this ordinance, save and except as herein provided."

It is made unlawful to deposit, collect, or accumulate any rubbish in any open place within said exclusive zone save and except in receptacles provided for such purpose and approved by the chief engineer of the fire department. It is further provided that collections shall be made from the exclusive zone, at the expense of the person served, as frequently as required by and under the supervision and to the satisfaction of the sanitary inspector, but in any event at least once a week. Provision is made for the giving of a bond to the city by the contractor guaranteeing faithful performance of his contract. The owner or person in possession of property may remove therefrom rubbish naturally accumulating thereon in a vehicle owned or possessed by him. Any independent contractor may collect and remove rubbish accumulating upon any property in the city save and except from property embraced within the exclusive zone. Provision is made for the removal by the city semiannually of rubbish from portions of the city other than the exclusive zone without charge. By the terms of another ordinance of the city it is provided: "The word 'garbage,' as used in this Ordinance, shall mean and include table refuse, swill and offal, and every accumulation of animal, vegetable and other matter that attends the preparation, consumption, decay or dealing in or storage of meats, fish, fowls, fruits, and shall include all animal and vegetable refuse from kitchens and all household waste that shall have been prepared from or intended to be used as food, or shall have resulted from the preparation of food. Articles and things not hereinbefore enumerated are not included in the term garbage, and it is particularly provided that the following are not included in said term garbage, to-wit: dead animals over five pounds in weight, dish or waste water, paper and other combustible or inflammable material, crockery, glass, cans, tins, ashes, wire and sweepings."

Pursuant to constitutional provision and its city charter, the city of San Bernardino has authority to make and enforce all such local, police, sanitary, and other regulations as pertain to municipal affairs; and to define nuisances and provide for their removal.

The general purpose of the ordinance is to provide for the collection, removal, and disposal of rubbish accumulating in the city of San Bernardino. Its particular feature is that it establishes an exclusive zone, comprising the business district of the city, and provides for the award of a contract to some person, firm, or corporation granting the exclusive right, and imposing the duty, of collecting, removing, and disposing of all accumulations of rubbish within said zone.

[1] At the outset it is admitted by petitioner and the amicus curiæ that if the same rules apply to an ordinance covering the collection, removal and disposal of rubbish as apply to an ordinance so dealing with garbage, the petitioner should be remanded. All such questions as are raised herein have been definitely settled by the decisions of our courts and of other courts adversely to petitioner's contentions as respects such collection, removal, and disposal of garbage. Some of the decisions sustaining similar ordinances applicable to garbage are: In re Santos, 88 Cal. App. 691, 264 P. 281; In re Zhizhuzza, 147 Cal. 328, 81 P. 955; Bishop v. City of Tulsa, 21 Okl. Cr. 457, 209 P. 228, 27 A. L. R. 1008; Jansen Farms, Inc., v. City of Indianapolis, 202 Ind. 138, 171 N. E. 199, 72 A. L. R. 514. Among the cases sustaining the validity of such an ordinance applicable to both garbage and rubbish are: Porter v. City of Hot Springs, 171 Ark. 1142, 287 S. W. 585; State v. Lovelace, 118 Wash. 50, 203 P. 28; Smith v. City of Spokane, 55 Wash. 219, 104 P. 249, 19 Ann. Cas. 1220; California Reduction Company v. Sanitary Reduction Works, 199 U. S. 306, 26 S. Ct. 100, 50 L. Ed. 204.

Petitioner relies chiefly upon two cases: Landberg v. City of Chicago, 237 Ill. 112, 86 N. E. 638, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 830, 127 Am. St. Rep. 319, and Iler v. Ross, 64 Neb. 710, 90 N. W. 869, 57 L. R. A. 895, 97 Am. St. Rep. 676.

In the case of Landberg v. City of Chicago, supra, for a consideration flowing to the city the ordinance granted a monopoly to an individual to collect and appropriate the manure accumulating in the city of Chicago. The holding to the effect that the ordinance was invalid is based upon the fact that the granting of a monopoly under such circumstances to remove and appropriate the manure accumulating in the city had no legitimate relation to the preservation of public health. The court recognizes the line of authorities holding such ordinances as the one under consideration here, where applicable to garbage, to be valid and distinguishes such cases from the one before the court. We think the decision is not authority in support of any contention of petitioner.

Said case of Iler v. Ross, supra, holds that such an ordinance is valid as respects its application to garbage but invalid as to rubbish. The decision that the portion of the ordinance dealing with rubbish is invalid turns upon the point that provision is made for its collection before its accumulation in such quantities as to become a nuisance and that said portion of the ordinance has no just relation to the preservation of public health or safety. It further holds that the ordinance grants an unlawful monopoly for the removal of substances not nuisances per se. Accordingly, it is earnestly contended here that the rights of the owners of rubbish accumulating in the city of San Bernardino, of petitioner as an independent contractor, and the rights and duties of the city in the premises, are so vastly different from the situation where garbage alone is the subject of such legislation as to require a holding that the ordinance here in question is void. It is urged that garbage is a nuisance per se; whereas rubbish, unless allowed to accumulate in large quantities, is not.

Perhaps the mere lapse of time since the rendition of the decision of Iler v. Ross, supra, in 1902, would work a change in the opinion of that court. Certainly since then great strides have been made in the handling of all problems of public health and safety. No one would willingly go back to the days of the open toilet, the livery stable, the hogpen, or the alley overflowing with its filth, in the thickly populated portions of our cities. With modern methods being applied in all phases of community life, the people are not expected now to dull their sensibilities and endure the offenses which were formerly accepted as of necessity. If, as is stated, garbage is a nuisance per se, the same should be said of much of the rubbish accumulating in a city. One need not be a specialist to make an inspection. Little observation will reveal that much filth, withheld from the garbage pail out of regard for the well-being of the hogs fed upon the contents, finds its way to the rubbish pile and the trash can. Considerations both of public health and safety suggest its prompt removal.

[2] Particular stress is laid upon the claim that unless rubbish is allowed to accumulate in large quantities it is not a danger to public health or safety. The evident purpose of the ordinance was to prevent its accumulation in large quantities. To our minds, the exercise of the police power in the timely prevention of a nuisance is preferable to its use for purposes of abatement after a nuisance has come into existence. That said power may be lawfully exercised for such purpose is well established. In French v. Davison, 143 Cal. 658, 77 P. 663, the act of 1899 requiring the vaccination of children was held to be valid and within the police power of the state. The case was followed in Wallace v. Regents of the University of California, 75 Cal. App. 274, 242 P. 892. Lands have been drained pursuant to police power as conducive to public good and in the interest of public health. Laguna Drainage District v. Chas. Martin Co., 144 Cal. 209, 77 P. 933. Under that power the burial of bodies within the city limits of San Francisco was prevented. Odd Fellows' Cem. Ass'n v. San Francisco, 140 Cal. 226, 73 P. 987, 988. In that case it was said: "Whenever a thing or act is of such a nature that it may become a nuisance, or may be injurious to the public health, if not suppressed or regulated, the legislative body may, in the exercise of its police powers, make and enforce ordinances to regulate or prohibit such act or thing, although it may never have been offensive or injurious in the past." The following general statement is found in 12 Corpus Juris, 916: "Statutes and ordinances may be enacted for the prevention of, and protection from fires, as by the establishment of limits within which buildings of wood or other combustible materials may be erected, * * * regulating the method of installing electric wires, requiring reasonable fire escapes, and even authorizing the destruction of buildings in the path of a conflagration." "The police power is to the public what the law of necessity is to the individual. It is comprehended in the maxim Salus populi suprema lex. It is not a rule; it is an evolution. * * * The power has always been as broad as the public welfare." State v. Mountain Timber Company, 75 Wash. 581, 135 P. 645, 648, L. R. A. 1917D, 10. "The police power * * * is coextensive with the necessities of the situation." In re Santos, 88 Cal. App. 691–696, 264 P. 281, 283. All property is held subject to the proper exercise of the police power. Ex parte Quong Wo, 161 Cal. 220, 118 P. 714. "The police power, as such, is not confined within the narrow circumscription of precedents, resting upon past conditions which do not cover and control present day conditions obviously calling for revised regulations to promote the health, safety, morals, or general welfare of the public. * * * As a commonwealth develops politically, economically, and socially, the police power likewise develops, within reason, to meet the changed and changing conditions. What was at one time regarded as an improper exercise of the police power may now, because of changed living conditions, be recognized as a legitimate exercise of that power." Miller v. Board of Public Works, 195 Cal. 477, 484, 234 P. 381, 383, 38 A. L. R. 1479. The California cases most nearly in point on the facts are the cases of In re Santos and In re Zhizhuzza, already cited, where similar ordinances designed to prevent nuisances in the handling of garbage were upheld.

[3] Petitioner contends that the definition of "rubbish" as found in the ordinance is uncertain for the reason that it is sufficiently comprehensive to include material of value over which the police power of the city does not extend. We think there is no uncertainty in the definition. Under the ordinance rubbish is defined as "waste material and refuse of every character collected or accumulated within the city, except garbage." The provisions of another ordinance show what substances are excluded as garbage. Petitioner is not concerned with the possibility of disputes between the citizens of San Bernardino and the official rubbish collector as to what constitutes rubbish. We may repeat what was said in In re Zhizhuzza, supra, to the effect that the owners of property referred to as being injuriously affected are not complaining here. There is nothing in the ordinance which requires the abandonment of any property. So long as an owner desires to retain his property he may do so; and there is nothing to prevent him from making a bona fide sale of it. But he may not accumulate and retain large quantities of rubbish. When refuse has been deposited for collection as rubbish by the owner, it may be regarded as abandoned by him. The definition of "rubbish" as waste material or refuse comprehends an abandonment of the property as valueless. "Refuse" is generally defined as "that which is refused or rejected; anything worthless or useless; trash; debris."

While not involved directly in this proceeding, respondent has asked for an expression of our opinion upon the question of the validity of contracts entered into between petitioner and persons residing or doing business within said exclusive zone for the collection, removal, and disposal of their rubbish. It is our opinion that, while a bona fide sale of property is not prevented by the ordinance, any contract designed either directly or indirectly to permit the collection, removal or disposal of rubbish from within the exclusive zone by any person other than the official rubbish collector would be illegal and void.

[4, 5] While considerations of health were doubtless in mind, the evidence is before us in the provisions of the ordinance that it was designed particularly to meet the fire hazard. By its provisions it requires that rubbish accumulating in open places in the exclusive zone be kept in receptacles to be provided for such purpose and approved by the chief engineer of the fire department; provides for the frequent removal and disposal of such rubbish; provides for an official rubbish collector under bond to the city for the faithful performance of his duties under the contract; provides that in bidding for the contract he specify the nature and kind of conveyances to be used; and generally gives to the city complete control over the whole subject of the collection, removal, and disposal of rubbish within the exclusive zone. The city impliedly found that in the usual course of affairs in the business district, if not controlled by provisions of such an ordinance, rubbish would accumulate in such quantities as to become a menace to public health and safety. If reason and experience do not show clearly that such finding was without substantial basis, then any action taken by the city in adopting suitable means to avoid the hazard would be lawful. There is nothing before us which would warrant a court in holding that there was no sufficient basis for legislative action to meet the situation. There is the question of whether the provisions of the ordinance are designed to serve the purpose. Just what methods were to be employed was, of course, a question for determination by the city. The ordinance establishes appropriate means for the handling of rubbish and to prevent its becoming a nuisance.

[6] The cases hereinabove cited and many others that might be referred to dispose of contentions that such an ordinance when applied to the handling of garbage is open to justifiable attack upon the ground that such private property is not subject to control by the exercise of the police power, or that such ordinance grants an unlawful monopoly, or that it unlawfully authorizes the taking of property without due process of law, or that it improperly deprives one of the right to pursue a lawful occupation. Neither of said grounds of attack may be properly urged against the ordinance under consideration here. The reasons sustaining the validity of such an ordinance covering the subject of garbage as a proper measure in the preservation of health are equally applicable to an ordinance dealing only with rubbish. The police power may be exercised as well in guarding against the hazard of fire as in preventing the spread of disease. Here, considerations both of public health and safety are involved. We need not state at length the reasons advanced by the various courts in holding similar ordinances do not violate any of said constitutional rights of the parties involved. Such reasons are comprehended in the statement that where particular legislative action is lawfully pursuant to the police power any loss occasioned by the invasion of individual rights in the exercise of that power is damnum absque injuria. In such case individual constitutional rights must yield in favor of the general welfare.

The court is taking no great step in upholding this ordinance as a valid exercise of the police power. If it be true, as is suggested, that in its enactment the city of San Bernardino has broken new legislative ground, or if in sustaining such legislation we are giving judicial approval in a case for which there is no precedent exactly in point, such advances are in pursuance of what can be expected in the working out of public rights under changing conditions.

The writ is discharged, and the petitioner is remanded to the custody of the chief of police of the city of San Bernardino.

GERDES v. PACIFIC GAS & ELECTRIC CO. et al., and three other cases. *

Civ. 8102.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California.

July 5, 1932.

Rehearing Denied Aug. 4, 1932.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Sept. 2, 1932.

1. Gas ⇐20(2).

Evidence held to show that consumers injured by explosion of escaping gas on their premises were guilty of contributory negligence in failing to leave property when properly warned.

2. Negligence ⇐136(26).

Ordinarily contributory negligence is for jury.

3. Negligence ⇐136(5).

Where reasonable men could not differ, or where one fails to exercise common prudence required by law, contributory negligence is for court.

4. Appeal and error ⇐1001(1).

Appellate court will reverse judgment where reasonable men could not fail to agree that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence.

5. Negligence ⇐121(2).

"Res ipsa loquitur" applies only where instrumentality is under defendant's exclusive control, strong probability of negligence exists, and cause of accident is unknown.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Res Ipsa Loquitur," see Words and Phrases.]

6. Gas ⇐20(2).

"Res ipsa loquitur" did not apply where gas explosion occurred on consumers' premises through ignition, and instrumentalities causing break in pipe were not in exclusive control of defendant gas company.

7. Negligence ⇐138(3).

Where evidence was sufficient to prove real cause of accident and thus exclude res ipsa loquitur doctrine, such element must be covered in instruction.

8. Gas ⇐20(5).

Failure to instruct that res ipsa loquitur did not apply where bursting of water mains allegedly caused gas explosion injuring plaintiffs, if accident was due to causes for which water company was not liable held error.

9. Gas ⇐20(2).

In action against water company for injuries resulting from gas explosion allegedly caused by breaking of water mains which in turn caused gas leak in plaintiffs' house, res ipsa loquitur held inapplicable under facts.

Facts disclosed that circumstances surrounding accident were not such as would support the inference of negligence of the water company and exclude all others, and that such evidence showed that, if city was negligent in the maintenance of its water mains which allegedly caused the breaking of defendant company's water mains, then such negligence was of itself sufficient to have caused the fall of the street pavement and the subsequent sagging of the gas pipe which resulted in the leak on plaintiffs' premises.

10. Appeal and error ⇐882(12).

Submission of instruction that res ipsa loquitur did not shift burden of proof did not preclude defendant from attacking instructions on res ipsa loquitur.

11. Negligence ⇐138(2).

Refusal to instruct as to amount of evidence required to overcome presumption of negligence from happening of accident held error.

Refusal to so instruct was error not only because res ipsa loquitur was not applicable to the facts, but also because a similar instruction was given in relation to a codefendant.

12. Gas ⇐20(5).

Where consumers knew for more than two hours of escaping gas, instruction on care required of persons in "imminent danger" was error.

"Imminent danger" does not mean a danger which is known to be approaching over a long period of time though party may not know the precise time when injury might be expected.

NOURSE, P. J.

The plaintiffs brought four actions for damages resulting to persons and property from the explosion of gas in their home located on the east side of Forty-seventh avenue in San Francisco. The four causes were tried together on stipulation, and plaintiffs had verdicts against the Pacific Gas & Electric Company and Olympic Salt Water Company amounting to $40,000, which were reduced by order of the trial judge to the sum of $25,000. Verdicts were returned against the plaintiffs and in favor of the City and County of San Francisco in all four cases. From the judgments following the verdicts against the Pacific Gas & Electric Company and the Olympic Salt Water Company, these defendants have appealed upon a joint record presented under the alternative method. Three of the actions involved claims for personal injuries to Mr. and Mrs. Gerdes, the fourth involved claims of both for the damage to their home and furniture. It should however, be borne in mind throughout the opinion that on this appeal all four cases are presented upon the same briefs and none of the parties makes any distinction between the several causes of action as to the application of the rules of law involved.

At the time of the accident the defendant Olympic Salt Water Company owned and operated a 16-inch salt water main along the easterly side of Forty-seventh avenue; the defendant City and County of San Francisco owned and operated an 8-inch fresh water main along the same avenue at a distance of about a foot and one-half west of the salt water main; the defendant Pacific Gas & Electric Company owned and operated an 8-inch steel welded high pressure gas main located to the west and close to the westerly curb; Pacific Gas & Electric Company also owned and operated a 6-inch low pressure main from which a service pipe extended across and above the two water mains and into the home of the plaintiffs where it was connected with the meter and service pipes installed in the home at a point in the westerly front wall below the garage and directly under the front door and porch of the home.

On March 18, 1930, at about 4:45 or 4:50 p. m., the two water mains broke at a point in front of the Gerdes home and the water coming from these mains undermined the pavement in the street so that this pavement broke and the sand underneath was washed out and a portion of the pavement fell upon the service pipe of the Pacific Gas & Electric Company extending into the Gerdes home and caused it to sag and separate at the point of connection within the front wall of the home and outside of the place where the meter was installed. This caused gas to escape into the garage and basement of the Gerdes home which rose throughout the upper rooms.

The odor of gas was detected by Mrs. Gerdes as early as 5:15 p. m., and at 5:24 p. m. a member of the fire department went into the Gerdes home in the line of his duty. He detected the odor of gas and in going into the basement heard a distinct roar as the gas escaped from the broken pipe. He opened all the doors and windows in the basement and upper rooms, and told Mrs. Gerdes that he and his associate had been sent to take her out of the house, but Mrs. Gerdes refused to leave, stating that she had telephoned to her husband and that he was on his way home. The fireman then warned her to stay in the rear of the house because of the escape of gas in the forepart, to refrain from lighting any fire, and suggested that inasmuch as her husband was coming immediately it would be proper to wait and let him take her out of the house. Another fireman, who was in the house at the time, and Mrs. Gerdes both corroborated this testimony in every particular. Mr. Gerdes arrived home at about 5:40 p. m., detected the odor of gas and learned from his wife the warning that had been given by the firemen. They ate a cold supper, refraining from lighting a fire of any kind because of the warning of danger given by the firemen. At about 6:30 p. m. Mrs. Gerdes put on her hat and coat, preparing to leave the place, and Mr. Gerdes at the same time left the house through the rear of the lot and called upon a neighbor, who was a member of the fire department and who accompanied Mr. Gerdes back to the Gerdes home. They went into the basement and turned off the meter, but discovered that the leak came from a point beyond the meter and could not be controlled within the house. At this time they found the odor of gas very strong, and one of them stepped to the garage in front of the house and warned the men on the outside of the house to refrain from smoking because of the danger on account of the leak. This fireman telephoned to the gas company at some time between 7:10 and 7:30 p. m., notifying the company that the pipe was broken and in need of repair.

As Mr. Gerdes and the fireman returned to the upper floor of the house they found Mrs. Gerdes in a stupefied condition as the result of the escaping gas. They moved her to a place near the front door and afterward she was moved out on the front porch. At about this time a friend came to the house and urged Mrs. Gerdes to leave, and the fireman again warned those gathered on the street in front of the house to refrain from smoking because of the danger caused by gas escaping in the house. At approximately 8 p. m. gas was ignited in a manner not shown in the evidence, and the explosion which resulted injured both plaintiffs and caused serious damage to their property. The repair man of the gas company, in answer to the call for service, appeared at the home just as the explosion occurred. (No satisfactory proof was made of the cause of the explosion. Evidence was offered that men working in the street were using lighted lanterns and that some men were smoking; also that the electric lights were turned on and off within the premises. But, whether the gas was ignited from the street or from sparks from the electric switches was not known.)

[1] Upon these facts both appellants urged that the plaintiffs were guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law. They point particularly to the undisputed evidence that both plaintiffs were warned of the approaching danger more than two hours before the explosion occurred; that, conscious of this danger, Mrs. Gerdes was dressed prepared to leave the premises nearly two hours before the explosion; that the means of exit were never closed either from the front or to rear of the house; that, though Mrs. Gerdes was physically ill, there were a large number of men, firemen, policemen, and others who were ready and willing to help her out of the house; that, though frequent warnings were given by firemen and others of the danger arising from the escape of gas, Mrs. Gerdes took the one position in the entire house where the danger was the greatest—at the front door, directly over the point where the gas was escaping from the broken pipe.

[2-4] It would seem evident that this is a case where that doctrine should be applied. It has long been the accepted rule that a party may not wantonly and carelessly cast himself into known peril and thereby hold the party at fault for the injury arising, but it is just as necessary that one use common and ordinary caution to protect himself from injury as it is that another must use common and ordinary caution not to cause him injury. Ordinarily, of course, the question of contributory negligence is one largely of fact for the consideration of the jury, but where the quantum of common and ordinary conduct is prescribed by law or by rule of decision, as in the "stop, look and listen" cases, or by the fixed judgment of the ordinarily reasonable man, the question becomes more one of law than of fact. Some of the decisions have stated it this way; that, if the question of the negligence of the plaintiff is one upon which reasonable minds could not differ, then that question is one of law and not of fact. Thus where the contributory negligence arises from a violation of an express provision of law, or rule of decision, or where it rests upon evidence which would not justify a conclusion that the conduct of the plaintiff was that of a reasonable and prudent person, then the question is not one for the final determination of the jury. In this we mean that in such a case the appellate courts must reverse the judgment if the uncontradicted evidence demonstrates contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff to such an extent that reasonable men could not draw different conclusions. Hughes v. Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway Co. (Cal. App.) 8 P.(2d) 853.

Though extensive briefs have been written by the several parties, the real answer of the respondents to this point may be listed under three heads: First, they say that they were confronted by an imminent peril and feared that the house was being undermined by the action of the water. No evidence of such peril appears in the record, but, if it be true that the plaintiffs feared it, it is hard to understand why the invalid wife should have taken a position on the front porch where, if the undermining should occur, she was seated at the point of the greatest danger from that source. Second, it is said that the plaintiffs were confined in the house because of the weakened pavement of the street in front. The record does not support this statement. The parties were going in and out of the house from both front and rear, and, for a period of two hours or more prior to the explosion, both exits were unobstructed. Third, it is suggested that the respondents were not aware of the danger from the explosion of the gas because the fireman had told Mrs. Gerdes that there was no immediate danger. This statement, however, was made at about 5:30 p. m., which was two and one-half hours before the explosion. It should also be noted that the statement of the fireman was accompanied with a warning that, as there was no immediate danger, it would be all right for Mrs. Gerdes to wait for her husband to return, and also that the statement was made after Mrs. Gerdes had told the fireman that she was expecting her husband at any minute.

There is no substantial conflict in the evidence covering the issue of plaintiffs' contributory negligence. The statement of facts at the beginning of this opinion is as favorable to their case as it could be made without a distortion of the uncontradicted evidence in the record. We cannot escape the conclusion that upon this point the undisputed evidence of plaintiffs' negligence is so plain and unmistakable that reasonable minds could not honestly differ and that the judgments must, therefore, be reversed. The case is of the same character as Hughes v. Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway Co., 8 P.(2d) 853, which was recently decided by this court and in which authorities supporting the proposition are cited. It would serve no purpose to cite further authority here.

Both appellants complain of the instructions relating to the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur. The instruction directed to the gas company reads: "In the present case if you find from the evidence that the injuries sustained by plaintiffs, if any, were due to an explosion of gas on the premises of plaintiffs and if you further find from the evidence that said gas was communicated to said premises through a pipe under the control and management of the defendant, Pacific Gas and Electric Company, and if you find that said pipe broke without fault of plaintiffs, permitting gas to escape therefrom into the premises of plaintiffs, and that said gas proximately caused the explosion, then I instruct you that the bursting or breaking of said pipe affords reasonable evidence, in the absence of explanation, that it arose from a want of reasonable care." That directed to the Olympic Salt Water Company reads as follows: "I instruct you that when a thing which causes injury is under the control and management of a defendant and the accident is such as in the ordinary course of things does not happen if those who have the control and management use proper care, it affords reasonable evidence in the absence of explanation by the defendant, that the accident arose from want of proper care. Therefore in the present case if you find from the evidence that the defendant, Olympic Salt Water Company, owned and controlled a water main on Forty-seventh Avenue on the 18th day of March, 1930, and said water main broke on said day, permitting water to escape therefrom and thereby proximately contributing to the explosion causing the injuries complained of by plaintiffs, then I instruct you that the bursting or breaking of said water main affords reasonable evidence in the absence of explanation that it arose from a want of reasonable care."

[5] The essentials of the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur, or "the thing speaks for itself," are that the instrumentality causing the injury must be in the exclusive management or control of the defendant; that the circumstances attending the accident must be such as to carry a strong probability of negligence on the part of the defendant, and that the accident would not have happened if the defendant had exercised proper care in the management of the instrumentality; and that the actual cause of the accident must be otherwise unknown. 45 Cor. Jur. 1197–1211. Thus it has been said that the doctrine is applicable only when the nature of the accident itself not only supports the inference of defendant's negligence but excludes all others. Scellars v. Universal Service, 68 Cal. App. 252, 228 P. 879; Carlsen v. Diehl, 57 Cal. App. 731, 208 P. 150; Olson v. Whitthorne & Swan, 203 Cal. 206–208, 263 P. 518, 519, 58 A. L. R. 129; 19 Cal. Jur. 708, 710, 711. In the Olson Case it is said: "To render the doctrine applicable 'it must be shown that the instrumentality causing the injury was under the control of the defendant, and that the injury was caused by some act incident to that control,' and the injury 'must be of such a nature that it ordinarily would not have occurred but for the defendant's negligence.'" The application of this rule has, however, been found restricted where two or more defendants have been jointly charged with negligence. In the early case of Harrison v. Sutter Street Ry. Co., 134 Cal. 549, 552, 66 P. 787, 55 L. R. A. 608, it was held that this doctrine was not applicable where two defendants were jointly charged with the negligence causing the injuries complained of because the particular instrumentality that caused the injury could not have been under the exclusive control of either. This rule has been followed without interruption and was recently cited in Wright v. Southern Counties Gas Co., 102 Cal. App. 656, 666, 283 P. 823, 827, where it is said that "where the negligence of one is sufficient to occasion injury without the negligence of the other party, no inference of negligence as against both can be drawn."

[6] Applying these rules to the case of the gas company, it must be apparent that the res ipsa loquitur doctrine was not available to the plaintiffs because it is conceded that the explosion occurred through the ignition of gas in the premises of plaintiffs and beyond the control of the gas company; that the gas escaped from a pipe located wholly on plaintiffs' premises; that the break in the gas pipe was caused by the fall of the pavement, which, in turn, was caused by the break in the water mains; and that neither of these two instrumentalities was in the exclusive or any control of the gas company.

[7] The doctrine was inapplicable to this company for the further reason that the cause of the accident was not "otherwise unknown." The accident was caused by the ignition of gas within the premises which came there through the breaking of appellants' pipe. If this appellant were negligent because of its failure to shut off the flow of gas before the explosion, then that was a distinct act of negligence proximately causing the injury, and the cause of the accident was not, therefore, unknown. But, if this were not a distinct act of negligence, then the only evidence of negligence of this appellant is the inference of negligence arising from the application of this doctrine. We do not hold that the defendants lost the right to rely on this doctrine by attempting to prove the real cause of the accident, because such is not the rule in this state. What we do hold is that, when the evidence is sufficient to prove the real cause and thus exclude the application of the res ipsa loquitur doctrine, that element should be covered in the instructions. Thus, if the accident occurred because of the failure of this appellant to remedy the leak within a reasonable time, there was then direct evidence of the cause of the accident which would exclude the application of the doctrine (Carlsen v. Diehl, 57 Cal. App. 731, 208 P. 150), and, if the failure to repair the leak within 30 or 40 minutes after notification is evidence of negligence on the part of this appellant, the failure of the respondents to escape from the building within two and one-half hours of notice of the danger is also evidence of contributory negligence on their part. Hence, the inference that the respondents were guilty of contributory negligence could be drawn just as reasonably from the evidence as could the inference that the gas company was negligent in the conduct of its affairs, and thus the res ipsa loquitur doctrine is excluded under the rule of those cases which hold that it is not applicable when the unexplained accident might have been caused by plaintiffs' negligence or might have been due to one of several causes for some of which defendant was not responsible. Olson v. Whitthorne & Swan, 203 Cal. 206, 208, 263 P. 518, 58 A. L. R. 129; White v. Spreckels, 10 Cal. App. 287, 294, 295, 101 P. 920; 19 Cal. Jur. 710, 711.

[8, 9] In reference to the appellant Olympic Salt Water Company, the instruction embracing this doctrine was especially erroneous because it failed to inform the jury that the inference was not to be drawn if the evidence disclosed that the accident might have been due to other causes for which this appellant was not responsible. The applicability of the rule of the cases just cited to the case of the Olympic Salt Water Company is apparent. Throughout the trial this appellant sought to prove that the breaking of the water mains was caused by a defect in the main of the City and County of San Francisco which, breaking first, washed away the sand and soil supporting the salt water main and the pavement overhead and caused the pavement to fall and break the main of the Salt Water Company. It was conceded by all parties that the breaking of the pavement was caused when the sand and soil supporting it was washed away by the water escaping from one or both of these two mains, and it was also conceded that the dropping of this pavement caused the gas pipe to sag and spring a leak in the home of respondents. As a part of the evidence offered by the Salt Water Company, it was shown that a few minutes before the break in the two water mains, the main of the City and County of San Francisco broke at a distance of about 150 feet further down the street, and that an analysis of the pipes at a point in front of respondents' home showed that the pipe of the City and County was defective. On the other hand, the City and County offered evidence tending to disprove this point and to prove that the pipe of the Salt Water Company was defective at that point. The evidence of neither party on this issue was clear and convincing. For some reason unexplained in the record the jury found in favor of the City and County of San Francisco and against the other defendants. If the jury had believed the evidence offered by the Salt Water Company then it could have concluded that the accident resulted from the negligence of the City and County, and this in turn would have excluded the inference arising out of the res ipsa loquitur doctrine. Our examination of all the evidence convinces us that it was just as reasonable to draw the inference against the City and County as it was to draw that inference against the Salt Water Company. This being so, the res ipsa loquitur doctrine was inapplicable to the Salt Water Company, first, because the evidence of the circumstances surrounding the accident was not such as would support the inference of the negligence of the Salt Water Company and exclude all others (Scellars v. Universal Service, supra; Carlsen v. Diehl, supra; 19 Cal. Jur. 710, 711; Ryan v. Fall River Iron Works, 200 Mass. 188, 86 N. E. 310; White v. Spreckels, supra), and, second, because this evidence shows without doubt that, if the City and County of San Francisco was negligent in the maintenance of its main as charged by the Salt Water Company, then that negligence was of itself sufficient to have caused the fall of the street pavement and the consequent sagging of the gas pipe which resulted in the leak upon respondents' premises (Harrison v. Sutter Street Ry. Co., supra; Wright v. Southern Counties Gas Co., supra).

[10, 11] The respondents' reply to this point is that the appellant Olympic Salt Water Company tendered an instruction upon the same issue and thereby invited the error. They cite Yolo Water & Power Co. v. Hudson, 182 Cal. 48, 51, 186 P. 772, and other cases holding that a party cannot complain of an error in an instruction given at the instance of his adversary when he requests a substantially similar one. The rule is general but has no application to this case. The issue founded on the res ipsa loquitur doctrine was first presented in the opening statement of counsel for the respondents. It ran throughout the long trial in the testimony offered, the objections made thereto, and the ruling of the trial court thereon. The instructions upon that issue proposed by the respondents and given by the trial court were, as we have heretofore pointed out, incomplete statements of the proper application of that doctrine. In self-defense, so to speak, this appellant proposed and the trial court gave an instruction to the effect that the res ipsa loquitur doctrine does not shift the burden of proof between the parties, but that the burden of producing the preponderance of the evidence remained with the plaintiffs. This is far from an invitation to the trial court to commit error in submitting to the jury the issues raised by the respondents. But, to emphasize the position of this appellant, it proposed an instruction which the trial court refused to give, and which, if given, would have gone far towards lessening the error of the instructions given at the request of the respondents. This proposed instruction reads as follows: "I instruct you that even where the thing which caused the injury is shown to be under the control and management of the defendant and the accident is such as in the ordinary course of things does not happen if those who have the control and management use proper care, this does not place upon the defendant the burden of rebutting by a preponderance of evidence the prima facie case so made. The defendant is required merely to make such a showing as to want of negligence as will leave the jury unsatisfied as to whether or not there was negligence on defendant's part." In defense of this instruction this appellant directs particular attention to the concluding sentence which was designed to inform the jury as to the quantum of proof required by a defendant in rebutting the prima facie case of a plaintiff made out by the application of the res ipsa loquitur doctrine. The proposed instruction was a correct statement of the law in this respect. 19 Cal. Jur. 719; Seitzman v. Srere Corporation (Cal. App.) 3 P.(2d) 58. The rule, which is supported by abundant authority, is found in the text of California Jurisprudence, which reads: "Accordingly, a defendant need not rebut by a preponderance of evidence the prima facie case so made, but is required merely to make a showing as to want of negligence as will leave the jury unsatisfied as to whether or not there was negligence on defendant's part." 19 Cal. Jur., p. 719.

The error in the refusal to give this instruction was emphasized by the giving of an instruction covering the precise subject-matter, but limited specifically to the defendant City and County of San Francisco so that the issue as between the two water companies was given to the jury with instructions advising that they could infer negligence against either or both of these defendants from the fact that their water pipes broke while under their control and management, but that, as to the City and County of San Francisco, it was sufficient if that defendant produced evidence which would fairly balance the evidence introduced by the plaintiffs, but that, as to its codefendant, the Olympic Salt Water Company, it was necessary for it to overcome by a preponderance of evidence the inference of negligence arising from plaintiffs' prima facie case. The point was not, as respondents now argue, that one defendant was given more favorable consideration by the trial court than the other. The point is that this appellant was entitled to the instruction proposed by it covering this delicate question of preponderance of evidence, and that, in refusing to give this instruction, the trial court increased the burden upon this appellant by giving a similar instruction in relation to its codefendant. As the evidence of negligence on the part of the City and County was just as strong as the evidence against the Olympic Salt Water Company, and as the jury found in favor of the City and County of San Francisco and against the Olympic Salt Water Company, this appellant cites the circumstance as evidence that the errors complained of were prejudicial to it. We cannot escape the conclusion that the doctrine was inapplicable in the first instance, and that the failure to give the proposed instruction was prejudicial to this appellant.

[12] Criticism is also made of the instruction tendering the issue to the jury of imminent peril and reading as follows: "In time of imminent danger, a person is not necessarily negligent because he fails to take every precaution or adopt every means of safety that a careful calculation subsequently shows he might have taken or adopted. Where, however, two courses are open to the imperiled party, he should not take voluntarily a chance of obvious danger when a safe course is open and apparent to him. You are further instructed that this doctrine of imminent peril does not apply to a party who by reason of his own negligence creates the sudden peril which confronts him." This instruction should not have been given. There was no evidence that either one of respondents was in a position of imminent peril excepting such as was created by their own fault. Knowledge of the escape of gas was had by both more than two hours before the explosion occurred. There was ample time during this period for both to deliberate upon the approaching danger and to take at least ordinary steps to escape from this danger. Imminent danger does not mean a danger which is known to be approaching over a long period of time, though the party may not know the precise time when injury might be expected. "The appearance of danger must have been so imminent as to leave no time for deliberation." Stanley v. Helm, 204 Mo. App. 159, 223 S. W. 125, 127. Both appellants argue that this instruction tended to lessen the effect of their evidence of contributory negligence. The respondents reply that they were confronted with two perils, the imminent danger of their house being undermined by the flow of water in the street, and the imminent danger of escaping gas within the house. But the flow of the water had caused the pavement in front of the house to drop at about 5:30 p. m., and, if there were any danger of the house being undermined and thus causing the injuries to the respondents, that danger was present for at least two hours prior to the time of the injury. The gas began to flow into the house at approximately the same time, 5:30 p. m., and was continually flowing at an increasing volume from that hour until 8 p. m., when the explosion occurred. Under such circumstances there was no question of imminent peril within any reasonable interpretation of that term as used in the decisions or as used generally. We are satisfied that this instruction injected a false issue into the case, and, as to our minds it is the only reasonable explanation of the jury's finding on the issue of contributory negligence of the respondents, it was, of course, an error which was prejudicial to both appellants.

Other points are raised in the brief of Olympic Salt Water Company which affect that appellant alone. It would unnecessarily lengthen this opinion to treat these points as, irrespective of anything said in this opinion except the treatment of the res ipsa loquitur doctrine, we are satisfied that the errors herein designated in relation to that issue alone demand a reversal of the judgments against both these appellants.

For the reasons given the judgments as to both appellants are reversed.

1. Homicide ⇐230.

In prosecution for assault with intent to murder, jury could consider defendant's declaration of intention and acts constituting assault in determining intention (Pen. Code, § 21).

2. Homicide ⇐230.

In prosecution for assault with intent to murder, defendant's surly disposition before assault constituted circumstance for jury in determining question of premeditation (Pen. Code, § 21).

The surly disposition of defendant prior to the assault was in such case a circumstance for the jury to consider in determining the question of deliberation and premeditation which is necessary to raise an assault with a deadly weapon to the crime of attempt to commit murder.

3. Homicide ⇐257(1).

Evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction of assault with intent to commit murder.

Zack Moody was convicted of assault with intent to commit murder, and he appeals.

Affirmed.

J. C. Webster, of Sonora, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

Mr. Justice PLUMMER delivered the opinion of the court.

The defendant was tried and convicted upon an information charging that on or about the 7th day of February, 1932, in the county of Tuolumne, state of California, he assaulted one Mrs. H. E. Rolfe with a deadly weapon, with intent to commit murder. From the judgment entered upon the verdict of guilty based upon the charge just referred to, the defendant appeals.

Only one question is presented for our consideration by the appellant's brief, to wit, whether the jury was justified in finding that the assault had coupled with it the intent to commit murder. The appellant admits that the court correctly instructed the jury.

The record shows that the defendant and Mrs. H. E. Rolfe both attended a ball which was given at the Harvard Hotel in the town of Tuolumne, on the evening of February 6, 1932. It further shows that prior to the date of the alleged assault the defendant and Mrs. Rolfe had been maintaining toward each other the relationship of husband and wife, without ever having in fact been married. While not expressly called to our attention in the record, the inference seems clear that the defendant and Mrs. Rolfe did not attend the ball together, but went there individually. During the evening of the ball, the defendant asked Mrs. Rolfe to dance with him; Mrs. Rolfe declined to do so, stating that she was not dancing that evening. From this time on the record shows that the defendant was in a surly mood, made many profane and vulgar remarks to her, and also about friends who apparently were in her company. Some time after 12 o'clock Mrs. Rolfe, accompanied by two of her friends, a husband and wife, went to her residence; the friends who accompanied Mrs. Rolfe remaining but a few minutes. After their departure Mrs. Rolfe made some preparations for retiring for the night, and at the time of the assault hereinafter mentioned was clad in her nightclothes covered by a kimono. Some time after 12 o'clock, and after Mrs. Rolfe had gone to her own home, the defendant repaired to the residence of Mrs. Rolfe and sought entrance. Whether on account of the ugly disposition which the defendant exhibited during the evening, or for some reason not completely disclosed by the record, Mrs. Rolfe did not wish the defendant to enter her apartments that night, and, seeking to drive him away, fired a pistol shot into the ceiling of the front room of her residence. It appears that there was a light left on the front porch which was explained as indicating that some member of Mrs. Rolfe's household was absent, the testimony showing that a daughter had gone to Sonora to attend the dance. The defendant, entering upon a front porch, sought entrance through a door which was partly frame and partly glass, and rapped thereon, demanding that it be opened. Mrs. Rolfe declined to do so, and fired the shot to which we have just referred. Immediately following this incident the defendant broke the glass part of the door and climbed through the opening thus made into the room where Mrs. Rolfe was standing. Then followed the assault of the defendant upon the person of Mrs. Rolfe. It appears that the defendant had a knife in one of his hands and began stabbing the person of Mrs. Rolfe, stating at the same time that he would cut her head off and roll it through the streets as a football.

The record shows that defendant stabbed Mrs. Rolfe in several places, once in the neck and once just over the left shoulder blade. This cut was about four inches long. Neither one of these cuts reached a vital spot. The defendant likewise inflicted several minor wounds on the person of Mrs. Rolfe.

It appears that Mrs. Rolfe, when the assault was made, grappled with the defendant and both of them fell to the floor. The cut in the back was about one inch deep. The lacerations, as testified to by one of the physicians, were in the neighborhood of the body where, had the knife blade pierced with sufficient depth, fatal results might have followed.

The testimony in the record shows that a considerable scuffle ensued between the defendant and Mrs. Rolfe, and that she finally escaped after receiving the wounds we have indicated.

The defendant's story of the affair was to the effect that two men were concealed in Mrs. Rolfe's room when he entered, and that they assaulted him. His story was of such a character, however, that no jury could accept it as being a correct version of the affair.

[1, 2] Section 21 of the Penal Code reads in part: "The intent or intention is manifested by the circumstances connected with the offense, and the sound mind and discretion of the accused." Here, we have an instance of the declaration of the intent of the accused, and also of the acts constituting the assault which the jury had a right to consider in determining whether the defendant did or did not intend to commit murder. The surly disposition displayed by the defendant prior to the actual assault constituted a circumstance proper for the consideration of the jury. The fact that the defendant did not commit murder was due only to the shortness of the knife blade. The jury had a right also to consider the disposition manifested by the defendant prior to the actual assault in determining the question of deliberation and premeditation which is necessary to raise an assault with a deadly weapon to the crime of attempt to commit murder. While these mental processes may follow each other in rapid succession, the circumstances disclosed by the testimony in this case indicate that a feeling of hostility existed for at least a few hours, and, as stated by counsel for the people, the fact that fate intervened and prevented the defendant from accomplishing his full purpose, does not tend to rebut the intent to commit murder and raise the offense from an assault with a deadly weapon to that of the higher degree of crime of which he was convicted.

[3] No other question being tendered for our consideration, it follows that the judgment of the trial court should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

Action by E. R. Gaderer against the Grossmont Union High School District of San Diego County and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals.

Thomas Whelan, Dist. Atty., Frank T. Dunn, Chief Deputy Dist. Atty., and Edgar I. Kendall and Edward W. Goodman, Deputy Dist. Attys., all of San Diego, for respondents.

V. N. THOMPSON, Justice pro tem.

This is an action brought by the appellant teacher against the respondents school board and the several members thereof, for the sum of $1,710.40, salary alleged to be due the teacher for the part of the school term from November 21, 1929, on which date the teacher was dismissed by the school board, to the end of the school year, or June, 1930.

A contract of employment of the teacher, as a probationary teacher for the full school year, is admitted by the respondents. Respondents deny any liability, because of the dismissal of the appellant teacher for cause, after a hearing by the school board of charges made against the teacher for unprofessional conduct and evident unfitness for service in violation of School Code, § 5.661, and affirmance of the action of the school board upon appeal to the county superintendent of schools.

For the purpose of brevity, the appellant will be referred to as the "teacher" and the respondents herein the "school board."

[1, 2] One or two observations in connection with the appeal may well be made before taking up the points urged by the appellant. One is that under the law the appeal of a teacher, who has been dismissed for cause by the school board and after review by the county superintendent of schools, is taken to the superior court of proper jurisdiction where the matters in issue are pleaded and tried de novo. School Code 1929, § 5.404. However, the original jurisdiction or primary authority for bringing and hearing charges against a teacher rests with the school board, and the bringing of such charges and the hearing and disposition of the same by the board are matters prerequisite to the commencement of an action in the superior court under the law, although the questions involved may be tried de novo in the superior court. As a matter of fact, the action of the school board in dismissing the teacher, whether right or wrong, is brought in issue through the action in the superior court and the review of the proceedings of the school board therein for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not the board was justified in taking whatever action it did.

The points relied upon by appellant in his specification of errors will be considered in the order in which they are urged: First. "The evidence is insufficient to show that appellant was guilty of any conduct that would warrant his dismissal by the defendants."

[3] There is nothing in the record which reveals definitely what testimony was taken or what facts were developed upon the hearing before the school board, except that the record shows that witnesses were sworn and testified in support of the charges which were then pending before the board; that appellant was present and represented by counsel at the hearing; that he did not testify, make any statement, or offer any evidence in his own behalf. With this situation it must be assumed that the proof which was produced before the school board, with the exception, of course, of the testimony of appellant himself, was such as to substantially establish the facts as they were proven upon the hearing in the trial court.

[4] In connection with the first charge as enumerated in the specification of charges made by or before the school board, "that on or about the 5th day of January, 1927, in this county and state, you were arrested and charged with violation of the Juvenile Court law," the only evidence which was produced before the trial court in support of this charge was the testimony of plaintiff himself upon examination under section 2055, Code of Civil Procedure, over the objection of plaintiff's counsel on the grounds that such evidence was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and not the best evidence. The objection was overruled by the court. Such evidence was subject to the first grounds of objection, and the objection should have been sustained because of the remoteness in time prior to the making of the charges before the school board. If the plaintiff and appellant did not testify before the school board, it must necessarily follow also that the board did not have before it evidence upon this charge at the time of the hearing.

If this were the only charge which was made or pending against appellant, his contention that "the trial court committed prejudicial error in admitting in evidence over appellant's objection testimony of appellant's arrest for violation of the Juvenile Court law," might be sufficient for reversal of the judgment. However, the sole question here is whether or not the school board, considering the evidence before it, and, as presented through the trial court upon this appeal, was justified in dismissing the appellant teacher and canceling the contract of employment at the time it did. In order that this question may be properly determined, it is necessary that consideration be given to all of the specifications or charges.

[5] The evidence upon the second charge "that on or about the 27th day of October, 1929, at the Hotel Olive in the city of San Diego, California, you were charged by one C. F. Postlewart with immoral conduct and chased from said hotel by said Postlewart armed with a knife, and hereby created a disturbance of the peace therein," is to some extent conflicting. The trial court has made its finding and judgment, based upon the evidence before it, sustaining the charges. The judgment should not be disturbed. It is true that the charge as laid before or by the school board is more or less recital and secondary or indirect in its verbiage. The charge is more fully stated in the second amended answer, however, and it is not shown that the substantial rights of the appellant teacher were at any time placed in jeopardy by reason of any insufficiency of the charge itself.

The third charge, "that these charges are generally known in the school district and as a result render you unfit for future service as a teacher in this district," is also amply supported by the evidence. The finding and judgment of the trial court in relation to the evidence upon this charge is correct.

The first part of appellant's second ground of appeal has already been disposed of. The last part of this ground, viz. "The trial court committed prejudicial error in admitting * * * testimony concerning rumors about appellant's conduct," is overcome by the evidence. The testimony of members of the school board and school principal indicates clearly that complaints of appellant's conduct toward and in the presence of pupils were made by parents of at least several of such pupils. Along with this testimony is some in the nature of hearsay, and statements of conclusions of the witnesses, in part admitted over objections of appellant's counsel. It appears that there is sufficient evidence of a direct nature, standing alone, to refute the last ground of appeal.

At the hearing before the school board, according to the record, objection was made by the attorney representing the teacher, plaintiff and appellant, that no written charges had been filed against the teacher and that the school board was biased or prejudiced against him to the extent that he was prevented from having a fair hearing. The record discloses that the teacher and his counsel were given an opportunity to submit evidence at such hearing and that they declined to do so. Apparently no point was attempted to be made of the teacher's objections in this respect before the trial court because of the fact that the matter was being tried de novo, and no point is made of it on appeal.

[6] The proceedings before the school board cannot be likened to a criminal proceeding, where generally the entire burden of proof rests upon the prosecution. The teacher must have known that the school board was the body empowered with original authority to act upon the charges and dismiss him from his employment, and that, if his actions and conduct were such that they could be explained before the board in a satisfactory manner, it was not only his right, but his duty, to do so.

There is no doubt from all the evidence that the school board was fully justified in taking the action which it did.

The judgment is affirmed.

Henry E. Greer, of San Rafael, for respondents.

PER CURIAM.

Appeal by the defendant from a decree adjudging plaintiffs to be the owners of the right and easement to take water for household and garden purposes from a well on defendant's land.

The parties own adjoining lots which, until June, 1904, were owned by one C. F. Turner, who erected upon each a dwelling house. Turner also sank a well upon the property now owned by defendant, which will be hereinafter referred to as the Lawton lot, and constructed thereon a windmill and tank. He then laid pipes therefrom to both houses for the purpose of furnishing water for garden and domestic use. The well was about five feet in diameter and twenty-five feet deep, with a three-inch bore extending downward from the bottom a further distance of eighteen feet. The tank had a capacity of about 1,000 gallons, and water was conveyed therefrom to the two properties by means of a three-quarter inch pipe. On June 11, 1904, Turner, who lived on the lot now owned by plaintiff Georgie E. Griffin, and which will be hereinafter referred to as the Griffin lot, conveyed the property to her, and she has since resided thereon. On June 13, 1904, Turner conveyed the Lawton lot to Daisy B. Lawton, who resided thereon until July 18, 1928, when she conveyed the same to defendant Parker. Water from the well, pumped by the windmill, continued to be used by the owners of the two lots until January, 1924, when the windmill was destroyed by a storm. Soon thereafter Mrs. Lawton installed in its place an electric motor and pump. According to Mrs. Griffin, she offered to contribute to the cost of installing the motor and pump, but Mrs. Lawton refused, and it was then agreed between them that Mrs. Griffin should furnish the oil and grease necessary and attend to its operation. When first installed it was attached to and operated through the Lawton electric meter, but later was attached to the Griffin meter. This arrangement continued until July, 1928, when the husband of defendant, Parker, acting for Mrs. Lawton, disconnected the pipe leading to the Griffin lot. Defendant and Mrs. Lawton were sisters, and the conveyance from the latter appears to have been executed a few days thereafter. About the time the pipe was disconnected, the three-inch bore at the bottom of the well became choked with sand. To remedy this, Mrs. Lawton caused the same to be blasted, but this did not remedy the defect. She thereupon increased the depth of the bore six and one-half feet, and its diameter about six inches. This required about three days' labor by two well borers, and it is clear from the evidence that the expense incurred was small. As a result the water supply was restored to the usual amount, and according to the testimony, there was on December 3, 1929, two days before the trial, about nine feet of water in the well.

Among other things, the trial court found that, when plaintiff purchased, she was told by Turner that the right to take the water as aforesaid passed with the conveyance, and that her use was at all times open and notorious, under claim of right, and with the full knowledge of the owner of the Lawton lot. A decree was entered adjudging plaintiff to be the owner of a right and easement appurtenant to her lot to take and convey water from the well through a three-quarter inch pipe, and enjoining defendant from preventing her and her employees from entering upon the Lawton lot for the purpose of maintaining the pipes with the tank and pump in good condition and repair and preserving her right to the water.

Defendant contends that the evidence was insufficient to justify the decision, and that the court erred by failing to find on all the issues.

Section 1104 of the Civil Code provides that a transfer of real property passes all easements attached thereto, and creates in favor thereof an easement to use other real property of the person whose estate is transferred in the same manner and to the same extent as such property was obviously and permanently used by the person whose estate is transferred for the benefit thereof at the time when the transfer was agreed upon or completed.

[1, 2] Defendant complains that the trial court made no finding which brings the case within the above section, but found instead that plaintiff's right was prescriptive. Nevertheless the undisputed facts are as stated above, namely, that, when Turner conveyed to plaintiff, the water arrangements were permanent in character and obviously in use for the benefit of both lots. Under such circumstances the Code rule applies, and the right passes with the conveyance. Cave v. Crafts, 53 Cal. 135; Cheda v. Bodkin, 173 Cal. 7, 158 P. 1025; Silveira v. Smith, 198 Cal. 510, 246 P. 58. Where a finding would necessarily have been adverse to a party, he cannot complain. 24 Cal. Jur., Trial, § 188, p. 944.

It is claimed that plaintiff's right ceased with the diminution of the water supply, and was not revived when an increased supply was developed by deepening the well.

[3, 4] The owner of an easement cannot enlarge the burdens upon the servient estate (Civ. Code, § 806), but a mere nonuser of an easement created by grant will not work an extinguishment (9 R. C. L. "Easements," § 66, p. 810); and, if the right is merely suspended it may be revived (19 Cor. Jur. "Easements," p. 958; Keller v. Oakland, 54 Cal. App. 169, 201 P. 618). Here the nonuser was due to the fact that the well became choked with sand; and, while neither the defendant nor her predecessor in interest was bound to clean out the well or deepen it, yet, having done so, and having increased the supply to its former flow, the easement itself was restored and revived. Hottell v. Farmers' Protective Ass'n, 25 Colo. 67, 53 P. 327, 71 Am. St. Rep. 109; Schneider v. Cross, 80 Colo. 26, 249 P. 643.

The cases of Cohen v. Adolph Kutner Co., 177 Cal. 592, 171 P. 424, L. R. A. 1918D, 410, and Muzio v. Erickson, 41 Cal. App. 413, 182 P. 974, cited by defendant, have no application here.

It is claimed that the decision erroneously failed to restrict plaintiff's right in the new supply to the amount previously used; but, as stated, the decree limits the amount to the carrying capacity of a three-quarter inch pipe; and, for aught that appears, the same tank at the same elevation continues to be used with no increase in pressure.

[5] It is also urged that there was a failure to find on a material issue, namely, the claim that the present water supply was from a new source. This, in view of the foregoing, is not material; and, if the findings made are of such a character as to dispose of issues which are sufficient to uphold a judgment, a failure to find upon others does not constitute prejudicial error. Pyle Co. v. Fossler, 200 Cal. 204, 209, 252 P. 599; Colver v. W. B. Scarborough Co., 73 Cal. App. 441, 455, 238 P. 1104.

Lastly defendant complains that under the decision she will be required to act and incur expense in supplying plaintiff with water; but we find nothing in the decree requiring her to do more than refrain from interfering with plaintiff's proper use of the motor and pump. All the equities of the case are with the plaintiff, and we find nothing in the record which would justify a reversal of the judgment.

The judgment is affirmed.

TORNQUIST v. JOHNSON et al.

Civ. 911.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

July 6, 1932.

1. Judgment ⇐944.

In action on foreign judgment, recitals of judgment held sufficient to show jurisdiction of court over persons of defendants.

Foreign judgment recited in substance that parties came by counsel into open court, and case was submitted for trial, and, after hearing evidence adduced, court found for plaintiff, and found allegations of plaintiff's complaint were true, and that there was due plaintiff from defendants on account sued on sum specified, together with costs of cause, and judgment was then ordered for plaintiff against defendants for sum specified.

2. Evidence ⇐35.

In action on foreign judgment, court would take judicial notice that, under laws of state wherein judgment was rendered, circuit court rendering judgment was one of general jurisdiction (Code Civ. Proc. § 1875).

3. Judgment ⇐942.

In action on foreign judgment, it would be presumed that court rendering judgment had jurisdiction of subject-matter.

4. Judgment ⇐943.

Where judgment for money rendered by court of general jurisdiction of sister state shows jurisdiction over defendant on its face, it is admissible in action in state based on judgment, though unaccompanied by copy of complaint.

5. Attorney and client ⇐70.

Presumption is that attorney making appearance for party was authorized to do so.

6. Evidence ⇐588.

Court may reject the most positive testimony.

7. Appeal and error ⇐1012(1).

In action on foreign judgment, weight of defendant's testimony that he was not served with summons in original action, where record evidence showed he was served, held for trial court.

8. Judgment ⇐944.

In action on foreign judgment, evidence warranted trial court's finding that defendant was served with summons in original action (Code Civ. Proc. § 1833).

9. Judgment ⇐934(1).

Statute of limitations did not begin to run against action on foreign judgment until judgment became final after expiration of time for appeal (Code Civ. Proc. § 336, subd. 1).

10. Judgment ⇐839.

Statutory provisions of state in which judgment sued on was rendered concerning assignment of judgments did not prevent making assignment in usual form (Burns' Ann. St. Ind. 1926, § 654).

11. Judgment ⇐928.

Question of who are necessary parties to action begun in state on foreign judgment is determined by laws of state.

12. Assignments ⇐121.

Action may be maintained by assignee of equitable assignment without joining assignor as party; assignee being real party in interest.

Action by Amy Tornquist against Halleck F. Johnson and another. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant named appeals.

HARDEN, Justice pro tem.

Suit on foreign judgment for money.

On October 20, 1923, O. W. Richardson & Co., a corporation, procured a judgment against defendants Halleck F. Johnson and Ralph E. Johnson, in the Marshall county circuit court, comprising the Forty-First judicial circuit (since changed to the Seventy-Second judicial circuit) of the state of Indiana, in the sum of $579.39, together with interest thereon at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum until paid. Plaintiff filed this action as assignee of said O. W. Richardson & Co., a corporation, against said defendants on said judgment, with the result that judgment was rendered herein in favor of plaintiff and against defendant Halleck F. Johnson for the sum of $795.65. The defendant Ralph E. Johnson was not served with process herein; nor did he make any appearance. From the judgment said Halleck F. Johnson has appealed.

Copies of the record of the Indiana court, viz. judgment, summons together with sheriff's certificate of service thereof upon defendants, and answer to complaint denying the averments thereof and purporting to have been filed in behalf of defendants, were received in evidence over the objection of appellant. All of said records were authenticated in accordance with the requirements of our section 1906, Code of Civil Procedure, and the act of Congress (see 28 USCA § 687).

The objection, as applicable to the judgment, is renewed here, and it is contended that said judgment was not admissible, for the reason that it was not accompanied by all of the records constituting the judgment roll. Particularly it is urged that said judgment was not admissible because it was not accompanied by a copy of the complaint in the action. The Indiana judgment recites: "Come now the parties by counsel into open court. This cause is now submitted to the court for trial and after hearing the evidence adduced the court finds for plaintiff and finds the allegations of plaintiff's complaint are true, and that there is due plaintiff from defendants on the account sued on the sum of $569.49, * * * together with costs of this cause herein taxed at $9.90."

[1-3] Judgment is then ordered for plaintiff against defendants in said action for $579.39. Said recitals are sufficient to show jurisdiction of the court over the persons of the defendants therein; and the court will take judicial notice that under the laws of the state of Indiana the circuit court which rendered the judgment is one of general jurisdiction (section 1875, Code Civ. Proc.); and it will be presumed that said court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action (15 Cor. Jur. 827, § 146, citing many cases).

In support of his contention, appellant cites and relies upon the cases of Young v. Rosenbaum, 39 Cal. 646; Mason v. Wolff, 40 Cal. 249; Harper v. Rowe, 53 Cal. 233; and Wickersham v. Johnston, 104 Cal. 407, 38 P. 89, 43 Am. St. Rep. 118. Said line of cases is distinguishable from our case; and the distinction has been pointed out by Commissioner Britt in Simmons v. Threshour, 118 Cal. 100, 50 P. 312, 313, in the following language: "We are not unmindful of the decision in Wickersham v. Johnston, 104 Cal. 407, 38 P. 89 [43 Am. St. Rep. 118], and the previous cases there followed [citing the other three cases herein relied on by appellant]; nor do we now impugn the principle on which they proceed, viz. that to render a judgment admissible in evidence it must be shown to be a valid judgment, and that the appropriate method of doing this is to produce the roll, so that it may be seen whether the court had jurisdiction to determine the cause. But in none of those cases does it appear that facts showing that the court had jurisdiction were recited in the judgment itself. Since such recitals are evidence of their own truth, as numerous decisions of this court establish, they necessarily (when consistent with other parts of the judgment) supply the absence of the technical roll to the extent of rendering the judgment at least prima facie competent as evidence."

We think the rule applicable is that mentioned in said quotation and applied in the later cases of Uplinger v. Yonkin, 47 Cal. App. 435, 190 P. 822, 823, and Cummings v. Cummings, 97 Cal. App. 144, 275 P. 245. In the first of said last-mentioned cases the appellant raised the same point as is raised here. In disposing of it the court said: "First point: That the Illinois judgment has not been proved as required by law, in this, that an authenticated copy of the judgment alone was received in evidence without the judgment roll. This question has been determined adversely to appellant's contention in McHatton v. Rhodes, 143 Cal. 275, 76 P. 1036, 101 Am. St. Rep. 125. An issue presented in that case depended upon the validity of a judgment of a circuit court, a court of general jurisdiction in the state of Missouri. An authenticated copy of the Missouri judgment was admitted in evidence without the judgment roll. The judgment of the superior court was affirmed, notwithstanding that the decision therein contained was clearly wrong unless supported by the evidence of the foreign judgment."

Each of the cases of Uplinger v. Yonkin, supra, and Cummings v. Cummings, supra, was an action upon a money judgment procured in a sister state; and in each case the judgment sued upon showed jurisdiction over the defendant upon its face; and the last-mentioned case justifies the introduction of the judgment on that ground.

[4] We hold that, where a judgment for money rendered by a court of general jurisdiction of a sister state shows jurisdiction over the defendant upon its face, it is admissible in evidence in an action in this state based upon said judgment, though unaccompanied by a copy of the complaint; and that the judgment in question was properly received in evidence.

[5-8] Connected somewhat with the appellant's first point is his further contention that the trial court should have determined as a fact that the Indiana court did not have jurisdiction over the person of appellant. Appellant testified that he was not served with summons in said Indiana action, and that he did not authorize counsel who filed the answer for him and his codefendant to do so. He admitted, however, that he was living at Plymouth (Marshall county), Ind., on December 18, 1922, the date when, as shown by the sheriff's return, he was served with summons, but was uncertain as to whether he was in town on that particular day; and he also admitted that he was acquainted with the deputy sheriff who made return of service and with the attorney who filed the answer and who appeared at the trial. His testimony was indefinite in respect to his alleged indebtedness. In reply to the question: "Did your firm ever owe O. W. Richardson & Company anything?" he replied: "Not to my knowledge. I don't know. I didn't take care of that end of the business." The presumption that an attorney who has made an appearance for a party was authorized to do so is firmly established. 6 Cor. Jur. 631, citing many cases. Many California cases so hold. The record evidence, if considered alone, was prima facie sufficient to justify the findings and judgment of the trial court in favor of plaintiff. Appellant complains because the court did not act upon his testimony denying service of summons upon him and denying the authority of counsel to appear for him. A court may reject the most positive testimony. People v. Knutte, 111 Cal. 453, 44 P. 166. The testimony of appellant did no more than contradict the record evidence, supported as that evidence was by all the presumptions attending it. It was peculiarly within the province of the trial court to weigh and consider such testimony. We cannot hold as a matter of law that the prima facie effect of the record evidence was contradicted and overcome by the testimony of appellant. Section 1833, Code Civ. Proc.; Miller & Lux, Inc., a corp., v. Secara, 193 Cal. 755, 227 P. 171. On the contrary, we hold that the trial court was amply warranted in disregarding the testimony of appellant and deciding in accordance with the effect of the record evidence.

[9] It is also contended that the cause of action sued upon is barred by the provisions of section 336, subdivision 1, Code of Civil Procedure, to the effect that an action upon a judgment must be commenced within five years. It is admitted that under the Indiana statute an appeal may be taken at any time within 180 days from the time judgment is rendered. The time within which an appeal could have been taken from said judgment therefore did not expire until April 17, 1924. The record does not disclose that any appeal was taken. Said judgment did not become final until the time within which an appeal might have been taken therefrom expired; and the statute of limitations did not begin to run against the cause of action until the judgment became final.

"An action will not lie upon a judgment until it has become final. Until that time has arrived, no cause of action upon the judgment has accrued. Hills v. Sherwood, 33 Cal. 474, 479. * * * In Harris v. Barnhart, 97 Cal. 546, 32 P. 589, it is said: 'Until the time for an appeal has expired, if the judgment has not been sooner satisfied, the action is, under section 1049 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to be deemed as pending.' To like effect are Naftzger v. Gregg, 99 Cal. 83, 33 P. 757, 37 Am. St. Rep. 23, and In re Blythe's Estate, 99 Cal. 472, 34 P. 108, in which latter case it is held 'that a judgment, in order to be admissible in evidence for the purpose of proving facts therein recited, must be a final judgment in the cause, and, if the action in which the judgment is rendered is still pending, necessarily the judgment is not final.' * * * The construction contended for by respondent would, as has been said, be an absolute reversal of, and exception to, this general salutary rule. Far more in harmony with the spirit of our law and with our adjudications upon this subject is the interpretation which holds that the statute begins to run only when the right of action has accrued, and this, as has been said and shown, is after final determination on appeal, in the event that an appeal has been taken, or after passage of the time in which an appeal might be taken in the event that none has been." Feeney v. Hinckley, 134 Cal. 467, 468, 66 P. 580, 86 Am. St. Rep. 290.

The present action having been commenced by the filing of the complaint on March 20, 1929, it was begun within the period of five years after the statute of limitations began to run, and was not barred by the provisions of that statute.

[10-12] The remaining point raised is that the assignment of the judgment to plaintiff was invalid for the reason that it did not comply with the requirements of the Indiana statute covering the assignment of judgments. Said statute provides as follows: "Judgments and decrees of a court of record for the recovery of money, and judgments obtained before a justice of the peace, may be assigned by the plaintiff or complainant, and the assignees thereof successively, on or attached to the entry of such judgment or decree; and the assignment, when attested by the clerk of the court or such justice of the peace, shall vest the title to such judgment or decree in each assignee thereof successively." Section 654, Burns' Ann. Ind. Stat. 1926.

The assignment herein was made by a separate instrument, and is not attested by the clerk of the court. Such assignment is in the usual form, and no claim of insufficiency is advanced except a noncompliance with the requirements of said Indiana statute.

The general rule in respect to such statutory provisions concerning the assignment of judgments is that they merely provide a cumulative method by which assignment may be accomplished. Thus it is stated in 34 Corpus Juris, p. 640, § 985: "Where the statute authorizing the assignment of a judgment provides a mode of assignment, its requirements must be followed in order to pass the legal title and secure to the assignee any rights which depend solely on the statute. But where such a statute does not expressly exclude other modes, it is regarded as cumulative merely, and does not prevent the making of an assignment in any other way which is recognized as sufficient in equity."

Notwithstanding the provisions of said Indiana statutes, the courts of that state recognize that assignments made not in pursuance thereof are valid as equitable assignments, and authorize suit thereon in the name of the assignee. Chicago & S. E. Ry. v. Higgins, 150 Ind. 329, 50 N. E. 32; Snell v. Maddux, 20 Ind. App. 169, 49 N. E. 856. Appellant acknowledges that the Indiana courts so hold, but contends that, where an assignment is good only as an equitable assignment, the decisions of said state require that the assignor be joined as a party to an action in a suit thereon. The question of who are necessary parties to an action begun in this state is to be determined by the laws of this state. Under our practice, it is well established that an action may be maintained by the assignee of an equitable assignment without joining the assignor as a party. Such assignee is the real party in interest. 3 Cal. Jur. 297, § 43; Heisen v. Smith, 138 Cal. 216, 71 P. 180, 94 Am. St. Rep. 39; Puterbaugh v. McCray, 25 Cal. App. 469, 144 P. 149.

PER CURIAM.

Petitioner seeks by this application to be reinstated to practice as an attorney at law, notwithstanding the denial to him of the favorable recommendation of the board of bar governors of the state of California. On February 24, 1925, petitioner was disbarred from the further practice of law by a judgment of the superior court of the county of San Joaquin. Said judgment was based upon three counts: "That the defendant, Leland S. Kepler, has committed acts involving moral turpitude and dishonesty, (1) In assuming a position adverse to the interest of his client, C. E. Jubb, (2) In claiming a transfer in good faith of a promissory note to R. H. Kepler, knowing the same to be not in good faith, and that the said R. H. Kepler was not the owner and holder thereof in due course, and (3) By deceiving an attorney and officer of the court and thereby depriving the said attorney and his clients of a prop-

Supreme Court of California.

1. Attorney and client ⇐61.

Court's sole object on disbarred attorney's application for reinstatement is to deer and legal defense to the note above set forth." No appeal was taken from said judgment. Thereafter petitioner removed to Orange county, and in the next year filed a petition for reinstatement with the District Court of Appeal for the Second District, Division 2, which was denied by said court for the reason stated in the opinion that said application contained a statement which was not true. In re Kepler, 79 Cal. App. 639, 250 P. 701. Subsequent to his disbarment, petitioner appeared as assignee of accounts for collection under the belief that the decision in the case of O'Connell v. Judnich, 71 Cal. App. 386, 235 P. 664, authorized him to so appear. In the case of Koepple v. Morrison, 84 Cal. App. 137, 257 P. 590, which he asserts was appealed for the sole purpose of determining whether or not he was entitled to appear in such actions, the right to appear was denied, and, since the date of said decision, according to his petition, he has absolutely refrained from the practice of law. It appears that the wife of petitioner, R. H. Kepler, is the sole owner of the Koepple's Collection Agency of Santa Ana, Cal., and petitioner has worked in her office as an investigator at a stated salary, and in addition has been managing a ranch near Santa Ana owned by himself and wife. On December 3, 1930, the present petition was filed with the State Bar of California. The petition was referred by the board of governors to a committee to investigate and report on the fitness of the applicant for reinstatement. Hearings were held by said committee, at which hearings several witnesses appeared and testified in behalf of petitioner. Letters of recommendation from some ten persons were also filed with said committee. Thereafter, in a written report filed on June 9, 1931, the committee recommended to the board of bar governors that petitioner be admitted to practice. The board of bar governors, however, at its meeting on August 22, 1931, refused to accept the recommendation of the committee, and denied petitioner's application for reinstatement. Petitioner thereafter sought a writ of review in this court. In denying petitioner's application, said board, after setting forth the facts of petitioner's original disbarment and the denial of his application for reinstatement by the District Court of Appeal in 1926, made the following finding with reference to the issue of petitioner's rehabilitation, which is the sole issue presented here: "That the evidence introduced before the committee appointed to hear the evidence herein is insufficient to warrant the reinstatement of the petitioner, Leland S. Kepler; that the said Leland S. Kepler has not produced sufficient proof to prove that his conduct since his disbarment has been such as to inspire confidence in his character, honor and integrity, and to warrant his reinstatement, or to inspire belief and opinion that he can be safely admitted to practice again and entrusted with the affairs of his clients."

[1-4] After a careful consideration of the record presented, we are of the opinion that this finding of the board of bar governors is correct, and we therefore concur in the conclusion of the said board of bar governors, based upon this finding, that the application for reinstatement should be denied. The sole object of the court, upon an application by an attorney previously disbarred for reinstatement to practice, is to determine whether or not the character of the applicant is such that he should be admitted to an office of trust, and recommended to the public as a trustworthy person, fit to be consulted by others in matters of confidence. In re Mash, 39 Cal. App. 548, 551, 179 P. 897. In such proceeding the burden of proof is upon the one who seeks, after disbarment, to accomplish a restoration to the ranks of the legal profession, and, before the court may grant the petition for reinstatement, it must be satisfied and fully convinced by positive evidence that the effort he has made toward rehabilitation of his character has been successful. In re Cate, 77 Cal. App. 495, 247 P. 231; In re Nisbet, 77 Cal. App. 260, 262, 246 P. 120. It is only reasonable that the person seeking reinstatement, after disbarment, should be required to present stronger proof of his present honesty and integrity than one seeking admission for the first time whose character has never been in question. In other words, in an application for reinstatement, although treated by the court as a proceeding for admission, the proof presented must be sufficient to overcome the court's former adverse judgment of applicant's character. In re Cate, 60 Cal. App. 279, 285, 212 P. 694. An examination of the record shows that, of the nine witnesses called to testify with reference to the rehabilitation of petitioner, one was his wife, two were closely related by marriage, being brothers of his wife, one was an attorney at the time employed by his wife as attorney for her collection business, another was an attorney who had formerly been employed by his wife as attorney for her collection business, and another was the constable of Orange county who served papers for the collection agency. In addition to the testimony of these witnesses, petitioner filed with the committee ten letters. One or two of the letters were rather lukewarm, as, for instance, that of the manager of the Santa Ana Branch of the Security-First National Bank of Los Angeles, who merely states that "we know nothing derogatory of his character." On the whole, however, the letters were quite laudatory and express a confidence in petitioner's honesty and integrity. Giving to these letters all the weight to which they are entitled, they do not, for the reasons stated, entirely satisfy us that petitioner has sufficiently rehabilitated himself to warrant his return to the practice of law in this state.

[5] There is another feature of this matter which we think had a material bearing upon the decision of the board of bar governors denying to petitioner its approval of his petition for reinstatement. Petitioner's first application for reinstatement was denied by the District Court of Appeal for the reason that in his said application he had stated that a judgment for $650, which judgment was secured by the judgment creditor as a result of the acts of petitioner which subsequently led to his disbarment, had been fully paid and satisfied, whereas in fact said judgment had been compromised for $500, which compromise had been induced by the threats of petitioner to go into bankruptcy. It was the conclusion of the District Court of Appeal that, by virtue of the incorporation of this false statement in the said application, petitioner had demonstrated that he had not the moral qualifications entitling him to reinstatement. In this connection it appears in the present proceeding that the District Court of Appeal stated at the time said hearing was before it that an offer on the part of petitioner to pay the balance due on said judgment, after applying thereto said sum of $500, would place petitioner in a much more favorable position before the court than he then was with this amount still unpaid. Petitioner very properly drew from this remark of the court the deduction that there was, at least in the opinion of that court, justly due from him the balance unpaid on said judgment. The opinion of the District Court of Appeal was rendered in November, 1926. Petitioner made no effort to pay this debt justly due from him, although the evidence shows that he has at all times had ample funds with which he could conveniently discharge it, until November 12, 1930, immediately prior to the commencement of this proceeding. He then, instead of paying the same to the parties entitled thereto, sent a check, covering the amount due, to the board of bar governors of the State Bar, with the request that said board determine the person or persons entitled to the money represented by said check and for said board to then pay the same to said person or persons. The board of governors very properly returned the check, stating that said board had no jurisdiction to act as an arbiter in such matters. No effort so far as the record shows has since been made by petitioner to pay the balance on said judgment, and the same still remains unpaid. The conduct of petitioner in respect to this matter fails to show that he has yet manifested any correct appreciation of his obligations to those whom he has wronged in the past. If he were ever in doubt as to whether he should make this restitution, the warning of the District Court of Appeal should have been sufficient to dispel such doubt. Yet he waited over four years before acting in the matter, and then, just before he planned to file a second application for reinstatement, forwarded his check for the unpaid balance of said judgment to the board of bar governors. This may have shown some slight intention of righting the wrong he had committed, but it was of short duration and entirely ineffective, for, when informed by the board of bar governors that he had not pursued the right course, he evidently dropped the matter, with the result that the obligation incurred by him in a transaction which loomed large in his disbarment proceeding still remains unpaid. The delay of petitioner in the first place, followed by his failure to carry into final effect his attempt to make restitution, no doubt created a poor impression of petitioner's sincerity in the minds of the board of bar governors. With this impression we agree.

In this state of the record we cannot say that we are fully persuaded and thoroughly convinced that petitioner is entitled to reinstatement. We do not wish to be understood as saying that there has not been a marked improvement in petitioner's conduct and in his conception of the duties and obligations of a member of the legal profession since his disbarment. We do say, however, that the showing made by petitioner fails to convince us that he is qualified at this time to be reinstated as a member of the bar of this state, and that the proof proffered falls short of conveying that certainty to our minds which we deem necessary in applications of this character.

BENTSON v. STATE BAR OF CALIFORNIA.

L. A. 13040.

Supreme Court of California.

July 22, 1932.

1. Attorney and client ⊂⇒57.

On application to review bar governors' recommendation that attorney be disbarred, court will pass on weight of evidence.

2. Attorney and client ⊂⇒58.

Attorney's retention of amount paid him as executor's attorney on price of realty belonging to estate held not to warrant disbarment, but only suspension for one year, in view of mitigating circumstances.

The attorney claimed that he paid money to executor, denied that he assured purchasers that he would return money, and testified that memoranda, acknowledging his obligation and promising to return money within few days, were given by his attorney without authorization or knowledge that amount was due.

In Bank.

Application by Victor L. Bentson to review a recommendation of the Board of Governors of the State Bar of California that petitioner be disbarred from the practice of law.

Petitioner suspended for one year. Superseding opinion in 9 P.(2d) 829.

Charles A. Sunderlin, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Philbrick McCoy and Lucian J. Clarke, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

In proceedings instituted by a local administrative committee of the State Bar, this petitioner was charged, first, in connection with his employment as attorney for the executor of an estate, with failure to obey an order of the superior court directing repayment of moneys found by a referee to be owing by him to the estate; and, second, with converting to his own use the sum of $450 paid to him to be applied on the purchase price of certain real property which one Jorgensen proposed to purchase from said estate.

As to the first charge, it appears that the referee found an indebtedness owing by petitioner to the estate in the sum of $2,944.80. The referee's report was confirmed by order of court, from which petitioner appealed. The appeal was later dismissed by stipulation, but petitioner at the hearing before the committee contended that it was incorrect and that he proposed to take further steps to have it modified. Moreover, petitioner filed a surety bond at the time of the controversy, to protect the estate, and the estate suffered no injury. The committee concluded from all of these facts that there was not sufficient evidence to justify a finding adverse to petitioner on this charge.

The second charge is that petitioner, while acting as attorney for the executor, improperly withheld the sum of $450 admittedly paid him by a Mr. Jorgensen and a Mr. Smith as a deposit on the purchase of certain real property belonging to the estate. Petitioner claimed that he paid the money over to the executor; the executor denied it. Jorgensen and Smith, learning that the purchase could not be completed, made repeated demands for their money, and testified that petitioner repeatedly assured them that he would return it. Petitioner denied this. Two documents were produced, written by petitioner's attorney, Mr. Milham, which acknowledged petitioner's obligation and promised to return the $450 within a few days. Petitioner testified that Mr. Milham gave these memoranda without authorization so to do, and without knowledge that the amount was actually due. The committee was of the opinion that it was strange that any attorney would make and deliver such documents without the express authority of his client, or that he could have learned the facts set forth therein without having previously discussed the matter with his client. The committee also took note of the fact that Mr. Milham continued to act as attorney for petitioner even after petitioner learned of the existence of said instruments. On this second charge, the committee found petitioner guilty of conduct involving moral turpitude, and recommended his disbarment. The board of governors, after a further hearing, adopted the findings of the committee and made a like recommendation.

[1, 2] In a case of this character we will, of course, pass upon the weight of the evidence, not being bound by the findings or recommendation. Fish v. State Bar (Cal. Sup.) 4 P.(2d) 937. The record here is voluminous, and cannot be fully reviewed here. We have studied it with great care, and, while we are unable to agree that petitioner's conduct was wholly ethical and justifiable, we are nevertheless of the opinion that it does not warrant the severe punishment meted out to him. His explanations, while unsatisfactory as a defense to the accusations, show certain mitigating circumstances. We are therefore of the opinion that the proper punishment would be suspension of the petitioner for a period of one year.

It is ordered that the petitioner, Victor L. Bentson, be, and he is hereby, suspended from the practice of law in this state for a period of one year.

DELANOY v. DELANOY.

S. F. 14019.

Supreme Court of California.

July 20, 1932.

1. Husband and wife ⇐262(1).

Without evidence of contrary intent, when title to property purchased with community funds is taken in name of spouses as joint tenants, community interest must be deemed severed by consent.

2. Husband and wife ⇐14(10).

Husband had power to convey, without wife's consent, his separate estate in property purchased with community funds and taken in joint names of spouses.

3. Husband and wife ⇐14(10).

On husband's conveyance of his share of joint property, joint tenancy with wife terminated, and grantee became tenant in common with wife.

4. Husband and wife ⇐14(6).

Joint tenancy deed between husband and wife does not create estate by entirety; no such estate being recognized in this state.

7. Appeal and error ⇐1071(6).

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; E. C. Robinson, Judge.

Action by Mrs. M. F. H. Delanoy against Theresa Louise Delanoy. From an adverse judgment, defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

W. L. Albert, of Oakland (J. H. McKnight, of Oakland, of counsel), for appellant.

Calkins, Hagar, Hall & Linforth, of Oakland, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

Defendant appeals from a judgment determining that she and plaintiff are each the owners of an undivided one-half interest in certain real property as tenants in common, and decreeing that the property be sold and the proceeds divided as determined in the judgment. The appeal is taken on the judgment roll alone.

The original complaint was filed in September, 1928. So far as pertinent here, this complaint alleged that prior to February 11, 1928, Frederick William Delanoy and defendant owned the real property involved herein as joint tenants; that on that date Frederick conveyed his interest in the property to his mother, plaintiff herein; that thereupon the plaintiff and defendant became owners of the property as tenants in common. Plaintiff prayed that the property be sold and the proceeds divided between the parties as their interests appeared. Defendant answered this complaint and alleged that Frederick conveyed his interest in the property to his mother by way of gift; that Frederick's interest in the property was the community property of Frederick and defendant; that the deed to plaintiff was voidable at the option of defendant, for the reason that she (the wife of Frederick) did not join therein. Defendant likewise alleged that prior to the date of the conveyance she had secured a judgment against Frederick, and that such judgment was a lien on Frederick's interest in the property. Defendant prayed that, if the property be sold, she be paid the amount of this judgment. Defendant likewise filed a cross-complaint in which it was alleged that since 1923 Frederick and the defendant owned the property as tenants in common; that the deed by which the property was conveyed to Frederick and defendant "creates an estate by the entirety"; that Frederick's interest in the property conveyed to his mother was community property; that plaintiff and Frederick conspired to defraud defendant of her interest in the community property. By her cross-complaint, defendant prayed that the deed to the plaintiff be canceled. No mention was made in the cross-complaint of the alleged judgment lien set forth in the answer. Plaintiff failed to answer the cross-complaint, and her default was entered in November, 1928. In January, 1930, the plaintiff filed an amended complaint, and later a supplemental amended complaint, in which the allegations of the original complaint are substantially realleged, and in addition it is alleged that defendant herein has collected the entire rentals from the premises since February 11, 1928, and plaintiff requests that she be reimbursed to the extent of one-half out of the proceeds from the sale of the premises. The defendant duly answered these amended pleadings.

After a trial on the merits, the trial court found that the property was purchased by defendant and Frederick in 1923 with community funds; that on February 11, 1928, Frederick and the defendant owned the property "as joint tenants and not as tenants in common"; that on February 11, 1928, Frederick conveyed to the plaintiff his interest in the property by way of gift; that plaintiff and defendant were the owners, respectively, of an undivided one-half interest in the property as tenants in common. The court determined that the property was incapable of physical partition, and ordered the premises sold and the proceeds divided as set forth in the judgment.

[1-4] On this appeal it is urged that, inasmuch as the property was purchased with community funds, the interest of the husband therein was community property. Defendant contends that, since the property was so purchased, and the deed taken in the name of husband and wife as joint tenants, she owned her interest therein as her separate property, and her husband's interest was community property. This court has recently determined that, in the absence of any evidence of an intent to the contrary, when property is purchased with community funds and the title is taken in the name of the husband and wife as joint tenants, the community interest must be deemed severed by consent, and the interest of each spouse therein is separate property. Siberell v. Siberell (Cal. Sup.) 7 P.(2d) 1003. That case is determinative of this issue on the present appeal. It therefore follows, of course, that Frederick had the power to convey his separate estate by way of gift or otherwise without the approval or consent of his wife. It also follows that upon such conveyance the joint tenancy was terminated and the plaintiff and defendant became tenants in common, each the owner of an undivided one-half interest in the property. The contention that a joint tenancy deed between husband and wife creates an estate by entirety is without merit; no such estate being recognized in this state. Swan v. Walden, 156 Cal. 195, 103 P. 931, 134 Am. St. Rep. 118, 20 Ann. Cas. 194.

[5-7] Appellant also contends that the trial court committed error in that it failed to make any finding in reference to the judgment lien which appellant in her answer alleged existed in her favor against the interest of Frederick in the property. The allegations of the answer were, of course, deemed denied. Section 761 of the Code of Civil Procedure requires, in an action for partition, that, when "it appears to the court" that there are liens against the property, the rights of the lienholders must be protected. Appellant contends that failure to find on this issue constitutes reversible error. This contention is without merit. As already pointed out, this appeal is on the judgment roll alone. None of the evidence produced in the trial court is before us. It is elementary that it is incumbent upon the appellant to show error by the record on appeal. Every presumption is in favor of the correctness of the rulings and decision of the trial court. When an appeal is perfected on the judgment roll alone, we must assume that all of the findings of the lower court are amply sustained by the evidence. Even though it appears that the trial court failed to find on an issue raised by the pleadings, error cannot be predicated on such failure in the absence of a record showing that evidence was introduced on such issue sufficient to sustain a finding on behalf of appellant. 2 Cal. Jur. 525, § 262. In order to warrant the reversal of a judgment for failure to find on an issue, it must be shown by the record on appeal that evidence sufficient to sustain a finding for the complaining party was introduced. 24 Cal. Jur. 947, § 189. No such record has been presented. We must assume, therefore, that, had a finding been made on the issue, it would have been adverse to appellant.

[8] The taking of the default by appellant on her cross-complaint in no way affects the validity of the judgment rendered after a trial on the merits. The record in no way shows that appellant objected to the trial, and, in the absence of a record to the contrary, we must assume in support of the judgment that defendant waived the default.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Myron Westover, Judge.

Action by W. C. Barnett against Lee Reynolds and Helen Reynolds, husband and wife. From order setting aside defendants' default, vacating judgment, and quashing the alleged service of summons upon defendants, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Mose Katzev, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Earl D. Killion, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

TAPPAAN, Justice pro tem.

This is an appeal from an order setting aside defendants' default, vacating the judgment thereon, and quashing the alleged service of summons upon defendants. The question presented here involves the alleged service upon defendant of an amended complaint. The default of defendants was duly entered on July 8, 1929, and judgment thereon entered upon July 9, 1929. An affidavit purporting to show due and regular personal service of the summons and complaint appears in the record. On February 2, 1930, defendants served their notice to set aside the default theretofore entered and to vacate the judgment. This motion came on regularly to be heard on February 13, 1930, and was granted by the court. From this order the appeal is taken.

Appellant questions the jurisdiction of the court to grant the order, contending that a period of more than six months had elapsed since the entry of the judgment, and further objects that respondents upon said motion failed to comply with section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, in that no copy of their proposed pleading was filed. At the hearing had upon this motion, defendants filed affidavits in which they denied that they or either of them had ever been served with process in the action, or that they had had any notice of its pendency, and further deny that the plaintiff had any claim whatsoever as against them. Plaintiff's attorney filed, at this hearing, an affidavit in which it was recited "the above named plaintiff informs me that he does not know the man by the name of D. M. Tierney, who has made the return of service in said action; that my said client is seeking to find said service man and ascertain the truth or untruth of the statements made by defendants in their affidavits. * * *"

[1, 2] The contention of appellant that the motion was one made under the provisions of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and was therefore barred by the limitation contained in said section, having been made more than six months after the entry of judgment, is without merit. The motion, though not made within six months of the entry of judgment, was made within less than one year therefrom. Where, as here, the motion to set aside a default judgment is made upon grounds not specified in section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, but is one addressed to the general equity powers of the court, it must be made within a reasonable time. Under circumstances similar to those presented in the instant case, it has been held that one year was a reasonable time within which to make the motion. Smith v. Jones, 174 Cal. 513, 515, 163 P. 890; Vaughn v. Pine Creek Tungsten Co., 89 Cal. App. 759, 763, 265 P. 491; Swallow v. Tungsten Products Co., 205 Cal. 207, 209, 270 P. 366. Under the circumstances presented in the case at bar, defendants were not required to file or submit a copy of their proposed pleading with their motion. De La Montanya v. De La Montanya, 112 Cal. 101, 117, 118, 44 P. 345, 32 L. R. A. 82, 53 Am. St. Rep. 165.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; James G. Quinn, Judge.

Action by Archibald Andrew against the Bankers' & Shippers' Insurance Company of New York and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

Miller & Thornton, H. A. Thornton, and H. B. M. Miller, all of San Francisco, for appellants.

W. S. Andrews and E. T. Cooper, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

NOURSE, P. J.

Plaintiff sued for damages for deceit, and had judgment for $14,594. Defendants appeal on typewritten transcripts.

The cause was partly tried at an earlier date when, upon the close of plaintiff's case, the trial court granted defendants' motions for nonsuit. On appeal this order was reversed. 101 Cal. App. 566, 281 P. 1091. In the opinion then rendered a full statement of the facts of plaintiff's case appears to which reference may be had. For the purposes of this opinion we may state briefly that plaintiff and the Oakland branch of the Bank of Italy were engaged in lending money on and discounting automobile paper; that defendant Earsman was the local agent of his codefendant insurance company; that one Shouse was engaged in buying and selling second-hand automobiles upon which he issued conditional sales contracts; that plaintiff and the local manager of the Bank of Italy agreed with Earsman that he should make a personal inspection of the cars held by Shouse, should issue a policy of insurance upon each car, and should attach a rider to each policy, certifying that he had made such inspection and had found the make and number as represented in the policy; that paper covering about two hundred cars was handled in this manner, but that, in the case of eleven cars, Earsman failed to make any inspection, but relied on the word of Shouse. In these instances the numbers inserted in the insurance policies were spurious and no cars corresponding to such numbers were owned or possessed by Shouse. The basis of the action is that Earsman fraudulently represented these facts to the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff, relying on these representations, purchased the paper, to his injury in the amount sued for. Earsman's relation as agent of the insurance company is conceded, and both defendants appeal on the same briefs.

In our previous opinion we discussed all the points relating to the issue of deceit, and held that the evidence tendered by the plaintiff was sufficient to make out his case. When the cause was called for the second trial the plaintiff offered in evidence the complete transcript of the former proceeding, the defendants offered two depositions of Earsman, and the plaintiff then put on three witnesses for oral testimony in rebuttal. This, with the stipulation of facts and some exhibits offered by agreement, constituted the trial. Upon this evidence the trial court made complete findings covering all the issues. The defendants now argue that we should review this evidence and reach a different conclusion.

[1, 2] The appeal does not present any intricate question of law. As we heretofore ruled that plaintiff's evidence was sufficient in all respects to support a judgment in his favor, that ruling is the law of the case on this appeal to that extent. When the defendants tendered evidence controverting that showing, there was committed to the trial court the duty of resolving the conflict, if any, and the case then comes back to us with the single question whether there is substantial and competent evidence supporting the court's findings. This question has already been determined on the former appeal. Meline Co. v. Kleinberger, 108 Cal. App. 60, 62, 290 P. 1042. At this point we are then confronted with the well-settled rule that, even where there is conflicting evidence, if there is sufficient substantial and competent evidence to support the finding of the trial court, that finding is conclusive on appeal.

[3] The appellants seek to avoid this conclusion by arguing that we are not bound by the findings because the greater part of the evidence was documentary or included in stipulations or depositions. The argument is not sound, because there is no substantial or irreconcilable conflict in the depositions with the evidence offered by plaintiff, and because what slight conflict appears therein was met by oral testimony heard by the trial court. In its final analysis the main point on this appeal is whether, when a considerable portion of the evidence is found in depositions and documents, the appellate court should review all the evidence and determine what, in its opinion, is true and what is false. That such is not the function of the appellate court where the evidence consisted of "the transcript of the testimony taken before another judge and deposition evidence" is the rule of Tupman v. Haberkern, 208 Cal. 261, 280 P. 970, 973.

[4] One other point may merit consideration. The parties had stipulated in writing as to the facts, and this stipulation was received at the first hearing. Under a second stipulation the full transcript of the first trial was received in evidence, including this stipulation of facts. Thereafter, and in presenting appellants' case, counsel for appellants sought to withdraw the portion of the agreed statement of facts which stipulated that none of the cars involved in the action was "possessed" by Shouse when the policies of insurance were issued. It is now argued that, having demanded the withdrawal of that portion of the stipulation, the appellants may urge that the evidence is insufficient to support the trial court's finding on that point. The argument is not sound, because appellants did not have the right to withdraw the stipulation which was made for the "trial" of the action, which means the second as well as the first trial (Nathan v. Dierssen, 146 Cal. 63, 65, 79 P. 739), and also because other evidence conclusively proved that the facts as incorporated in the stipulation were true.

The judgment is affirmed.

B. E. Pemberton and Ivan A. Schwab, both of San Francisco, for respondent State Compensation Insurance Fund.

NOURSE, P. J.

Petitioners seek a review of the order of respondent commission denying them compensation for the death of Anton Nielsen.

Deceased was employed as a cabinet maker by respondent Bersch, who was insured by the respondent State Compensation Insurance Fund. The deceased was forty-seven years old at the time of his death, and had been working steadily at his trade with respondent for a period of fifteen years. During all this time he had never displayed any symptom of illness or disability or any abnormal condition of health. On November 25, 1930, deceased, with five others, carried an altar top from Bersch's place of business to a truck and took it to a church, where it was to be installed. Seven other men helped deceased carry the altar top into the church, but, when they arrived there, it was found necessary to remove the old altar top. Deceased took a hammer and a chisel and worked upon the old top for about five minutes when he was stricken with a heart attack and soon thereafter died. The work of that morning was done in a great hurry, the new altar top was carried up the aisle of the church in an awkward and hurried manner, which no doubt caused an intense strain upon the deceased. The applicants are all dependents of the deceased entitled to an award if the death was the result of industrial injury.

The evidence upon which the Commission denied the application does not present a substantial conflict. Dr. Koford, the family physician, was present at the autopsy held immediately after the death. He testified that the deceased had "coronary and aortic sclerosis and the aorta was acutely dilated, being covered with numerous small red hemorrhages and broken capillaries." Also that "the dilatation had ruptured many of these fine blood vessels and that the rupturing had been very recent. I am convinced in my own mind that the heavy lifting caused an increased pressure in the blood stream, which the degenerated aortic wall could not withstand; this produced an acute dilatation and death." The autopsy surgeon at the inquest reported "arteriosclerosis, hemorrhages and dilatation of the aorta." Dr. Koford also testified that he had known the deceased for several years immediately prior to the death, and that the deceased had never displayed or complained of poor health or illness, and that he had not known anything abnormal in his physical condition. The wife of deceased, who had lived with him for more than twenty years immediately preceding his death, testified substantially to the same effect. Dr. Du Bray, without any examination of the deceased and without a full knowledge of the facts found at the autopsy, gave his opinion that death was caused by coronary occlusion and was not caused by the exertion of the employment. Dr. Gibbons, likewise without any examination of the deceased and without full knowledge of the true facts disclosed at the inquest and the circumstances leading to the death, also expressed an opinion that death was not caused by the employment. Dr. Harbaugh, another physician called by the commission, reviewed the entire record and expressed the opinion that the pre-existing disease was the major factor in the case, but that the extra exertion and the testimony of the physicians who actually saw and performed the autopsy could not be disregarded.

[1] There are two principles which control the decision on this hearing. First, the rule of Winthrop v. Industrial Accident Commission (Cal. Sup.) 2 P.(2d) 142, where it was held that there was no true conflict in the evidence where that on one side consisted of opinions based upon a state of facts not shown by the record to exist while that on the other side was based upon facts actually shown to exist or rested upon the testimony of physicians who had actually treated and examined the patient. That situation exists here. The evidence on behalf of the applicants is that those physicians who treated and examined the patient drew the conclusion from such treatment and examination that the exertion immediately prior to the death of the deceased aggravated the pre-existing heart condition and caused the death. The evidence on the other side rested solely in the opinions of physicians who had not treated, examined, or seen the patient but who had based their opinions upon a statement of the case which in numerous particulars was not a full and complete statement.

[2] The other rule applicable here is found in the recent opinion of the Supreme Court in Buckley v. Roche (Cal. Sup.) 4 P.(2d) 929, where it was held that the fact that Buckley had a previous heart affection would not of itself defeat his wife's application for a pension if the exertion of climbing the stairs aggravated his condition. Similarly in Fogarty v. Dept. of Industrial Relations, 206 Cal. 102, 273 P. 791, the court, citing Eastman Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 186 Cal. 587, 200 P. 17, and Knock v. Industrial Accident Commission, 200 Cal. 456, 253 P. 712, affirmed the rule that acceleration or aggravation of a pre-existing disease is an injury in the occupation causing such acceleration and annulled an award denying compensation to the dependents of Fogarty for a death arising under such circumstances.

[3] The Buckley Case is followed in Casserly v. City of Oakland (Cal. Sup.) 12 P.(2d) 425, where the Fogarty Case and others are cited with approval, and the rule of these cases compels an annulment of the award in this instance because the material evidence unmistakably discloses that, however serious the pre-existing heart condition of deceased might have been, the unusual exertion and hurry and excitement of the work immediately preceding his death either aggravated and accelerated such pre-existing condition or directly caused the death.

For these reasons, the award is annulled, and the application remanded for further proceedings and findings in accord herewith.

principals, promise to pay to the order of The United State Bank, Des Moines, Iowa, Six Thousand and no/100 Dollars, payable: $500.00 Dec. 4, 1923, $500 on Mar. 4, 1924, $500.00 on June 2, 1924, $4500. on Sept. 5, 1924, at its office in Des Moines, Iowa, with interest at the rate of eight per cent per annum, from date payable semi-annually until paid. Overdue principal or interest shall draw interest at the rate of eight per cent per annum, payable semi-annually. Upon default of payment of this note we agree to pay attorney fees and all expenses of collection. Any Justice of the Peace may have jurisdiction hereon to the amount of $300.00. If payments are not made on dates specified above, entire amount of note becomes due and payable at once.

"C. W. Graham
"Address Lloyd Waddell L. B. Kirkpatrick
"Address E. L. Lloyd F. H. Zook"

On March 24, 1928, F. H. Zook died in Los Angeles county, and defendant was appointed administrator of his estate. On September 11, 1928, plaintiff filed his duly verified claim against said estate, and on March 9, 1929, the claim was rejected by the administrator. On April 13, 1929, this action, based upon the claim, was instituted. The only payment made by the makers of said note was the sum of $240, which represented interest on the principal sum for the first six months, and which was paid March 11, 1924. Defendant pleaded the statute of limitations—section 337, Code of Civil Procedure. This was the only defense offered.

The note contains the following acceleration clause: "If payments are not made on dates specified above, entire amount of note becomes due and payable at once." It is the contention of appellant that "the right of action on a promissory note providing for payment in installments and containing a positive non-optional acceleration clause is barred in four years after default in any installment." Or, more specifically, appellant contends that the cause of action for the full amount arose on the 5th day of December, 1923, and was barred four years thereafter.

In the conclusions of law the following appears: "That in arriving at this judgment the court has found as a conclusion of law that the $500.00 principal payment due on December 4, 1923, and the $500.00 principal payment due on March 4, 1924, under the terms of the above-mentioned promissory note, are barred by the provisions of section 337 of the Code of Civil Procedure of the State of California, but that the additional $5,000.00 principal of said promissory note and the interest accrued thereon from March 4, 1924, are not barred by the provisions of section 337 of the Code of Civil Procedure or any other provision in the laws of the State of California. * * *" It will thus be seen that the judgment did not include the first two installments of $500 each, which the trial court held were barred by the statute of limitations. As to the other two installments, the maker died before the four-year period had expired, and the action as to them was commenced in time (Code Civ. Proc. § 353), if the contention of appellant, based upon the acceleration clause, does not prevail.

While the precise point here involved does not appear to have been decided in California, a very analogous adjudication has been made in this state respecting the payment of interest upon a promissory note. This question was first presented in the case of Belloc v. Davis, 38 Cal. 242, where the clause under consideration read as follows: "And in case default be made in any payment of interest, when the same shall become due as aforesaid, then the whole amount of principal and interest to become due and payable, immediately, upon such default." The action in that case was commenced more than four years after a default in the payment of interest. It was contended by the maker of the note that when a default in the payment of interest occurred, the whole amount became due and payable, and as the action had been commenced more than four years thereafter, it was barred. In disposing of the legal question thus presented, the court stated the rule to be as follows: "The question is novel and somewhat embarrassing; but our conclusion is, that the cause of action, within the true meaning of the statute, accrued at the expiration of the credit fixed by the note, to wit: six months after its date. The provision in the note, to the effect that in case of a default in the payment of interest, the whole amount of principal and interest shall 'become due and payable immediately upon such default,' is evidently in the nature of a penalty, inserted for the benefit of the creditor, and as an incentive to the debtor to stimulate him to the prompt payment of the interest, in order to avoid a forfeiture of the credit allowed by the note. * * * If it were otherwise, a perfectly solvent debtor, owing a debt payable at a remote period, with interest payable monthly, or at other stated periods, might shorten the credit to the statutory time of four years by wilfully declining to pay the first instalment of interest, provided the note contained a clause similar to that in this case. Money is often loaned at interest on a long credit, for the purposes of an investment; and in order to avoid the annoyance and hazard of changing the securities, the interest is generally lower on a long loan than on a short one; nevertheless, it is important to the lender that the interest be punctually paid; and if, with that view, he should insert in the note a clause similar to that in this case, the borrower needs only to decline to pay, even for a day, the first instalment of interest, in order to shorten the credit to four years, if the argument for the defendants be sound. This would convert the Statute of Limitations from a statute of repose into one of oppression and fraud. Instead of simply compelling the creditor to sue upon his demand within a reasonable time after it is due, it would enable a dishonest debtor, if his interest prompted it, to compel the creditor to take payment long before it is due, and thereby to escape the payment of future interest. We do not give to the statute so narrow a construction, and therefore hold that the cause of action in this case did not accrue until the maturity of the note."

The foregoing rule has been followed in Congregational Church, etc., v. Osborn, 153 Cal. 197, 94 P. 881, and California Sav. etc., Soc. v. Culver, 127 Cal. 107, 59 P. 292, and is the settled law in this state. In the case of Keene Five Cent Sav. Bank v. Reid (C. C. A.) 123 F. 221, 224, the application of the statute of limitations to promissory notes and other contracts which contain acceleration clauses, is exhaustively treated. It is there stated: "The effect of such clauses as the one in question has frequently been a subject for judicial consideration, and, while the decisions are not entirely harmonious, yet the decided weight of reason and authority is in favor of the view that such provisions are not self-operative; that they are for the benefit of the creditor, and intended to give him, on grounds of convenience, the right to treat the entire debt as matured, if an installment of interest is not paid as and when it should be, or if the taxes on the mortgaged premises are not paid pursuant to agreement. The great majority of the cases treat such provisions, when contained in mortgages, as designed to further constrain and stimulate the debtor to meet his engagements promptly, and to arm the creditor with a right in the nature of a right to declare a forfeiture or to exact a penalty, which he may or may not exercise, and as a right which the courts will never regard as having been exercised by the creditor, or as having any effect upon the period of maturity specified in a note or bond, without some affirmative action on his part, such as a notification to the debtor, by a suit or otherwise, that on account of the default he elects to treat the entire indebtedness as due. Attention has also been called to the fact that to hold such provisions as the one in question to be self-operative would be to confer on the debtor the right to take advantage of his own wrong; that is, to mature an indebtedness which was intended as an investment for a given period, in advance of the time specified on the face of his note or bond, by failing to keep his engagements. Cox v. Kille, 50 N. J. Eq. 176, 24 A. 1032; Mason v. Luce, 116 Cal. 232, 48 P. 72; Richards v. Daley, 116 Cal. 336, 48 P. 220; Lowenstein v. Phelan, 17 Neb. 429, 22 N. W. 561; First Nat. Bank of Snohomish v. Parker, 28 Wash. 234, 68 P. 756, 757 [92 Am. St. Rep. 828]; Watts v. Creighton, 85 Iowa, 154, 52 N. W. 12; Batey v. Walter (Tenn. Ch. App.) 46 S. W. 1024; Nebraska City Nat. Bank v. Nebraska City Gas Light & Coke Co. (C. C.) 14 F. 763; Phillips v. Taylor, 96 Ala. 426, 11 So. 323."

We are aware that a number of text-books support the contention of appellant, but we regard the rule as having been settled to the contrary in this state by decisions above cited. Appellant also cites Perkins v. Swain, 35 Idaho, 485, 207 P. 585, 34 A. L. R. 894. While that case is authority for the position taken by appellant, it clearly indicates that there is a conflict of authority upon this question throughout the United States. In the list of authorities which hold that the acceleration clause is for the benefit of the creditor and that while not therein so expressed, it is purely optional to declare the whole amount due, we find Belloc v. Davis, supra, from our own jurisdiction.

Appellants attempt to distinguish the California cases upon the ground that they apply to interest payments only, and not to installments. While this is true, a careful reading of the Belloc Case and those cases following it indicates that our courts have adopted the broad principle that acceleration clauses of like character are not absolute or self-operative; that they are for the benefit of the creditor; and that failure to pay an installment of principal when due cannot be taken advantage of by the debtor to mature the entire indebtedness.

We therefore conclude that the trial court properly held that the amounts for which judgment was given were not barred by the statute of limitations.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appellants' brief, containing no headings except words "Appellant's Opening Brief" on first page, held not to comply with rule (Rules of Supreme Court and District Courts of Appeal, rule 8).

Rule 8 of Rules of Supreme Court and District Courts of Appeal requires that brief should present each point separately under appropriate heading, showing nature of question to be presented.

2. Appeal and error ⇐766.

Where appellants ignored rule requiring headings in brief and, in court below, permitted default to be entered and failed to present points, appeal was dismissed (Rules of Supreme Court and District Courts of Appeal, rule 8).

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Walter Perry Johnson, Judge.

Action by B. Milano, doing business under the name, firm, and style of the Daly City Lime & Cement Company, against J. Bulleri and wife and others. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, named defendant and wife appeal.

Appeal dismissed.

SPENCE, J.

Plaintiff commenced this action to foreclose a materialman's lien for materials furnished by plaintiff to the defendant subcontractor, A. Fraumeni. Said defendant and the defendant owners, J. Bulleri and Christine Bulleri, defaulted and the action was dismissed as to the defendant T. Sharman, the contractor. Judgment of default was entered after a hearing, which judgment decreed foreclosure of the lien in the sum of $302.60. The defendant owners appeal.

[1, 2] Appellants have not complied with rule VIII of the Rules of the Supreme Court and District Courts of Appeal. Their brief fails to "present each point separately, under an appropriate heading, showing the nature of the question to be presented." In fact, the brief contains no headings whatever except the words "Appellants' Opening Brief" on the first page thereof. This rule has been in effect for several years and the necessity of compliance therewith has been frequently called to the attention of the bar. Best v. Martin (Cal. App.) 12 P.(2d) 80; Kaltenberger v. Alexander Hotel Company (Cal. App.) 12 P.(2d) 59; Sun Lumber Co. v. Bradfield (Cal. App.) 10 P.(2d) 183; Estate of Smith (Cal. App.) 9 P.(2d) 244; Stout v. We deem this a proper case in which to order such dismissal for appellants have not only failed to present their points properly in this court, but also permitted their default to be entered and failed to make any presentation of their points in the trial court.

The appeal is dismissed.

[1, 2] Claiming that the defendants, as the Civil Service Commission of San Francisco, had marked his papers incorrectly, the plaintiff commenced a proceeding in mandamus to compel the defendant commission to remark his papers. On December 9, 1931, E. A. Hahn, C. A. Spuur, and A. J. Canty were given permission to intervene. As the record before us does not show to the contrary, we assume that the application was made ex parte. On December 10, 1931, the trial court made an order denying the application to intervene. Whether that order was made on notice or was made ex parte is immaterial. As the application was granted ex parte it could be set aside ex parte. Coburn v. Pacific L. & M. Co., 46 Cal. 31, 33. If it could be entirely set aside it could be entirely ignored, and from the record before us we assume that it was entirely ignored. The defendant commission answered the plaintiff's complaint and a trial was had. On May 18, 1932, the trial court entered a judgment in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendants. On May 27, 1932, E. A. Hahn, C. A. Spuur, and A. J. Canty filed a notice of appeal from the judgment entered May 18, 1932. The plaintiff has made a motion to dismiss said appeal on the ground that the appellants are not parties to the action. The motion is well founded. From the order made December 10, 1931, E. A. Hahn, C. A. Spuur, and A. J. Canty were entitled to appeal. Code Civ. Proc. § 963, subd. 1; Dollenmayer v. Pryor, 150 Cal. 1, 87 P. 616. But, having been refused permission to intervene, they were not entitled to appeal from the judgment entered May 18, 1932. Thorpe v. North Moneta, etc., Water Co., 12 Cal. 1. Evidence ⇐60.

Fairness in business transactions is presumed (Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 19).

2. Evidence ⇐100.

Fairness in business transactions is question of fact, provable both by direct and circumstantial evidence (Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 19).

3. Appeal and error ⇐1010(1).

Trial court's finding based upon sufficient evidence that president did not act arbitrarily in refusing to approve offers made to corporation for manufacture and sale of cigar and cigarette lighting devices cannot be disturbed, though appellate court might have reached different conclusion.

4. Patents ⇐202(1).

Contract for transfer of patent rights to cigar and cigarette lighting devices to corporation held to pass title to corporation subject to condition subsequent (Civ. Code, § 1438).

Contract provided, amongst other things, that inventor, who held certain patents and applications for patents for cigar and cigarette lighting devices, and corporation he organized, would transfer the patent rights to a foreign corporation, and that the transfers were to be subject to the condition that the transferee corporation should manufacture and sell at least 5,000 of the devices during each calendar year, and that, if it failed to do so, then upon demand the patent rights should be reassigned.

5. Patents ⇐202(1).

Title to certain patent rights which passed by assignment subject to condition subsequent remained in assignee until forfeiture was enforced (Civ. Code, § 1438).

6. Contracts ⇐226.

"Condition subsequent" refers to future event upon happening of which obligation becomes no longer binding on party in whose favor condition was created if he chooses to enforce it (Civ. Code, § 1438).

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Condition Subsequent," see Words and Phrases.]

7. Contracts ⇐226.

While intent to create condition subsequent must appear expressly or by clear implication, no precise words are necessary, and plain letter of agreement cannot be disregarded (Civ. Code, § 1438).

8. Contracts ⇐318.

Forfeitures are not favored, and any inconsistent acts by party claiming forfeiture will be regarded as a waiver.

9. Estoppel ⇐119.

Unless but one inference can be drawn from evidence, waiver and estoppel are questions for jury or trial court.

10. Patents ⇐203.

Evidence showed that inventor did not waive right to reassignment of certain patent rights for assignee's breach of condition in contract.

11. Corporations ⇐307.

President and directors occupy fiduciary relationship to corporation, and are not permitted to assume position adverse to corporation.

12. Corporations ⇐312(1).

Transfers of corporate property by president and directors to themselves are voidable, and trust arises in favor of corporation as against officer as to anything so received.

13. Corporations ⇐320(13).

Refusing injunction to enjoin transfer of certain patent rights to president held not error, though president assumed position adverse to corporation's interests in demanding transfer, where his right was clear.

14. Injunction ⇐13.

Before injunction will issue, it must appear that some substantial and positive injury will occur, and irregular and unauthorized acts not having that result constitute no ground for relief.

15. Injunction ⇐1.

Injunction will not issue to enforce right or prevent wrong in abstract, or where it will retard instead of promoting justice.

16. Receivers ⇐8.

Except where moving party has some absolute right to property sought to be controlled, appointment of receiver rests in trial court's sound discretion, and should not be made where no benefit is to be gained thereby.

17. Corporations ⇐320(13).

Refusal to appoint receiver of corporation's business held not error under circumstances.

There was no allegation or claim that, with the exception of certain patent rights to which the president was entitled to a reassignment, the corporation had any assets, nor that, if such rights should not be retained, it could or would continue in business, and there were no funds in the company's treasury, no means of raising funds from its stockholders by assessment or otherwise, and no business in prospect which would bring into its treasury any funds to carry on the business.

18. Corporations ⇐320(2).

Stockholder held to have right to maintain action to enjoin transfer of certain patent rights from corporation to its president, where any demand that corporation bring such action would have been unavailing.

19. Pleading ⇐8(6).

Averments of complaint that directors adopted resolution confessing without cause corporation's failure to perform contract with its president and directing reassignment of certain patents to him held legal conclusion which tendered no issue, although found among findings of fact.

20. Corporations ⇐94.

Certificate of stock is only evidence of ownership which may exist without it.

21. Corporations ⇐98.

Demand is necessary to put corporation in default for failure to deliver certificate of stock where right thereto has not been denied.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; C. J. Goodell, Judge.

Action by Edward Lowe, Jr., against Francis C. Copeland and others. From an adverse judgment, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

M. Mitchell Bourquin, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Jos. T. O'Connor, Hartley F. Peart, Charles V. Barfield, and Thomas F. McCue, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM.

This action was one for equitable relief, namely, a decree declaring the plaintiff to be the owner of certain shares of stock in defendant American Metal Products Corporation and enjoining defendants Copeland and the Cig-a-Lite Corporation from transferring certain patent rights. In the alternative, damages were prayed, and plaintiff asked that a receiver of the business and property of defendant American Metal Products Corporation be appointed.

Defendant Copeland was the inventor of various cigar and cigarette lighting devices, and the holder of certain patents and applications for patents for such devices. He organized defendant Cig-a-Lite Corporation, in which he owned a majority of the stock. On or about March 25, 1927, plaintiff entered into a contract with Copeland and the corporation last named, by which the latter two agreed to transfer the patent rights to said devices to a corporation to be organized under the laws of Nevada, in which Copeland should own 51 per cent. of the stock, and act as its president at a salary of $500 per month. In consideration of the issuance to him of 44 per cent. of the stock of the Nevada corporation, plaintiff agreed to advance to this company in cash from time to time as needed sums not to exceed $44,000. This promise was to be evidenced by plaintiff's note, and considered as his subscription for the stock mentioned. It was also agreed that no contract involving more than $500 should be entered into by the Nevada corporation without the approval of defendant Copeland; further, that the transfers of the patent rights to the company were to be subject to the condition that it should manufacture and sell at least 5,000 of the devices during each calendar year, and that if it failed to do so, then upon demand the said patent rights should be reassigned. The Nevada corporation was organized and the patent rights assigned to it.

The complaint alleged that plaintiff executed and paid said promissory note, and in accordance with said contract became the owner of said stock, which had not been issued to him, although demand therefor had been made; further, that good and reasonable offers were made to the Nevada corporation for the manufacture and sale of said devices, but that defendant Copeland without good cause refused to approve the same, and thus obstructed and prevented the manufacture and sale of said devices by the Nevada corporation; that as a result this company failed to manufacture and sell the number of said devices agreed upon within the time fixed in the contract, following which Copeland and the Cig-a-Lite Corporation gave notice on that ground of their election to terminate the contract, and demanded a reassignment of the patent rights. The complaint contained further allegations that Copeland by virtue of his majority interest in the stock of the Nevada company controlled the action of its board of directors; also that, by virtue of such control, he caused said directors to adopt a resolution directing the company's officers to execute such assignments. Plaintiff prayed that he be declared the owner of the stock mentioned, and that Copeland and the Cig-a-Lite Corporation be restrained from reassigning the patent rights; that the Nevada corporation be relieved from the condition in said contract; and that a receiver of its business be appointed.

The trial court found that plaintiff executed and paid the note and was the owner of the stock as alleged; that the same had not been issued, but that no demand for its issuance had been made; further, that the Nevada corporation had never during any calendar year manufactured or sold, or caused to be manufactured or sold, 5,000 of said devices; that Copeland in the exercise of his discretion had rejected the offers mentioned, stating his reasons therefor; and that the offers made through plaintiff, while not unreasonable, presented a question upon which reasonable minds might differ and upon which plaintiff and Copeland did differ. The same finding was made respecting offers made to the company through Copeland, and also that none of the rejections by him were made in bad faith or arbitrarily but in good faith and in the exercise of his business judgment; further, that he had not waived any of his rights under the agreement.

The complaint alleged in paragraph 15 that on September 27, 1929, at a meeting of the stockholders of the Nevada corporation, Copeland, by force of his majority ownership in the stock and over plaintiff's vote and protest, caused the adoption of a resolution confessing without cause the failure, default, and inability of the company to perform the contract, and authorizing its officers and directors to reassign the rights acquired thereunder, and that Copeland, unless enjoined, will execute such reassignments. The court found the allegations of this paragraph to be true. In this connection, however, it was found that, by reason of the other findings, and the inability of the plaintiff and Copeland to agree upon any settled policy for the company or upon any contract submitted by either to the other, and that, due to the fact that Copeland and the Cig-a-Lite Corporation owned a majority of the stock in the Nevada corporation, and consequently controlled its board of directors, and to the attitude of its finance committee, which the court found was antagonistic to Copeland, it was impossible for the Nevada company to perform the contract or to manufacture or cause to be manufactured 5,000 of the devices in any one year.

The court concluded that the patent applications and rights assigned to the company were subject to reassignment to Copeland; and that, notwithstanding the condition of the company's affairs as found, no receiver should be appointed, as there were no funds in its treasury, no business in prospect, and no assessments being permitted under its articles of incorporation and by-laws, there was no means of raising money to continue its business. The court also concluded that the Nevada corporation was not entitled to be relieved from the condition in the contract, and that no injunction should issue, and entered judgment denying the relief prayed for in the complaint.

Plaintiff claims that portions of certain findings are unsupported and that the findings do not support the judgment; while defendants contend that no cause of action was alleged in the complaint or proved.

[1-3] We are satisfied that there was sufficient evidence to support the finding that the defendant Copeland, in rejecting the offers mentioned, did not act arbitrarily or in bad faith. Fairness in business transactions is presumed (Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 19), and, the question being one of fact, provable both by direct and circumstantial evidence, and there being evidence in the record which the trial court believed reasonably sufficient to support its conclusion, its finding on this issue cannot be disturbed. Rossen v. Villanueva, 175 Cal. 632, 166 P. 1004; 6 Cor. Jur. 880). This is true even though an appellate court might be of opinion that a different conclusion should have been reached. Clopton v. Clopton, 162 Cal. 27, 121 P. 720.

[4-6] That title to the patents and patent rights mentioned passed by assignment to the Nevada corporation subject to a condition subsequent is plain from the provisions of the contract (Waterman v. MacKenzie, 138 U. S. 252, 11 S. Ct. 334, 34 L. Ed. 923), and in such cases the title remains in the assignee until the forfeiture is enforced (48 Cor. Jur. "Patents," § 397, p. 257). A condition subsequent refers to a future event upon the happening of which the obligation becomes no longer binding on the party in whose favor the condition was created if he choses to enforce it. Civ. Code, § 1438.

[7] While the intent to create a condition subsequent must appear expressly or by clear implication, no precise words are necessary (Firth v. Los Angeles Pacific, etc., Co., 28 Cal. App. 399, 152 P. 935; Firth v. Marovich, 160 Cal. 257, 116 P. 729, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 1190), and the plain letter of an agreement cannot be disregarded (13 Cor. Jur. "Contracts," § 533, p. 567).

[8] Forfeitures under such provisions, however, are not favored; and any inconsistent acts or dealings by the party claiming the forfeiture will be regarded as a waiver. Haserot v. Keller, 67 Cal. App. 659, 228 P. 383. In the case cited, the waiver found rested upon the principles underlying estoppel, namely, that the acts of the party claiming the forfeiture had induced a detrimental change of position. McCormick v. Orient Ins. Co., 86 Cal. 260, 262, 24 P. 1003. Here the contract was entered into on March 25, 1927, and a demand for the reassignment of the patents was made in June, 1929. Plaintiff admits that Copeland had the right to demand such assignment in March, 1928. He failed, however, to do so, and plaintiff thereafter paid the company pursuant to his contract approximately $22,000; this money being used in its business. It is contended that having allowed the above period to elapse without exercising his right to demand a reassignment, and having thus encouraged plaintiff to make the payments mentioned, Copeland waived the right to enforce the condition.

[9, 10] Had the company, notwithstanding it failed to manufacture and sell the required number of devices the first year, performed the contract, in that respect during the second year, no advantage could have been taken thereafter of the fact of nonperformance during the first year; but in view of the finding in substance that Copeland acted in good faith in his dealings with plaintiff and the company we cannot say that his failure to demand a reassignment at the end of the first year was due to anything but the expectation that the company would perform during the following year; and this notwithstanding the company directly, and Copeland indirectly, received the benefit of the payments made by plaintiff during the second year. Unless but one inference can be drawn from the evidence, waiver and estoppel are questions for the jury or the trial court. 27 R. C. L. "Waiver," p. 912; Kerr v. Reed, 187 Cal. 409, 202 P. 142; Parke v. Franciscus, 194 Cal. 284, 228 P. 435. Here the trial court found that there was no waiver, and we cannot say that the finding is unsupported.

There is no merit in the claim that the notice given by Copeland of his election to take advantage of the breach of condition was insufficient in form. However, it is contended that the notice was legally insufficient, as Copeland thereby assumed a position hostile to the interests of the company, which, he being the president, the law would not permit.

[11-13] The president and the directors of a corporation occupy a fiduciary and trust relationship thereto (Sims v. Petaluma Gas Light Co., 131 Cal. 656, 63 P. 1011; Pacific Vinegar, etc., Works v. Smith, 145 Cal. 352, 78 P. 550, 104 Am. St. Rep. 42), and they are not permitted to assume a position adverse to the corporation (Dean v. Shingle, 198 Cal. 652, 246 P. 1049, 46 A. L. R. 1156). Transfers of corporate property by such officers to themselves are voidable (6a Cal. Jur. "Corporations," § 633; Phillips v. Sanger Lumber Co., 130 Cal. 431, 62 P. 749; Dean v. Shingle, supra); and a trust arises in favor of the corporation as against an officer as to anything so received (Lezinsky v. Mason Malt, etc., Co., 185 Cal. 240, 196 P. 884). In the present case, however, the court found in effect that defendant Copeland was entitled to an unconditional reassignment of the patents. Accordingly a duty rested upon the corporation to reassign; and, while it may be conceded that Copeland, being president and a director of the company, assumed a position adverse to the company's interest in attempting to procure the reassignment, nevertheless, his right being clear, the trial court properly concluded that no injunction should issue.

[14] It is well settled that, before an injunction will issue, it must appear that some substantial and positive injury will occur; and that acts, although irregular and unauthorized, which will not have that result, constitute no ground for relief. 1 High, Injunctions (4th Ed.) § 9; 32 Cor. Jur. "Injunctions," pp. 49, 50; Duggan v. Emporia, 84 Kan. 429, 114 P. 235, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 719; Gilfillan v. Grier, 145 Pa. 317, 22 A. 593; Robins v. Latham, 134 Mo. 466, 36 S. W. 33. As held in the case last cited, there must not only be a violation of plaintiff's rights, but such a violation as is or will be attended with substantial damage, not merely a technical injury; and this rule is followed in principle in the following cases: Modoc Land, etc., Co. v. Booth, 102 Cal. 151, 36 P. 431; Copsey v. Sacramento Bank, 133 Cal. 659, 66 P. 7, 204, 85 Am. St. Rep. 238; Clough v. W. H. Healy Co., 53 Cal. App. 397, 200 P. 378.

[15] Furthermore, an injunction will not issue merely for the enforcement of a right or the prevention of a wrong in the abstract (14 R. C. L. "Injunctions," p. 321; Goodrich v. Moore, 2 Minn. 61 [Gil. 49], 72 Am. Dec. 74), or where it will retard instead of promoting justice (Endicott v. Mathis, 9 N. J. Eq. 110).

[16, 17] It has been held that where, because of dissension in its board of directors, a corporation cannot function, a court has power to appoint a receiver to preserve its property, but in such a case the proceeding is not directed toward the closing of the affairs of the corporation nor an attempt to dissolve it, but merely to place its assets in safe hands, as courts are not authorized before dissolution to appoint a receiver for such purposes. Elliott v. Superior Ct., 168 Cal. 727, 145 P. 101; Boyle v. Superior Ct., 176 Cal. 671, 170 P. 1140, L. R. A. 1918D, 226. Here there was no allegation or claim that, with the exception of the patent rights, the Nevada company had any assets; nor that, if such rights should not be retained, it could or would continue in business. There were no funds in the company's treasury, no means of raising funds from its stockholders by assessment or otherwise, and no business in prospect which would bring into its treasury any funds to carry on the business, and, as found, Copeland was entitled to a reassignment of the patent rights. Except where the moving party has some absolute right to the property sought to be controlled, the appointment of a receiver rests in the sound discretion of the trial court, and the appointment should not be made where no benefit or advantage is to be gained thereby (53 Cor. Jur. "Receivers," § 21, p. 36); and, in view of the facts, we cannot say that the court erred by refusing to do so.

As stated, it is urged by defendants that plaintiff could not maintain the action on his own account, and that no facts were alleged or proved which gave him the right to proceed in the corporation's behalf.

[18] Plaintiff's claim to the stock mentioned gave him the right to sue therefor; and the facts alleged and found show sufficiently that any demand that the corporation bring action to restrain the retransfer of the patent rights would have been unavailing. The company was made a party to the suit, and all the questions above discussed were litigated. The act sought to be restrained, although irregular, was in view of the facts, one which could cause no substantial injury to the corporation or to plaintiff, and the trial court rightly so decided.

With respect to the finding that the averments of paragraph 15 of the complaint were true, this paragraph contained the allegation that the directors of the Nevada company adopted a resolution confessing without cause its failure and inability to perform the contract and directing a reassignment of the patents. It is urged by plaintiff that, in view of this finding, the relief prayed for should have been granted.

[19] The finding that the acts were done "without cause," if one of fact, might be said to conflict with the findings that the company had failed to perform and that Copeland acted in good faith. However, we are of the opinion that this was but a legal conclusion (Fisher v. Fisher, 23 Cal. App. 310, 137 P. 1094), which tendered no issue; and, although it is found among the findings of fact, it is no less a conclusion of law (Savings & Loan Society v. Burnett, 106 Cal. 514, 39 P. 922; Towle v. Sweeney, 2 Cal. App. 29, 32, 83 P. 74; Lynip v. Alturas School Dist., 24 Cal. App. 426, 438, 141 P. 835).

Plaintiff asked for a decree declaring him to be the owner of the shares of stock for which he subscribed. It was found that the agreed price had been paid, but that there had been no demand for the issuance and no refusal to issue a certificate therefor, and that the defendants had been at all times ready and willing to issue the same to plaintiff.

[20, 21] Such a certificate is only evidence of ownership, which may exist without it (Cal. Southern Hotel Co. v. Callender, 94 Cal. 120, 29 P. 859, 28 Am. St. Rep. 99; Majors v. Girdner, 31 Cal. App. 47, 159 P. 826), and it has been held that a demand is necessary to put a corporation in default for failure to deliver certificates of stock where the right thereto has not been denied (14 Cor. Jur. "Corporations," § 712, p. 483; Thompson, Corporations [3d Ed.] § 3518; Fergus v. Venice Investment Co., 36 Cal. App. 425, 172 P. 396; Jefferson County Savings Bank v. Compton, 192 Ala. 16, 68 So. 261; Teeple v. Hawkeye, etc., Co., 137 Iowa, 206, 114 N. W. 906; Boyd, etc., Ass'n v. Eastham, 208 Ky. 368, 270 S. W. 12; Gallatin, etc., Alliance v. Flannery, 59 Mont. 534, 197 P. 996; Weaver v. Consumers', etc., Co., 246 Pa. 438, 92 A. 553; Ophir Investment Co. v. Alexander Realty Corporation, 117 Wash. 637, 201 P. 897; Lipscomb's Adm'r v. Condon, 56 W. Va. 416, 49 S. E. 392, 67 L. R. A. 670, 107 Am. St. Rep. 938).

While plaintiff was doubtless entitled in this respect to the decree prayed for, he makes no complaint here that a formal judgment declaring him to be the owner of the stock was not entered.

We have examined the evidence, and are satisfied that the findings of the court are fairly supported, and that no sufficient ground for reversing the judgment has been shown.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Marshall F. McComb, Judge.

Action by Sadie B. Sheffler against Clare Hutchings and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant named appeals.

Affirmed.

Tanner, Odell & Taft and Donald A. Odell, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Otho S. Vernon, of Pasadena, for respondent.

KNIGHT, J.

The defendant Clare Hutchings appeals from an adverse judgment for the payment of money, entered after default for failure to answer the complaint. The grounds of appeal are that the complaint fails to state a cause of action, and therefore is insufficient to support the judgment, and that the trial court abused its discretion in determining the motions to set aside the default.

[1] The complaint contains five counts, but it is unnecessary to inquire into appellant's objections to the first four because the facts alleged in the fifth are legally sufficient, in our opinion, to sustain the judgment. The cause of action stated therein is one to recover the sum of $4,929.32 and the earnings and accumulations thereof based upon the charge that defendants fraudulently obtained from plaintiff the principal sum mentioned for the ostensible purpose of investing it for her under a written guaranty that from such investments she would receive "a net profit of not less than ten per cent. per annum," and that, after obtaining said principal sum, they fraudulently appropriated the same and the earnings and accumulations thereof to their own use. In this regard it is alleged in substance that defendants were engaged in the real estate business in and about Los Angeles; that plaintiff, a widow, reposed confidence and trust in defendants on account of a friendly business relationship theretofore existing between plaintiff's husband and defendants; that upon the death of plaintiff's husband she received the sum of $4,929.32 from his estate, and that as a result of conspiracy and false promises defendants induced her to turn said money over to them under the written guaranty above referred to, a copy of which is set out in the complaint; that she received no income whatever from said money, and that after a lapse of some three years, during which she was lulled into a feeling of security by false statements made by the defendants as to the nature and character of the investments they claimed to have made for her, she asked for an accounting, and then ascertained that defendants had appropriated to their own use the entire principal sum and the proceeds derived from the several transactions financed therewith. The complaint goes on to set forth in detail the method employed by defendants, after obtaining the money, to defraud her thereof and to describe the numerous transactions carried on by them to accomplish such purpose, which consisted chiefly of mortgaging the property in which most of the money was invested, and afterwards selling the mortgages and appropriating the proceeds received therefrom and the rents and issues from the property to their own use. Eventually, so the complaint alleges, when an accounting was demanded, defendants tendered to plaintiff deeds conveying to her two parcels of land, both of which were fully incumbered, and against which foreclosure proceedings were impending for nonpayment of taxes, interest, etc. It was also alleged in substance that in furtherance of the conspiracy to defraud, and in consummation thereof, appellant stripped himself of all property in which he was interested by transferring the same to his mother, thus preventing plaintiff from realizing on any judgment she might obtain against him.

The points urged by appellant against the sufficiency of this particular count are based mainly on technical grounds, some of which may have been good on special demurrer; but they reveal no fatal defect in the pleading, and in our opinion it contains all the essential allegations to constitute a cause of action for the recovery of money, based on fraud and deceit, and therefore, as indicated, is legally sufficient to sustain the judgment.

[2] The following are the facts relating to the second assignment of error: The default was entered by the clerk of the court on June 7, 1929, and on June 10th appellant served and filed notice of motion to set it aside. The motion was accompanied by a proposed demurrer to the complaint, and was heard on affidavits; and on June 20th the court made the following conditional order: "* * * Motion to set aside default is granted on condition defendants file a Surety Bond of $5000.00 by noon June 22, 1929, to guarantee Judgment and Costs and also pay an attorney fee of $250.00, if plaintiff prevails, otherwise said motion is denied. Demurrer to complaint is continued to June 27, 1929." Appellant failed to comply with the condition imposed, and on June 22d served and filed a second notice of motion whereby he sought to have the default set aside unconditionally upon the ground that he was unable to meet the condition stated in the previous order. The second motion was heard also on affidavits, and on July 8, 1929, was denied. Thereafter, on July 15, 1929, and after taking evidence in open session, the court determined that the amount due plaintiff was $7,225, and gave judgment against appellant therefor. Appellant's mother was named also as a party defendant; but she filed no appearance in the action, presumably for the reason that she was not served with summons. Consequently she is not affected by the judgment.

Appellant's time to plead to the complaint expired on June 4, 1929; and it appears from the record upon which the motions were determined that on that day appellant was being tried on ten criminal charges growing out of this same controversy; that he was subsequently convicted thereof and sentenced to jail imprisonment. Counsel then representing appellant and counsel now representing plaintiff participated in the trial of the criminal action, and it is claimed by the former in his affidavit that on June 4th, during the trial of said criminal action and in response to his request, counsel for plaintiff verbally stipulated to extend appellant's time to demur to and including the following Friday; but that, when he arrived at the clerk's office on Friday to file his demurrer, default had already been taken. Counsel for plaintiff, in his counteraffidavit, admitted having had a conversation with appellant's counsel at the time stated relating to an extension of time, but he averred in his affidavit that appellant's request related to an extension of time to answer—not to demur; that he extended the time to answer until and including the following Thursday—not Friday; and that he did not cause the default to be entered until 11 o'clock Friday morning.

Even assuming as a matter of law that the action of a trial court in denying a motion to set aside a default in the face of a verbal stipulation extending time would constitute an abuse of discretion, it will be seen from the foregoing that in the present case there is a sharp conflict in the evidence as to whether or not counsel for plaintiff ever agreed to extend the appellant's time until and including Friday, the day on which the default was taken; therefore this court is precluded from interfering on appeal with the trial court's decision in resolving such conflict. Moreover, so far as the record discloses, no proposed answer has ever been tendered by appellant, nor any affidavit filed denying the allegations of conspiracy and fraud, and consequently appellant failed to show that he had a meritorious defense to interpose in the action.

[3, 4] Appellant complains of the condition imposed by the court in its first order, claiming in his affidavit that it was not only unreasonable but was impossible to perform. But, in the absence of denials of the allegations of the complaint, the facts alleged therein must be taken as true, and it appears therefrom that appellant fraudulently and without any consideration therefor transferred title to whatever property in which he may have held an interest to his mother for the purpose of defeating any effort on the part of plaintiff to recover the money which was due her; that being so, it cannot be fairly said that the condition imposed was unreasonable nor that the inference drawn by the trial court that appellant could comply with the same is unsupported. In any event, if, as shown, the facts adduced before the trial court were legally sufficient to warrant an unconditional denial of the motions, the question of the reasonableness of the conditions imposed becomes unimportant.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; Eugene Daney, Jr., Judge.

Action by M. Schneirow against the Las Vegas Land & Building Company, Incorporated, in which A. M. Hinsch intervened. From a judgment for defendant and intervener, plaintiff appeals.

Reversed.

S. W. Newman, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

J. C. Hizar, of San Diego, for respondents.

V. N. THOMPSON, Justice pro tem.

The appeal of this cause is taken by the plaintiff from a judgment in the trial court in favor of the defendant corporation and the intervener, and against the plaintiff.

The record on appeal is made, aside from the usual transcripts, only upon the appellant's opening brief, without any respondent's brief. Therefore, there is nothing before this court to even indicate what position the defendant corporation and intervener Hinsch take with respect to the points raised by this appeal. The pleadings and evidence, of course, indicate their contentions before the trial court. An added burden is therefore placed upon this court to more thoroughly review all of the evidence and details of fact as developed before the trial court in order that a proper conclusion may be reached, having in mind the contentions of all of the litigants.

The action was brought by the plaintiff as the assignee of Olive Krug, who was an original assignee of R. E. L. Blankenship, for money in the amount of $6,289.32, claimed to have been had and received by the said defendant corporation from the said Blankenship.

The basis of this claim is that in organizing and financing the defendant corporation, which was a Nevada corporation, R. E. L. Blankenship and Phillip F. Bartlett undertook to place equal amounts of money in the corporation as capital, for which shares of stock were to have been issued, according to the amount of money contributed by each. This plan was followed up to a certain point, when contributions made by Blankenship exceeded those made by Bartlett in the amount of $6,289.32, which was shown as a credit balance in favor of Blankenship in his personal account in the books of the corporation.

Blankenship, prior to and during the organization and operation of the defendant and respondent corporation, was indebted to A. M. Hinsch, intervener and respondent, upon two promissory notes aggregating $30,000, as security for the payment of which there was pledged certain shares of stock of San Diego Finance Company. Shortly prior to the dates of maturity of these notes Blankenship sought their renewal and at the same time the release of the pledged stock in the San Diego Finance Company, and to substitute therefor stock in Las Vegas Land & Building Company.

A statement purporting to show the financial condition of this company was prepared by the secretary, J. G. Chapman, at the instance of Blankenship, who was then, and had been since the organization of the company, the president, and Bartlett, the vice president thereof. Although at the time of the preparation of the financial statement there was a credit balance standing on the books of the company in the personal account of Blankenship, this item was given no mention in the statement, except in this way: "Cash paid in by stockholders, $29,156.02." The statement was also made therein, "No debts, current or otherwise, excepting on three tracts above." The tracts referred to are tracts upon which the company owed certain balances. A copy of this statement is attached to the complaint in intervention, marked Exhibit A. There was no direct statement that Blankenship was a creditor of the company. When the financial statement was thus prepared on June 4, 1930, it was presented to Blankenship; his creditor, Hinsch; Bartlett, the principal coowner of the Las Vegas Land & Building Company; J. C. Hizar, a stockholder of that company, whose name appears as an accommodation maker upon the two promissory notes which were given by Blankenship in renewal of the original notes to Hinsch, and whose name also appears as attorney for both the defendant Las Vegas Land & Building Company and the intervener Hinsch in this action. The financial condition of the company was discussed by all of these parties, collectively and in smaller groups, prior to the preparation of the statement already referred to.

Nowhere in the testimony of the witnesses is it disclosed whether or not the fact of the existence of indebtedness of the Las Vegas Land & Building Company to Blankenship was made known to Hinsch, although the fact is developed that Hinsch, as a condition for the renewal of the Blankenship notes and the substitution of Las Vegas Land & Building Company stock for San Diego Finance Company stock, required that Bartlett replace Blankenship as president and financial manager of the company. This was done through official action of the board of directors on May 5, 1930.

The credit in Blankenship's favor remained on the books of the company until September 10, 1930, when a book entry was made by the secretary, Chapman, for the purpose of closing it. Blankenship was indebted to Olive Krug on a judgment in the superior court in San Diego county in amount of $64,675. On July 24, 1930, a written agreement was entered into between Blankenship and Mrs. Krug whereby Blankenship agreed to pledge one hundred shares, more or less, of Las Vegas Land & Building Company stock as collateral security to a note for $1,000, and other considerations, which was to have been applied in reduction of this judgment. Although stock in the Las Vegas Land & Building Company was issued in favor of Blankenship to the extent of one hundred and eight shares on July 29, 1930, for the purpose of consuming Blankenship's credit on the company's books, Blankenship, after receiving and keeping the stock for a few days, returned it to the secretary and refused its acceptance on the ground that he had agreed with Hizar and Bartlett that he would be given an irrevocable power of attorney to vote the stock. Instead of this particular stock being pledged to Mrs. Krug, as provided by the terms of Blankenship's agreement with her, an assignment was made by him to her of his claim for the amount of the credit balance shown in his favor on the books of the Las Vegas Land & Building Company. This assigned claim forms the basis for the action from the judgment in which this appeal is taken.

The allegations of the complaint in intervention, particularly paragraphs III and IV, apparently are made for the purpose of showing fraud, or the making of fraudulent representations on the part of Blankenship by which intervener Hinsch was misled and was thereby induced to renew Blankenship's notes, to part with the original securities which he held, shares of stock in the San Diego Finance Company, and to accept in substitution therefor three hundred seventy-five shares of stock in the Las Vegas Land & Building Company. Paragraph IX then recites, in part, that, "* * * except for the representations as to the condition of the company * * * intervener would not have accepted as a pledge the said stock * * * and surrendered the security formerly held by him, * * " and then recites further, " * * that he (intervener) accepted said two promissory notes, * * * and said security of such stock entirely upon the said representations of the said R. E. L. Blankenship, said J. C. Hizar, J. G. Chapman and Phillip F. Bartlett, which statements and representations were all made in the presence of and at the request of the said R. E. L. Blankenship." (Parenthesis ours.)

Here we have an anomaly, in that the name of J. C. Hizar appears as attorney for the intervener and also for the defendant corporation, and at the same time as one of the persons who it is alleged made representations which misled and caused the intervener to do the things complained of, i. e., to renew Blankenship's notes and accept a substitution of securities.

There is no direct allegation in the complaint in intervention that the representations of either Blankenship, Hizar, Chapman, or Bartlett with respect to the solvency or financial condition of the Las Vegas Land & Building Company were not true, that the representations complained of were made for the purpose of misleading or defrauding the intervener, or any of the material and necessary allegations upon which the claim of actual fraud might be based. The complaint in intervention apparently attempts to make the intervener the principal party to the action, aside from the plaintiff herself.

Only inferentially can it be taken from the complaint in intervention that there was actual or constructive fraud committed, either on the part of Blankenship individually, or Blankenship and the other persons named by "The suppression of that which is true, by one having knowledge or belief of the fact" (Civ. Code, § 1572, subd. 3), or by a "* * * breach of duty which, without an actually fraudulent intent, gains an advantage to the person in fault * * * by misleading another to his prejudice" (Civ. Code, § 1573, subd. 1) by Blankenship and/or such other persons failing to make known to the intervener Hinsch that the accounts of the Las Vegas Land & Building Company showed a credit balance in favor of Blankenship, and permitting a financial statement of this company to be exhibited to Hinsch without having shown thereon the fact that Blankenship was a creditor of the company to the extent of $6,289.32.

[1] The testimony of Blankenship, Bartlett, Chapman, and Hizar himself shows that the financial condition of the company, as well as its prospects for the future, were discussed by all of these persons with the intervener Hinsch at different times for more than a month immediately prior to the renewal of the notes and substitution of securities, and that the financial statement, as prepared by the secretary, Chapman, or memoranda containing its substance, was used on different occasions in these discussions; that all of these officers and stockholders were aware of the fact that there was a credit in Blankenship's favor standing on the books of the company during the entire time covered by the discussions; and that no false statement or misrepresentation by or on the part of Blankenship caused the intervener to change his position with respect to the notes and securities.

Even though the intervener was available, and could have attended the trial, the record discloses that he did not choose to attend, nor to give the trial court the benefit of his testimony with respect to whether or not he relied upon or was actually misled by any statements or representations of Blankenship, or any or all of the other persons connected with the Las Vegas Land & Building Company.

Appellant's first point of appeal, "The court erred in its finding that the plaintiff's assignor had made the representations alleged in intervener's complaint and the intervener had relied thereon in accepting the securities therein stated," is well taken.

[2] Appellant's second point of appeal, "The stock issued and held by the intervener, A. M. Hinsch, was issued in violation of the Corporate Securities Act, was void, gave rise to no rights in the intervener, and the court erred in its finding in that respect" is also well taken.

The evidence is plain that all of the stock in the defendant corporation which is involved in this action was issued in violation of the Corporate Securities Act of the state of California as it existed in 1930 (St. 1917, p. 673, as amended), and that Las Vegas Land & Building Company, being a Nevada corporation, had not obtained a permit to transact business or to issue its corporate stock in California, as required by the act at that time. The finding and judgment of the trial court in this respect is clearly contrary to the evidence.

We believe, also, that the findings of the trial court upon the matters referred to in appellant's points III and IV are contrary to the evidence, and that these points should be sustained.

The judgment is reversed.

PER CURIAM.

In 1927 defendant Raymond R. Allison, a contractor, entered into a contract with Fred H. Bergmann for the construction of a dwelling house on two lots near the town of Los Gatos. Prior to the commencement of work the contract with the plans and specifications was duly filed in the office of the county recorder of Santa Clara county. At the same time a bond was delivered to Bergmann, which was also filed. The contractor began work, but before the completion of the structure disputes arose between the contractor and Bergmann and his architect, and the work ceased. Bergmann thereupon made written demand upon the contractor and upon the Southern Lumber Company, a corporation, whose name appeared as surety on the bond, to complete the structure. The demand was not complied with, and Bergmann proceeded with the work. Before the dwelling was finished, Bergmann died, and his wife, Louise Bergmann, completed the work. Upon Bergmann's death it developed that the lots were owned by him in joint tenancy with his wife, and she was thereafter decreed to be the sole owner thereof by right of survivorship. Ernest F. Bergmann was appointed executor of the last will and testament of the deceased, and in the meantime numerous persons, claiming to have furnished labor and materials in the construction of the dwelling, filed their claims of lien and brought actions to foreclose. Among these claimants were the Southern Lumber Company, E. C. Power, Bryant B. Bailey, James S. Simpson, S. H. Thompson, and Frank A. Bell, and in each action said executor and Louise Bergmann were made defendants. The executor denied ownership and all responsibility in the matter. Louise Bergmann also answered, denying the allegations of the respective complaints, and, with regard to that of the Southern Lumber Company, alleged that, after the abandonment of the work by Allison, she and her husband, then living, made written demand upon this corporation, as surety on the bond, that it fulfill the contract, that it failed to do so, and that consequently she and her husband were forced to take over and complete the work; further alleging by way of counterclaim that, by reason of such failure, she was compelled to expend $8.577 over and above the contract price in completing the structure.

The actions were consolidated for trial. Among other things, the court found that the bond was executed for a sufficient consideration by the contractor as principal and Southern Lumber Company and W. F. Button as sureties, guaranteeing performance by the contractor and agreeing to deliver to the owner the building and premises free and clear of incumbrances. Judgment was entered in favor of Louise Bergmann upon her counterclaim in the sum of $2,528.76; also in favor of the several claimants against the contractor, and the Southern Lumber Company as surety. The lumber company was allowed nothing on its claim, and it was decreed that none of the claims should be enforced against the property.

The lumber company and claimants Power, Bailey, Simpson, Thompson, and Bell have appealed from the judgment.

The company claims that no cause of action upon the bond was stated in the complaints; that the admission of the bond in evidence over objection was error; that Louise Bergmann had no cause of action against the company and that the sureties upon the bond were released from liability by changes in the plans as the work progressed; further, that certain findings are unsupported. The other appellants contend that they were entitled to a judgment against the property as well as against the contractor and his sureties.

[1, 2] As to the pleadings, it was alleged that a bond was executed, and a copy thereof was in some instances annexed thereto as an exhibit. No objection was made by demurrer or otherwise to the sufficiency of any of the pleadings, and the cause appears to have been tried on the assumption that they stated a cause of action on the bond. Where such is the case, objections to the pleadings will be deemed to have been waived. Wagner v. Ruppe, 56 Cal. App. 233, 204 P. 1095. Moreover, where several actions for the foreclosure of mechanics' liens and for judgments against the contractor and his sureties are consolidated for trial, the allegations of the various complaints may be taken together and treated as one pleading; the allegations in one remedying defects or omissions in another. Tyler v. Mitrovich Building Co., 47 Cal. App. 59, 190 P. 208.

[3, 4] With regard to the claim of Louise Bergmann, while as a rule the act or contract by one joint tenant respecting the joint property without the authority or consent of his cotenant cannot bind or prejudicially affect the latter (33 Cor. Jur. "Joint Tenancy," § 22, p. 913), where the act of one joint tenant is beneficial to his cotenant, such act will be regarded as the act of all in so far as sharing in the benefit thereof is concerned (Crary v. Campbell, 24 Cal. 634). Mrs. Bergmann testified that she and her husband were building the house, and this was alleged in substance in her pleading. While she was not named in the bond, this evidence is sufficient to show that her husband was also acting for her in the transaction, and, notwithstanding the agency was undisclosed, she could maintain an action for damages on the contract. 1 Cal. Jur. "Agency," § 131, p. 854; Shader v. White, 173 Cal. 441, 160 P. 557; McKee v. Cunningham, 2 Cal. App. 684, 84 P. 260; Eddy v. American Amusement Co., 9 Cal. App. 624, 99 P. 1115; Wilcox-Rose Construction Co. v. Evans, 9 Cal. App. 118, 98 P. 83; Eldridge v. Mowry, 24 Cal. App. 183, 140 P. 978; Cowan v. Tremble, 111 Cal. App. 458, 296 P. 91.

The bond was signed by the contractor as principal and by W. F. Button as surety. There was also affixed thereto the name of the lumber company as one of the sureties. Its name, "Southern Lumber Co.," was placed thereon by means of a rubber stamp, below which appeared the signature "M. E. McLeod, Asst.-Mgr." McLeod testified, in substance, that he signed the bond at the office of the lumber company; the purpose being that the company might get the business of furnishing the lumber on the job. He would not say that he affixed the stamp thereto, but stated that he might have done so, and that the company had such a stamp at its office; further, that he acknowledged its execution before the attorney for the company, who was also a notary. He also testified that he owned no property. The record discloses no direct evidence of his authority to execute the bond on behalf of the company, or that the company was expressly empowered by its charter to do so. Button, who was also in the employ of the company, testified that the bond was brought to him by McLeod, who stated: "This is the bond for Allison for the Bergmann job. If you sign it we get the job." This witness further stated that at the time of its execution he was married and owned a home worth about $5,000, but had no other assets. After this transaction the attorney for the Bergmanns wrote to the lumber company, referring to the bond, and stating that the company had executed it as surety, and calling attention to the fact that the contract was not being performed according to its terms. No reply was made to the letter.

[5, 6] The rule appears to be well settled that trading corporations may in furtherance of their interests extend financial aid to their customers by way of guaranteeing their obligations; and guaranties of this nature are brought within the scope of the implied powers of the corporation. 7 Cal. Jur. "Corporations," p. 67. A corporation engaged in carrying on a business which it is authorized to do by its articles and the law under which it is organized, has implied power to make all contracts which are essential to the transaction of its ordinary affairs (Civ. Code, § 354, subd. 9, as it existed prior to the revision of 1931), or the making of which is an appropriate means by which it may reasonably be expected that the business in which the corporation is engaged will be advanced, or which tends directly to promote the business authorized by its articles and which it is doing (Woods Lumber Co. v. Moore, 183 Cal. 497, 191 P. 905, 11 A. L. R. 549); and it has been held that a lumber company may become surety on the bond of a building contractor to induce him to purchase of the company the lumber to be used in such building (Central Lumber Co. v. Kelter, 201 Ill. 503, 66 N. E. 543).

[7] It is a fair conclusion from the evidence that McLeod was in charge of the company's business at the place where the bond was signed; and, as stated, the company was later notified of the claim that it had executed the same. If a corporation allows its officers to conduct its business, and third parties act upon the apparent authority thus shown, it cannot defeat the rights of such persons arising from transactions done and completed under such ostensible authority. Venice v. Short Line Beach Land Co., 180 Cal. 447, 181 P. 685.

[8] While ordinarily the fact that a letter is received containing false statements does not impose upon the recipient the duty to reply thereto, nevertheless this depends upon the circumstances, and, as said by Mr. Wigmore, "each case must stand upon its own facts." 2 Wigmore, Evidence, § 1073. The test is found in whether the circumstances are such that in the ordinary practice of mankind the party receiving it would have answered it if he did not acquiesce in the statements it contained. 22 Cor. Jur. "Evidence," § 364, p. 326. The ground of admissibility, however, is not that the letter affords any proof that the statements therein are true, but that silence, when such statements are calculated to draw forth a reply, may be the ground for an inference that the statements are true. Keeling-Easter Co. v. Dunning, 113 Me. 34, 92 A. 929; Ross v. Reynolds, 112 Me. 223, 91 A. 952. Here the inference sought to be drawn was the existence of a contract; and the instances in which such letters have been admitted have usually been cases where they were part of a mutual correspondence, or referred to an existing contract. See notes, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 790; 8 A. L. R. 1163; 34 A. L. R. 560; 55 A. L. R. 460.

[9-11] In the present case, while there was no previous correspondence or contract directly between the company and the owner, we have the circumstance that the lumber company was furnishing the lumber to be used in constructing the dwelling, which it knew was being erected by Allison as contractor; and when during the course of construction a claim was made by the owner that the company was surety for performance by Allison, and that the latter was failing to comply with his contract, the letter reasonably called for some reply. How much weight should be given the fact that no reply was made was of course a question for the trial court, but that it had some probative value seems clear, and this conclusion is supported in principle by the following cases: Ross v. Reynolds, supra; Keeling-Easter Co. v. Dunning, supra; Sonnesyn v. Hawbaker, 127 Minn. 15, 148 N. W. 476; Clay v. Brown, 148 Mo. App. 541, 128 S. W. 803; Downs v. Racine-Sattley Co., 175 Mo. App. 382, 162 S. W. 331; Harmon v. Leberman, 39 Tex. Civ. App. 251, 87 S. W. 203; Mahoney v. Kennedy, 172 Wis. 568, 179 N. W. 754; Murphey v. Gates, 81 Wis. 370, 51 N. W. 573. Furthermore, if McLeod was without authority to execute the bond, the fact was peculiarly within the knowledge of the company, and, notwithstanding this, it offered no evidence on the question. The case is, we think, within the rule that, where the evidence tends to prove a material fact which imposes a liability upon a party, the failure to produce evidence to the contrary where he has the power to do so is ground for the inference that such evidence, if produced, would be unfavorable to him. Wigmore, Evidence, § 285; Bone v. Hayes, 154 Cal. 759, 99 P. 172; Alloggi v. Southern Pacific Co., 37 Cal. App. 72, 173 P. 1117. We are satisfied that sufficient was shown to warrant the admission of the bond in evidence, and to reasonably justify a finding that the company was bound by the act of McLeod.

[12, 13] In this connection it is urged that there was no allegation or finding that the lumber company was estopped to deny that it became a surety. As stated, the pleadings alleged, in substance, that the bond was executed by the lumber company as surety. In an action based upon a contract made by an agent, it is proper to allege that it was made by the principal; and the rule is the same where an ostensible agency based upon estoppel is sought to be established (Resetar v. Leonardi, 61 Cal. App. 765, 216 P. 71), and the findings may follow the language of the pleadings, which was done here (24 Cal. Jur. "Trial," § 213, p. 985).

[14] As work by the contractor progressed, changes were made therein which did not correspond in every particular with the original plans and specifications. It is claimed that this released the sureties from liability.

The contract provided that, should the owner or architect at any time during the progress of the work request any alterations in, additions to, or omissions from the contract, with the plans and specifications, either of them should be at liberty to do so, and the same should not in any way affect or make the contract void. Where a building contract contains such a provision, the surety will be presumed to have known thereof and to have agreed to be bound thereby. People's Lumber Co. v. Gillard, 136 Cal. 55, 68 P. 576; Roberts v. Security Trust & Sav. Bank, 196 Cal. 557, 238 P. 673.

The lumber company claims that certain findings are unsupported. The court found that demand was made by Louise Bergmann that Allison and the company complete the contract. Several letters were written by the attorney employed by her husband and the architect, making such demands. As stated, her husband was her agent, and these demands inured to her benefit. The court found that she was forced to take over and finish the work and to expend certain sums therefor. It is not disputed that due to the default of the contractor her husband took over the work, and that upon his death she continued it, and the evidence was amply sufficient to show the amount found to have been expended in completing the building.

One of the objections in this connection made by the lumber company seems to be that she was not a party to the contract, and not concerned with the completion of the structure. For the reasons stated above, this contention is untenable.

Other findings are attacked upon the ground that they erroneously assume that the lumber company executed the bond, and are consequently unsupported; but, as stated, the evidence sufficiently sustains the conclusion that the company became a surety. Other objections to the findings are also without merit.

[15] The court refused to allow proof by the lumber company of its claim for materials furnished. This was proper, as a surety on a building contractor's bond who has guaranteed the delivery of the building free of liens, as was the case here, cannot enforce a lien against the property. 17 Cal. Jur. "Mechanics' Liens," § 48, p. 80; Blyth v. Robinson, 104 Cal. 239, 37 P. 904; Ganahl v. Weir, 130 Cal. 237, 62 P. 512; Burnett v. Glas, 154 Cal. 249, 97 P. 423; Barrett-Hicks Co. v. Glas, 9 Cal. App. 491, 496, 99 P. 856.

[16, 17] With regard to the appeal by the parties other than the lumber company, as stated, the trial court refused to decree a lien in their favor against the property. They contend that no equities were shown which justified the court in so limiting their relief.

At the time of the transaction, section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure provided: "* * * In case said original contract shall, before the work is commenced, be so filed, together with a bond of the contractor with good and sufficient sureties in an amount not less than fifty (50) per cent. of the contract price named in said contract, which bond shall in addition to any conditions for the performance of the contract, be also conditioned for the payment in full of the claims of all persons performing labor upon or furnishing materials to be used in such work, and shall also by its terms be made to inure to the benefit of any and all persons who perform labor upon or furnish materials to be used in the work described in said contract so as to give such persons a right of action to recover upon said bond in any suit brought to foreclose the liens provided for in this chapter or in a separate suit brought on said bond, then the court must, where it would be equitable so to do, restrict the recovery under such liens to an aggregate amount equal to the amount found to be due from the owner to the contractor, and render judgment against the contractor and his sureties on said bond for any deficiency or difference there may remain between said amount so found to be due to the contractor and the whole amount found to be due to claimants for such labor or materials or both." St. 1911, p. 1313. The record contains no evidence as to the sufficiency of the lumber company as a surety; but it appears beyond question that the bond was executed for the purpose of complying with the statute, and it is presumed that none of the parties intended to commit a fraud by filing an insufficient bond. The burden of showing its insufficiency rested upon appellants. Tyler v. Mitrovich, etc., Co., supra; Sudden Lumber Co. v. Singer, 103 Cal. App. 386, 284 P. 477.

[18, 19] The amount of the bond was $7,950; and as to Button, the other surety, it is clear from his testimony that he was not a good or sufficient surety either at the time the bond was executed or subsequently. The bond provided, in accordance with the above section, that the persons for whose benefit it was given should have a right of action thereon in any suit to foreclose a lien provided for in chapter 2 of title 4 of part 3 of the Code of Civil Procedure, or in a separate suit on the bond. The purpose of such a bond was to create an additional fund or security for the satisfaction of lien claimants (Sunset Lumber Co. v. Smith, 91 Cal. App. 746, 267 P. 738; Hubbard v. Jurian, 35 Cal. App. 757, 170 P. 1093; 17 Cal. Jur. "Mechanics' Liens," § 46, p. 75), and to limit the owner's liability to the contract price (Roystone Co. v. Darling, 171 Cal. 526, 154 P. 15; Sudden Lumber Co. v. Singer, supra). It has been held that to have the latter effect it must conform to the statutory requirement that the sureties be good and sufficient. S. R. Frazee Co. v. Arnold, 46 Cal. App. 74, 188 P. 822. However, as provided by the statute and held in the case last cited, the court has discretionary power in cases of this character, and its conclusion that it would be equitable to restrict the recovery to the contractor and his sureties cannot be disturbed in the absence of a plain abuse of discretion. Here there appears no question regarding the sufficiency of the lumber company as a surety, or its ability to meet all demands against it under the bond. Doubtless this was one of the considerations which moved the court to restrict recovery to a judgment against the contractor and his sureties; and we cannot say that it abused its discretion in so doing.

We are satisfied that the conclusions of the trial court are fairly sustained, and that no error has been shown which would warrant a reversal of the judgment.

The judgment is affirmed.

Civ. 735.

$800 damages for seven months' detention of well-drilling equipment valued at $1,200 held not excessive.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; S. L. Strother, Judge.

Action by Savia Ferris against C. A. Cooper and others. From an adverse judgment, the named defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Strother P. Walton, of Fresno, for appellant.

J. E. Manning, of Sanger (Fred Baruch, Jr., of Fresno, of counsel), for respondent.

MORTON, Justice pro tem.

Plaintiff filed an action of claim and delivery against defendants for a well-drilling rig and equipment which she alleged defendants had taken possession of without her consent. She secured judgment for its return, or its value in the sum of $1,200 as determined by the trial court, together with $800 damages for its detention.

It appears that plaintiff was indebted to defendant Thompson, and with Thompson's authorization in October, 1926, gave a chattel mortgage on the well rig and equipment to defendant Cooper for $401. Thompson was indebted to Cooper in excess of the amount of the mortgage. Plaintiff had paid Cooper $100 on this mortgage at the time of the taking of the well rig outfit which was located on a rented lot in Sanger and the tools for same were in a locked shop situated on an adjoining lot. She had previously endeavored to sell the outfit to Thompson, but he could only buy if Cooper would finance him, which Cooper refused to do. Shortly thereafter Thompson wired plaintiff at Oakland for permission to use the tools, which permission was not granted. Cooper then went to Oakland to see plaintiff about the well rig outfit, but no definite agreement was reached. Defendants took possession of the well rig about April 16, 1929. The tools were secured by breaking open the shop. Some necessary repairs were made and the outfit put to their own use.

[1] Defendant Cooper appeals, contending that he was entitled, under the terms of his chattel mortgage, upon default, to take possession of said personal property and therefore a claim and delivery action would not lie against him. No evidence was offered as to the terms of the note secured by the chattel mortgage or that respondent was in default as to said note and chattel mortgage. No evidence was introduced to show a breach of any obligation or promise of the mortgagor. Appellant Cooper therefore has no basis upon which to justify a taking under the terms of his chattel mortgage. We are also unable to find satisfactory evidence upon which to support appellant's contention that plaintiff instructed him to turn the property over to Thompson and Peterman.

As to appellant being directly involved in the taking possession of the property, we find this testimony on his cross-examination:

"Q. Did you turn the rig over to Mr. Thompson? A. Yes.

"Q. You did, yourself, personally? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Did you tell Mr. Thompson to go and break into the shop and get the tools and parts of the rig? A. No, I didn't know as anybody broke into the shop.

"Q. Well, did you tell him to go into Mrs. Ferris' shop and get the rig—the tools and the things that were in there? A. No, I don't think I did.

"Q. Well, did you—did you not tell Mr. Thompson that that shop—that that building belonged to you and you had a right to go into your own property? A. Well, I might have said—well, I don't know—'I don't see how she can hold this, have the door locked there and never turn it over, and turn me over the rest of it. How am I going to get what belongs to me.'"

In the testimony of defendant Thompson we find the following:

"Q. You just went back and took it. Did you tell Mr. Peterman to break the lock on the shop of Mrs. Ferris? A. I did. * * *

"Q. You wanted to make some casing and could not get into the building, is that it? You knew, that building belonged—was rented by Mrs. Ferris, didn't you? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Still knowing that it was Mrs. Ferris' property in there, you told Mr. Peterman to break the lock, is that it? A. I had authority to break the lock.

"Q. What? A. I had authority from Mr. Cooper for that.

"Q. You had authority from Mr. Cooper to break into the premises of Mrs. Ferris? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. I see. So Mr. Cooper told you to go and break that lock? A. He did."

Considering all this evidence it appears that the taking was the joint act of all three defendants, Cooper, Thompson, and Peterman, and that the property remained in their possession. No definite deal was consummated between Cooper and Thompson whereby Thompson would acquire Cooper's interest. It presumably remained under the joint control of the three defendants; however, Cooper seems to have had the greatest interest because of his former chattel mortgage rights. In claim and delivery, defendants' possession may be actual or constructive. Eastern Outfitting Co., Inc., v. Myers, 39 Cal. App. 316, 180 P. 669; Taylor v. Bernheim, 58 Cal. App. 404, 209 P. 55.

Appellant states: "Since Thompson has not appealed, appellant Cooper is really not concerned with the value of the property as it is to be assumed that the judgment as to the possession of the property has been or will be satisfied." Although somewhat contradictory there is sufficient evidence to support the finding of the trial court as to a value of $1,200 for the well rig and tools.

[2] As damages for detention of the well rig and tools the trial court found for respondent in the sum of $800. Defendants had had possession of the personal property for approximately seven months and, according to the testimony of defendant Thompson, had used it on two well drilling jobs. "The ordinary measure of damages for the wrongful detention of property is interest. Where, however, the property has a usable value which exceeds the lawful rate of interest this rule has no application. In such a case the successful party is entitled to recover, as damages for the detention, the value of such use during the period that he was wrongfully deprived thereof. And this value is to be estimated by the ordinary market price of the use of such property." Tucker v. Hagerty, 37 Cal. App. 789, at page 791, 174 P. 908, 910. See, also, Smith v. Pilgrim (Cal. App.) 3 P.(2d) 573.

Respondent had operated the well drilling business since the death of her husband, approximately two and one-half years, taking contracts for boring wells, etc. She testified a fair rental value for the outfit would be $20 per day. The witness Brose, who was in the well-drilling business and operated a well rig similar to plaintiff's, gave testimony that he received for the use of his machine operated by an experienced man and one helper, $35 for a ten-hour day less 10 per cent. for cash. His experienced man re ived $180 per month, the helper 40 cents per hour. Therefore, by arithmetical computations the trial court could arrive at a fair rental value for the well rig and equipment.

There was sufficient evidence to show that a few months prior to the taking possession of the personal property by defendants it was in fair running condition. In consideration of the fact that the defendants had possession of the personal property for seven months and had used it on at least two well-drilling jobs, we are of the opinion that the damages allowed were not in the least excessive.

Judgment affirmed.

TUTTLE, Justice pro tem.

This is an action to quiet title to real property and to forfeit a lease upon the same. Judgment was entered forfeiting the lease, and defendants appeal therefrom.

The complaint contains two causes of action: One, a simple action to quiet title, and the other setting up facts which it is alleged constitute a forfeiture of the lease. The answer, after denying the allegations of the complaint, sets up five defenses, all of which, except the third, are based upon waiver or estoppel. The lease in question is in the usual form of an oil and gas lease. The following portions thereof are pertinent to this inquiry:

"Covenants: Lessee shall enter upon any portion of lands above described, and shall commence actual operations for the drilling for oil thereon with a standard, rotary or combination rig, within two years from the date hereof, and shall prosecute the work so commenced diligently, continuously, and in good faith, with one crew (unforeseen accidents, delays by the elements or by strikes or causes beyond the control of lessee, Sundays and legal holidays excepted) until oil is found in paying quantities, or this lease abandoned by lessee."

"Time is the essence of this lease and it is mutually well understood and agreed by the parties hereto, that each and every express covenant and condition and obligation in this lease must be fully and specifically performed and within the time specified therefor."

"Conditions: It is mutually agreed that upon default by lessee in the performance of any of his agreements, or any of the conditions or stipulations required by him to be performed or observed, this lease shall cease, and lessors may then assume exclusive possession of said land, except as aforesaid. Lessors shall have no other remedy against lessee for breach of the whole or part of this contract beyond enforcing the forfeiture hereinbefore mentioned, and recovering actual damage herein agreed to be paid by lessee."

By mesne conveyances and assignments, defendants became interested in the lease as lessees or otherwise; and the lessors in said lease, by successive extensions, extended and postponed the time for the commencing of actual drilling operations up to and including the 1st day of January, 1929. Each of said extensions was given in writing by plaintiff G. A. John, who died while this action has been pending. We shall, however, designate him as "plaintiff" in this opinion. The term of the lease was twenty years from its date, November 30, 1920. It was provided therein that the lessee should pay the sum of $50 per month as rental, until the royalties provided for therein should amount to or exceed that sum. This rental was paid.

It is conceded that neither the original lessee nor any of his assignees ever actually commenced operations for the drilling of oil upon said premises, or any portions thereof. From the evidence it appears that defendants, from the year 1922 to 1928, were drilling for oil upon another property which they had under lease, some quarter of a mile from the John premises. A well was brought in on this other property in 1928. In June, 1928, several months after this well was brought in, a Mr. Delaney, representing defendants, came to plaintiffs' ranch and said he wanted to select a drilling place thereon, and asked for an extension of twenty days within which to commence drilling. Plaintiffs thereupon extended the time seventy-five days, whereupon Delaney said: "Now, Mr. John, if I don't start operations in that time, I will gladly walk in here and hand you a quit-claim deed." In October, 1928, nothing had been done toward drilling on plaintiffs' land, and Mr. Nilsson, representing defendants, came to plaintiff and asked for an extension of time to March 31, 1929. On December 27, 1928, two representatives of defendants called upon plaintiff and requested another extension of time. The latter replied that he would have to discuss the matter with his wife before any extension was signed. No further extension was signed, and this action was commenced on February 1, 1929.

The court found, substantially, that no drilling was ever done upon the property; that plaintiffs did not advise defendants or anyone else that they would grant an extension to the defendants for drilling said land, up to March 31, 1929; that none of the defendants has ever been willing or ready to drill for oil upon said lands, under any conditions whatever; and that plaintiffs are not estopped to assert that defendants have forfeited all rights under said lease, but, on the contrary, all the rights of the defendants under the terms of said lease expired January 1, 1929. As law, the trial court concluded that defendants and each of them had no right, title, or interest in the real property described in said lease.

[1] It is first contended that the court erred in sustaining a demurrer to the third defense. The lease provided that, if the market price of oil was 35 cents per barrel or less, the lessee might, at his option, cease producing oil or developing oil wells until such time as the market price of oil should be more than 35 cents per barrel. The gist of the allegations of this defense is that "the market price of oil is less than thirty-five cents (35¢) per barrel of 42 United States gallons, and for that reason the defendants have exercised the option contained in said lease not to drill any oil wells upon the properties owned by the plaintiffs upon which the defendants have an oil and gas lease, as above alleged."

The ruling of the trial court was correct. The precise point was decided adversely to defendants' contention in the case of McComber v. Kellerman, 162 Cal. 749, 124 P. 431, 433, where a similar provision in an oil lease was under consideration. The court there said: "The language was evidently chosen upon the theory that he [defendant] should at all events begin the drilling of a well in good faith, but that, after having begun, he might be allowed to suspend such drilling until the price rose to 75 cents." We conclude that the obligation to commence drilling was entirely independent of any consideration based upon the price of oil, and that the provision giving the lessee the option to cease producing or drilling was not operative until operations had actually commenced. The third defense contained no allegations to the effect that drilling operations had commenced, and therein it was vitally defective.

[2, 3] It is contended that the finding to the effect that plaintiffs are not estopped to assert a forfeiture is not supported by the evidence. It has been held in this state that "the rule that forfeitures are not favored in law does not apply to oil and gas leases." Hall v. Augur, 82 Cal. App. 594, 256 P. 232, 235; Acme Oil & Mining Co. v. Williams, 140 Cal. 681, 74 P. 296. Bearing in mind the foregoing rule, we shall proceed to examine more specifically the points raised. It is claimed that lessors "waived their right of forfeiture by their course of conduct for more than six years after the expiration of the two years provided in the lease as the time within which drilling shall be commenced. Before the lessors can reinstate their right of forfeiture they must give the lessees reasonable notice of their intention to demand strict compliance with the terms of the lease." In support of this contention, appellants rely upon that line of cases which follow the rule laid down by Thornton in his work on oil and gas. He there states that "when rent was accepted by the lessor, with knowledge on his part that the lessee was every day violating the covenants of the lease, it was held that the lessor accepting rent could not declare a forfeiture without a reasonable prior notice that further non-compliance would not be waived." (4th Ed.) 1925, p. 553, § 184.

It will be observed that in the instant case there was no "violation" of the lease during the six-year period. Each extension of time within which to drill was made by the written consent of the plaintiffs. It was only when no work had been done during the last period, from October 1, 1928, to January 1, 1929, that an actionable breach occurred, and immediately thereafter plaintiffs notified defendants that the lease was forfeited. It cannot be said that there was any acquiescence in the breach upon which this action is predicated; hence the rule quoted from Thornton is not applicable. The following cases relied upon by appellants: Consumers' Gas Trust Co. v. Ink, 163 Ind. 174, 71 N. E. 477; Consumers' Gas Trust Co. v. Littler, 162 Ind. 320, 70 N. E. 363, and Denniston v. Kenova Oil Co., 187 Ky. 831, 220 S. W. 1078—are all predicated upon a situation where the lessor has lulled the lessee into a feeling of security and where it would be wholly inequitable to declare a forfeiture based upon a breach which had been virtually condoned. No such facts are presented by this record. Other cases relied upon, such as Johnson v. Armstrong, 81 W. Va. 399, 94 S. E. 753, do not specify that drilling operations should commence within a certain time. In such cases the court stated that a forfeiture should not be declared until the lessee had notice to comply with the condition to drill within a reasonable time. Where, however, the lessee has agreed and is charged with knowledge that he must drill before a specified date, we do not believe that, upon a failure to do so, a forfeiture should be denied upon the mere failure to give notice that drilling must be commenced at some future date. It is only the absence of a certain expiration date which gives rise to the rule in the Johnson Case.

Other authorities cited by appellants have been given careful consideration. They are based, on the whole, upon equitable consideration arising out of the peculiar facts existing in each. Viewing the evidence here from every angle, we cannot see how the trial court could have reached any other conclusion than that pronounced. For some six years defendants held the lease only through the generous acts of their landlord in granting extensions. To say that such acts were "misleading" and "inequitable" is, in truth, "biting the hand which had fed them." Surely, equity should not assist them under such circumstances.

We conclude, therefore, that the findings are amply supported by the evidence, and, the record being free from error, it is ordered that the judgment be, and it is hereby, affirmed.

CULLEY v. COCHRAN, Constable (ROSS, Intervener).

Civ. 899.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

July 16, 1932.

1. Attachment ⇐348.

Indemnitor, having received notice of permission to defend action against constable, could defend without intervening or being substituted as defendant (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 385, 1055).

2. Attachment ⇐348.

That there were other indemnifiers on attachment bond would in itself be sufficient for not substituting such indemnifier as sole defendant in place of constable (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 385, 1055).

3. Appeal and error ⇐78(2).

Order substituting indemnitor for constable as sole defendant in action against constable, and discharging original defendant from all obligation, held appealable (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 385, 1055).

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; V. N. Thompson, Judge.

Action by B. F. Culley against Lester L. Cochran, Constable of Westmoreland Township, Imperial County, wherein J. Edgar Ross intervened as defendant. From an order granting intervener's motion to be substituted for defendant constable as sole defendant and discharging constable from all obligations, plaintiff appeals.

Reversed.

Hickcox & Trude, of El Centro, for appellant.

J. Edgar Ross and Lester L. Cochran, in pro. per.

BARNARD, P. J.

On a former appeal in this action, this court reversed the judgment on the ground that an indemnifier on an attachment bond had been denied the right to participate in the trial and to defend the action after having been served with notice in accordance with section 1055 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and upon the ground that such a person had the right to defend the action without being substituted and without intervening. Most of the facts are set forth in the former opinion (107 Cal. App. 525, 290 P. 484, 486) and need not be here repeated.

After the filing of the remittitur, J. Edgar Ross, the indemnifier in question, moved the court for an order substituting him as sole defendant in the action in the place and stead of the constable, who was named as sole defendant in the complaint. This motion was granted and an order entered substituting Ross for the constable as sole defendant and discharging the said constable from all obligation. From this order the plaintiff in the action has taken this appeal.

[1] It is contended that the showing made in support of the motion was not sufficient to justify the order of substitution. The record discloses that the notice of motion and the order were both based entirely upon the statement that this court, upon the former appeal, had decided that Ross was entitled to be substituted for the original defendant in the action. This court did not so intend to decide, and could hardly have done so, as such an issue was not then presented. Apparently a confusion has arisen because in our former opinion we used this language: "But we think Ross had a right either to intervene, to substitute himself as a party, or to proceed with the action in the name of the original defendant." While that was apparently true, so far as the facts appeared in the record then before us, it was by no means the holding of the court nor was it thus held that Ross should be substituted as sole defendant. While the language we there used is justly subject to criticism as being too broad and unnecessary to the decision, considered in connection with the rest of the opinion, it can hardly be taken as directing the entry of such an order as the one now appealed from. Immediately following the sentence quoted, we said: "Not having intervened or been substituted, he still had the other right. The record conclusively shows that this was his intent; that he had given ample notice thereof; and that he was actually in court demanding the right to conduct the defense of the case in the name of the original defendant." Earlier in the opinion, after giving reasons why such an indemnifier should, under section 1055 of the Code of Civil Procedure, be given rights equal in this respect to one who is substituted under section 385 of this Code, we said: "The natural implication from the section itself" (sec. 1055, Code Civ. Proc.) "is that the party notified is to be permitted to conduct the defense of the action in the name of the original defendant. There is no provision anywhere that he must be made a party to the action, by substitution or intervention, before he may make such defense." Our conclusion was thus stated: "In effect, the trial court held that although Ross, having received the notice provided for in section 1055, was the real party in interest and would be bound by the judgment, he could not defend the action unless he intervened or unless he was substituted as a party. We think this is not the law." The whole purport of our decision was to the effect that the respondent Ross had a right to defend the action without intervening and without being substituted.

[2] Not only do we think the record contains no showing sufficient to justify the order made, but the claim is now advanced that there are other indemnifiers or sureties on this attachment bond, whose liability would be affected by substituting Ross in place of the officer as the sole defendant. If such is the case, this in itself is a sufficient reason for not substituting Ross alone as the sole defendant.

[3] The respondent maintains that the order appealed from is not an appealable order. It purports to substitute Ross as the sole defendant in the action and to discharge the original defendant from all obligation. It attempts to finally determine the rights of at least one party and we think it is therefore appealable. City of Los Angeles v. Los Angeles City Water Co., 134 Cal. 121, 66 P. 198.

The appellant contends that the respondent Ross has no right to participate in the defense of this action, since he alleged in his purported "complaint in intervention" that he "gave" an undertaking to the constable, but did not allege that he "executed" the same. We held in our former opinion that the rights of Ross depended, not upon his so-called complaint in intervention, but upon the facts shown. The court had found that he had "executed and delivered" an undertaking "by the terms of which he obligated himself to pay" the judgment. This finding was not attacked, and our attention was not then called to anything showing the contrary. The present appeal is taken on the judgment roll alone. The bond in question is not now, and never has been before us, and nothing appears in the judgment roll to show that Ross was not a surety on this bond, or to show that he was in fact the plaintiff in the other action in which the bond was given. If, however, as now stated in appellant's brief, the fact is that Ross was not a surety on the bond in the other action, section 1055 had no application, the constable gave notice to the wrong party, Ross had no right to conduct the defense, and everything else said in both of our opinions is inapplicable.

The order appealed from is reversed.

PEOPLE v. GREEN.

Cr. 228.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

July 15, 1932.

Homicide ⇐254.

Evidence held sufficient to support conviction for murder in second degree (Pen. Code, §§ 187–189).

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; A. C. Finney, Judge.

H. B. Green was convicted of murder in the second degree, and he appeals.

Affirmed.

Utley & Nuffer, of El Centro, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Frank Richards, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HARDEN, Justice pro tem.

Defendant appeals from a judgment pronounced upon the verdict of a jury finding him guilty of murder of the second degree and from the order of the court denying his motion for a new trial. The information charged that on or about October 28, 1931, the defendant unlawfully killed and murdered Henry Lester Warren, sometimes known as Ed Warren, a human being.

There is but one point raised on the appeal. Contending that the evidence is insufficient to support the judgment, appellant asks that said judgment be modified, pursuant to the provisions of section 1181, subdivision 6, of the Penal Code, by reducing the offense from that of murder of the second degree to that of manslaughter.

Defendant and said Ed Warren had been employed in the baling of hay on a ranch near Bond's Corner in Imperial county. Warren was a large man and weighed 168 or 170 pounds, while defendant weighed only 103 pounds. During the morning of October 28, 1931, defendant, Warren, Mike Sunday, Cecil Wilson, and Husie Green, who was a nephew of defendant, went by automobile to Calexico. After their arrival at Calexico, the members of the party made several trips back and forth between Calexico and Mexicali, Mexico. On each trip to Mexicali they drank whisky. Defendant drank at least five glasses of whisky. After returning to Calexico, defendant and Warren argued about the weight of hay they had baled; defendant claiming that Warren had "shorted" him in the weighing. Warren threatened to drag defendant out into the street and whip him. At about 1 o'clock in the afternoon, defendant, Warren, Husie Green, and Mike Sunday left Calexico in Warren's car to return to their homes near Bond's Corner. Cecil Wilson returned in another car. On the return trip defendant and Warren continued to argue about the weights of the hay, and defendant called Warren a liar. When they had reached a point near what is called the Ten-Foot Drop, Warren stopped his car and pulled defendant out onto the road and struck him in the face twice, causing his mouth to bleed. During the course of the trouble, Husie Green took from defendant's pocket a knife which was "leaning out." Near this point, Cecil Wilson, traveling by automobile, came upon the scene. Sunday then got into Wilson's car and all parties proceeded a short distance to a house formerly occupied by Warren. Upon getting out of the automobile at said house, defendant, who was quite drunk, fell forward and struck his head against the spring shackle of the car, skinning his forehead. Defendant thereupon stated that he wanted to walk to his home, but was induced to wait. He went into the house and lay down. Warren had brought with him a luncheon which he divided between the parties. Defendant ate part of the food and drank some coffee. They remained there thirty or forty-five minutes. While at this place defendant stated to Warren, "Ed, you choked me down the road," to which Warren replied, "You know damned well I didn't." Defendant thereupon called Warren a liar, and Warren "got up and got straddle of defendant and started to push in on his chest." Warren was persuaded to get off defendant, and thereafter they appeared to become friendly. Defendant stated to Warren, "Ed, any one is a fool to be as good friends as we have been and get in a fight like that, aren't they?" Warren replied, "They sure are." Thereupon they shook hands. Defendant then said some one had taken his gun away from him and that he thought it had occurred while he was in Calexico; and he inquired if any one had his gun. He was told that he had not had any gun, but he contended to the contrary and continued to talk about it. The parties then prepared to leave said place for the purpose of taking defendant to his home. Before departure, Warren inquired of defendant in a joking manner, "You wont let your old lady jump onto me for bringing you in drunk?" to which he replied, "No, she wont bother you." They appeared to be friendly. Thus far the evidence is without substantial conflict.

The evidence of the prosecution's witnesses from this point on is substantially as follows: Warren and defendant proceeded to ride in Warren's car to defendant's home. Wilson and Husie Green rode in Wilson's car. On the way the cars became separated but met near defendant's home, where they were stopped, and the occupants conversed. Warren and defendant appeared to be friendly. Warren and defendant then drove into the yard surrounding defendant's house, followed shortly by Wilson and Husie Green in the other car. Warren brought his car to a stop near the northeast corner of the house. Defendant got out of the car, stepped to the door of the house on the north side near the northeast corner, procured a shotgun, and placed himself a few feet in front of the car. At that time Warren was seated in the front seat of the automobile on the left side behind the steering wheel. The door of the automobile to his immediate left was open and the window down. He was leaning over and was engaged in petting a dog. While he was thus seated, defendant shot him directly in the mouth. Warren died almost immediately. A charge of shot and the wadding from the shotgun shell were found embedded in the muscles of his throat. The testimony of a physician and surgeon was to the effect that the carotid artery was severed; that the injury and shock thus sustained by Warren were sufficient to render him unconscious instantly; that it would be unusual for a person after having received such an injury to take a step or make a move; that he would expect such person to collapse immediately in the direction in which he was leaning. He testified that the charge of shot had not spread to a width of over one and one-half inches, and gave it as his opinion that the gun was held at a point between five and ten feet from Warren at the time it was fired. The gun was a 16-gauge single-barrel shotgun, and the shell contained No. 5 or No. 6 shot. No footprints were noted in the immediate neighborhood of the automobile on the side on which Warren had been seated. He was found lying stretched out at right angles to the automobile with his feet resting on the running board. No blood was found on Warren's car.

Defendant's testimony was to the effect that he had not ridden to his home in Warren's automobile; that he had gone there in the automobile of Cecil Wilson; that upon arrival he had gone into his house; that shortly thereafter he heard a car drive up and stop and heard some one "holler"; that he walked to the door and saw Warren in his car; that Warren then said to him, "I will whip hell out of you and your wife both"; that Warren got out of the car; that defendant reached through a window, got his shotgun, and told Warren to stop; that Warren made another step and started for defendant; that defendant was in fear of being killed by Warren and fired under the influence of that fear. There was no claim that Warren was armed. Defendant's testimony was corroborated by that of his wife. The day following the shooting defendant was examined and found to have a cut one and one-half inches long above his left eye and a lump below his right eye. The inside of his lower lip was cut and his arms were scratched.

Appellant's contention that the evidence does not support the judgment is based upon the single fact that no blood was found upon Warren's car. Starting from this premise, he argues that Warren could not have been seated in the car at the time of the shooting, and contends that the jury should have accepted and acted upon defendant's version of the occurrences immediately surrounding the homicide. The point raised obliges us to examine the evidence to the extent of determining whether it is sufficient to support the verdict. We may not pass upon the weight of conflicting testimony.

We cannot say that the absence of blood on Warren's car after the shooting is so inconsistent with the other facts established by the prosecution as to require an adoption of defendant's evidence as to the occurrences at the time of the shooting. Under the peculiar circumstances it is very probable that, upon being shot, Warren slipped and fell headlong from his car in such a manner as to prevent its becoming spattered with any blood. That was evidently the view the jury took of the situation. We think there was ample evidence to support such view.

Said point as to what inferences might be drawn from the evidence raises the question of whether or not the evidence is sufficient to sustain the implied finding of the jury that in the shooting the defendant was actuated by malice. If there was malice, either express or implied, the homicide was murder. Sections 187, 188, 189, Pen. Code. We think the evidence was ample to justify the finding that defendant was actuated by malice at the time of the shooting. Considerable time had elapsed since the last dispute between him and Warren. They had spoken of their foolishness in having engaged in a fight and had shaken hands. They seemed to be on friendly terms and had ridden together from the scene of the last altercation to defendant's house. There was ample cooling time between the time of the trouble at the house formerly occupied by Warren and the shooting to warrant a finding that defendant was not acting under the influence of a sudden quarrel or heat of passion. Doubtless the jury charged the act to ill will engendered by what defendant regarded as mistreatment received by him at the hands of Warren earlier in the day.

There is no need for further discussion nor citation of authorities. Our conclusion that the evidence was sufficient to justify the jury in finding that in the commission of the homicide the defendant was actuated by malice is a complete answer to the only point raised on the appeal.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

FRATESSA et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY.

Civ. 8593.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California.

Aug. 16, 1932.

Rehearing Denied Aug. 29, 1932. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 27, 1932.

Attorney and client ⇐75(1).

Plaintiff stockholders, supplanted by corporation and receiver, could not require substitution of attorneys, particularly where other attorneys were permitted to represent them on question of compromise settlement.

Application by Paul F. Fratessa and others for a writ of mandate to be directed to the Superior Court in and for Los Angeles County.

Peremptory writ denied without prejudice.

Rollin L. McNitt and David R. Faries, both of Los Angeles, and Stanislaus A. Riley, of San Francisco, for petitioners.

Joseph L. Lewinson and Hewitt, McCormick & Crump, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WORKS, P. J.

Petitioners and two others, as stockholders of the Sunset Pacific Oil Company, brought suit in respondent court for the purpose of procuring an accounting and to recover a money judgment from the defendants, excepting the corporation named, which was one of them. The suit was thus commenced because of the refusal of the corporation to begin such an action and was commenced for its benefit. Later the corporation filed a cross-complaint praying for the relief which plaintiffs had demanded in the complaint. Later still the property of the corporation was placed in the hands of a receiver under order of the United States District Court, and the receiver was substituted, in the action in the superior court, as cross-complainant in the place and stead of the corporation.

Counsel for plaintiffs, as it is alleged in the petition, without the knowledge or consent of petitioners, entered into and closed negotiations with the defendants for the purpose of compromising the subject matter of the suit, and at the time when the alternative writ in the present proceeding issued respondent court was engaged in the trial of the question whether the proposed compromise should be approved. Pending this trial, petitioners moved respondent court for a substitution of certain counsel in the place and stead of those attorneys who had theretofore represented plaintiffs in the action, and the motion was denied. Petitioners then asked this court for the writ of mandate for the purpose of compelling the substitution of attorneys, and an alternative writ issued. The paper also contained language prohibiting respondent court from proceeding with the trial of the compromise question.

All of the matters above alleged appear, among other things unnecessary to point out, on the face of the petition.

Upon the return day, respondents presented a demurrer to the petition and also an answer. Stipulations were then made which disposed of all questions of fact, and argument was presented upon the facts and upon the question of law raised by the demurrer together. The proceeding was decided from the bench, but, as the minutes of the court show the orders made in a somewhat informal style, an amended or corrected order changing the form, but not the substance, of the orders as shown by the minutes, is appended to this opinion. In the orders made from the bench no disposition was made of the demurrer to the petition. That omission is supplied at the end of the amended orders to which we have referred.

The reasons for our conclusions may be very briefly stated, although many points were made at the argument. We think the petitioners, together with the two others joined with them as plaintiffs in the action, have become supernumerary parties in the trial of the question whether the compromise shall be approved by the court, this because the corporation filed cross-complaint and because the receiver was substituted for it as cross-complainant. We think this substitution was the equivalent of a substitution of the receiver as plaintiff in the place and stead of the eight persons who filed the complaint. There is therefore no room for a substitution of attorneys to represent either those eight or a majority of them.

We entertain no doubt that the receiver, under the order of the United States District Court requiring him to take possession of the assets of the corporation, took over the chose in action upon which the suit was founded, and that he is therefore a proper plaintiff in the action.

At the hearing on the facts—law and facts having been presented together as above observed—it appeared that, while respondent court denied the motion for a substitution of attorneys, it was ordered that the counsel desired to be substituted might "appear and represent the plaintiffs whom they represent." These plaintiffs were the same persons who are petitioners in the present proceeding. The counsel last mentioned were then and had theretofore been present in court. The special order made by the court would seem to have given the counsel the same powers, in so far as the question on trial was concerned, as would have been conferred upon them by a formal substitution.

The mandatory portion of the writ is vacated, and a peremptory writ of mandate is denied without prejudice to a future application for the writ of mandate if respondent court shall refuse to approve the compromise now before it for approval. The prohibitive features of the writ are vacated. Demurrer sustained.

Justice IRA F. THOMPSON, although present on the bench when this proceeding was determined and participated in the decision, does not participate in the foregoing opinion, as he is now absent.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California.

Aug. 11, 1932.

Rehearing Granted Aug. 26, 1932.

1. Poisons ⇐9.

In prosecution for unlawful "possession" of morphine, it was necessary to prove possession was immediate and exclusive and under defendant's dominion and control (Deering's Gen. Laws Supp. 1925–1927, Act 5994, § 8).

The word "possession," as used in Deering's Gen. Laws Supp. 1925–1927, Act 5994, § 8, means not only an immediate and exclusive possession on the part of the defendant, but also that such possession must be under his dominion and control.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Possession," see Words and Phrases.]

2. Poisons ⇐9.

Evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction of unlawful possession of morphine.

3. Poisons ⇐9.

It is not essential to conviction of unlawfully possessing illegal article, as morphine, to show defendant had illegal article on his person.

4. Poisons ⇐9.

In prosecution for unlawfully possessing morphine, instruction that defendant was guilty if he aided and abetted, or, not being present, advised and encouraged another to obtain possession, held erroneous as omitting elements of dominion and control.

5. Criminal law ⇐823(4).

Conviction for unlawfully possessing morphine held not reversible for erroneous charge on possession, where facts established all elements of possession as defined in instruction previously given.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Lile T. Jacks, Judge.

William Sinclair and another were jointly convicted of unlawful possession of morphine, and Sinclair appeals.

KNIGHT, J.

The appellant, Sinclair, and one Harry Stauch were charged jointly with having had in their possession unlawfully a quantity of morphine. They were tried together and found guilty; and each was sentenced to imprisonment in the county jail for ninety days. Sinclair appealed, and as grounds for reversal urges that the evidence as to him is insufficient to sustain the conviction, and that the trial court erroneously instructed the jury.

There is no dispute about the facts. It appears therefrom that, pursuant to a prearranged plan, an inspector of the state narcotic division named Nelson and an informer were standing on the corner of Hyde and McAllister streets in San Francisco about 6 o'clock in the evening, and in a few minutes an automobile driven by appellant approached the corner and stopped. The informer introduced Nelson to appellant, whereupon Nelson and the informer entered the automobile and occupied the rear seat. Nelson then told appellant that he wanted to buy some morphine for his "old lady." Appellant inquired whether he "wanted to make a regular meet with him every day," and Nelson replied that he did. Nelson and the informer then paid appellant $2.50 each in marked money for the purchase of the morphine, and appellant proceeded to drive up McAllister street. Upon reaching the corner of Polk and McAllister streets, appellant stopped the automobile and picked up his codefendant Stauch. The automobile then turned up and proceeded along Polk street, but traveled only a few yards when it was crowded to the curb and stopped by an automobile driven by another state narcotic inspector named Conley. When appellant observed the Conley car closing in on him, he directed Stauch to "drop the window and throw that out," and, complying with such directions, Stauch immediately threw a match box out of the window into the street; and, as soon as the car was stopped, Nelson alighted, picked up the match box, and it was found to contain two cubes of morphine.

[1-3] Where, as here, possession as distinguished from sale is charged, in order to establish guilt it is essential to prove that the possession was immediate and exclusive and under the dominion and control of the person charged with such possession. People v. Herbert, 59 Cal. App. 158, 210 P. 276. The jury in the present case was so instructed, and the foregoing facts are amply sufficient to establish all of the elements of the crime. As will be noted therefrom, appellant was in the exclusive control of the automobile; he bargained for the sale of the morphine, and accepted the money therefor; he picked up the person having physical possession of the morphine; and the morphine was subject to and under appellant's dominion and control because it was thrown out of the automobile when appellant so directed. Appellant argues that it is necessary to show that the person accused has the unlawful article on his person, but he has called our attention to no case so holding; and manifestly such is not the law, because, if it were, it would exclude entirely from the operation of the statute (Deering's Gen. Laws Supp. 1925–1927, Act 5994, § 8) cases of joint possession or possession by carrying the illegal article in an automobile or other conveyance, or keeping it in some place under the immediate and exclusive control of the accused.

[4, 5] The court also gave the following instruction: "* * * All persons concerned in the commission of a crime, whether they directly commit the act constituting the offense or aid and abet in its commission, or not being present have advised and encouraged its commission, are principals in any crime so committed. So that in the case before you, if you are satisfied beyond all reasonable doubt that the defendants, or either of them, directly committed the crime charged, or that they, or either of them, aided and abetted in its commission, or not being present advised and encouraged its commission, you are justified in finding them guilty as principals." The rule embodied in said instruction evidently has no application to cases such as this where the accused is charged with possession, as distinguished from sale, for, as the court previously instructed the jury, the word "possession" as used in the statute means, not only an immediate and exclusive possession on the part of the accused, but also that such possession must be under his dominion and control. Therefore an instruction to the jury that the accused is guilty of possession if it be established merely that he aided or abetted, or not being present advised and encouraged, another to obtain and have possession of the illegal article, does not correctly state the law because it omits the elements of dominion and control. The giving of the instruction does not call for a reversal of the judgment, however, for the reason that the facts above narrated are amply sufficient to establish all the elements of possession as that term was defined in the instruction previously given.

The judgment is affirmed.

DALTON v. LOS ANGELES COLLEGE OF CHIROPRACTIC et al.

Civ. 8431.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California.

July 30, 1932.

Rehearing Denied Aug. 27, 1932.

1. Appeal and error ⇐1011(1).

Judgment will not be reversed merely because there is conflict in the evidence.

2. Evidence ⇐538.

Physician, experienced in observation and treatment of burns, including electrical burns, held competent to testify concerning propriety of diathermy treatment given by chiropractor alleged to have burned patient.

3. Appeal and error ⇐1135.

Questions raised by appellant held so unsubstantial as to require judgment be affirmed (Rules of the Supreme Court and District Courts of Appeal, rule 5, § 3).

Questions raised merely involved conflict of evidence, and competency of physician to testify concerning propriety of treatment given by chiropractor charged with having burned a patient while giving a diathermy treatment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Arthur Keetch, Judge.

Action by George E. Dalton against Los Angeles College of Chiropractic and Charles Henry Wood. From judgment for plaintiff, Charles Henry Wood appeals. On respondent's motion to dismiss or affirm.

Affirmed.

Joe Crider, Jr., and Elber H. Tilson, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Stephen Monteleone, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J.

This motion to dismiss appeal or affirm the judgment is made upon the ground that the appeal is taken for delay only, and on the further ground that the questions upon which the decision of the cause depends are so unsubstantial as not to need further argument. The motion is based upon appellant's opening brief, and on the transcript, and on the points and authorities of respondent in support of the motion.

This motion is made under the new section 3 of rule V of the Rules of the Supreme Court and District Courts of Appeal, which was printed in The State Bar Journal of June, 1932, at page 138. This is a new section which became effective July 1, 1932, and this is the first motion which has been presented for consideration to this court under the new rule. The new section reads as follows: "At any time after the filing of the opening brief of an appellant in a civil action, the respondent may, upon due notice, move for a dismissal of the appeal or an affirmance of the judgment or order on the ground that the appeal was taken for delay only or that the questions on which the decision of the cause depends are so unsubstantial as not to need further argument. A motion to dismiss may be united in the alternative with a motion to affirm. Although the court may, upon consideration of the motion to dismiss or the motion to affirm, refuse to grant the motion, it may, if it concludes that the case is of such a character as not to justify further argument, order the cause transferred to a 'ready for submission docket.' Causes on the 'ready for submission docket' will be submitted and disposed of from time to time as the regular order of business will permit. If the respondent's brief is not on file at the time the motion is heard, the service and filing of the notice of motion to dismiss or affirm shall extend the time for filing respondent's brief until the expiration of ten days after decision of the motion, or such further time as the court may allow. The court, on its own motion, may issue an order to show cause why an appeal from any such judgment or order should not be dismissed or the judgment or order be affirmed on the ground that the appeal is frivolous or otherwise without substantial merit. If a dismissal of the appeal or an affirmance of the judgment be not ordered on the hearing of the order to show cause, the case may be transferred to the 'ready for submission docket' and be disposed of in like manner as on a motion to dismiss or affirm."

In the same number of The State Bar Journal, page 133 thereof, in an article concerning the new rule, the following statement is made:

"The genesis of this rule is found in rule 7, subdivisions 4 and 5, of the Supreme Court of the United States, promulgated in principle as early as December 22, 1911, and continued in amendments to the rules effective July 1, 1925, and July 1, 1928 (Pocket Supp., p. 10, vol. 1, U. S. Digest, 50 Sup. Court Rep. xxix), which provide as follows: 4. The court will receive a motion to affirm on the ground that it is manifest that the appeal was taken for delay only, or that the questions on which the decision of the cause depends are so unsubstantial as not to need further argument. The procedure provided in paragraph 3 of this rule for motions to dismiss shall apply to and control motions to affirm. A motion to affirm may be united in the alternative with a motion to dismiss. 5. Although the court upon consideration of a motion to dismiss or a motion to affirm may refuse to grant the motion, it may, if it concludes that the case is of such a character as not to justify extended argument, order the cause transferred for hearing to the summary docket. The hearing of causes on such docket will be expedited from time to time as the regular order of business may permit. A cause may be transferred to the summary docket on application, or on the court's own motion. See rule 28, paragraphs 3 and 6.

"In the case of Grubb v. Public Utilities Commission, etc., 281 U. S. 470, 50 S. Ct. 374, 376 [74 L. Ed. 972], decided in 1930, the court, in commenting upon this rule (rule 7, sec. 4), says: 'The appellees now have interposed a motion, under subdivision 4 of rule 7 of the Rules of this court (28 USCA § 354), that the decree be affirmed without awaiting oral argument upon the ground that the objections taken to the decree are so unsubstantial as not to admit of debate; and the parties have submitted full briefs in this connection. * * * We think it follows from what has been said that the objections taken to the decree below are so unsubstantial that the motion to affirm without awaiting oral argument should be sustained. Decree affirmed.'

"To the same effect are numerous other cases, indicating the court's inclination to dispose of cases upon motion to affirm on the ground that the objections taken to the decree below are so unsubstantial as not to admit of debate.

"For the purposes of the motion to dismiss, says the Supreme Court of the United States in Louisville & N. R. R. Co. v. Melton, 218 U. S. 36, 49, 30 S. Ct. 676 [54 L. Ed. 921, 47 L. R. A. (N. S.) 84], the issue is whether it is apparent that the question has been so explicitly foreclosed as to leave no room for contention, and hence cause the question to be frivolous. The court, however, in this particular case, on motion to dismiss held that the contention should not prevail even though it be admitted that a careful analysis of previous cases would manifest that they are decisive of the case at bar.

"These references to the rulings of the Supreme Court of the United States are illustrative of the position taken by that tribunal upon such motions. In fact, by reason of this and other expeditionary procedure, the Supreme Court of the United States is able to keep abreast of its docket.

"The new section 3, of rule 5, of the rules of the Supreme Court and District Courts of Appeal, is designed to accomplish this same purpose and to enable the court to place in a reservoir of cases that may be submitted from time to time, as the opportunity arises, all cases in which the court feels that the appeal was taken for delay or is not meritorious."

[1] In appellant's brief on this appeal it is said the questions involved are: "Whether or not appellant was guilty of malpractice; and whether or not malpractice of a chiropractor can be established by the testimony of a physician or surgeon." The first question is in substance a question arising out of appellant's contention that the evidence is insufficient to support the implied finding of the jury that the treatment administered by the defendant to the plaintiff was a treatment administered negligently and proximately resulted in the burns and other injuries alleged in the complaint. The alleged injuries occurred in connection with the application to the person of plaintiff by the defendant of an electrical appliance known as a diathermy machine. There is abundant evidence showing that appellant was a chiropractor engaged in practice as a chiropractic physician; that the plaintiff was his patient; that the diathermy machine was used by the defendant in the course of his treatment of the plaintiff and that the treatment, if administered in the manner described by some of the testimony, was improperly and negligently applied. Under these circumstances there are numberless authorities that a judgment will not be reversed merely because there is a conflict in the evidence.

[2] The second question suggested by appellant rests upon his contention that the court erred in admitting testimony of men of schools other than the chiropractic school to which appellant belonged, as to whether the treatment given was proper or improper; and particularly that the court permitted the witness Dr. Monteleone to give his opinion as to whether or not the treatment given in this particular case was proper or improper—all over the objection of appellant. Dr. Monteleone was a physician who, according to his own testimony, had professional experience in the observation and treatment of large numbers of cases wherein patients were burned in a variety of ways, including electrical burns. It also appeared that the use of diathermy is not peculiar to chiropractic practice, but is taught and included in the practice of the various schools of medicine; that the principal books and journals which discuss diathermy and the use of diathermy machines are written by medical authorities other than those of the chiropractic school. From these facts it is clear that Dr. Monteleone was a competent witness on the subject, notwithstanding the fact that he is not a chiropractic physician. Hutter v. Hommel (Cal. Sup.) 3 P.(2d) 554.

[3] Since it thus appears that, in the words of said section 3, rule V, "the questions on which the decision of the cause depends are so unsubstantial as not to need further argument," and that on the very face of the record the appeal is without merit, it is ordered that the judgment be and the same is hereby affirmed.

Civ. 7823.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California.

July 30, 1932.

Appeal and error ⇐1135.

Point presented on appeal held so manifestly lacking in merit as to justify inference that appeal was taken for delay only and to require affirmance (Rules of the Supreme Court and District Courts of Appeal, rule 5, § 3).

Point presented was that court erred in striking alleged affirmative defense that payee had orally agreed that note sued on would not be enforced until makers had sold realty acquired by them and in refusing to permit evidence in support of such defense.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Thomas C. Gould, Judge.

Action by Alfred Thomas against D. F. Caine, sometimes known as Daniel F. Caine, also known as Dan F. Caine, and another. From judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. On respondent's motion to dismiss appeal.

Charles E. R. Fulcher, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J.

The action is on a promissory note dated March 14, 1930, and by its terms due ninety days after April 1, 1930. Judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendants appeal therefrom. Respondent moves to dismiss the appeal as one taken for delay only, and also as being an appeal which presents no substantial question.

For a statement concerning section 3 of rule V of this court, see decision this day rendered in Dalton v. Los Angeles College of Chiropractic, a Corporation, et al. (Cal. App.) 13 P.(2d) 546. As shown by the opening brief of appellants, the only error relied upon by them arises out of the fact that the court struck out their affirmative defense, and refused to allow them to introduce evidence in support of that defense. The alleged defense was that in the course of the transaction which led to the execution of the note there was an oral agreement between the parties that the payee would not enforce payment of the note until the defendants should dispose of certain real property acquired by them. There was no claim made by defendants asserting any fraud in connection with the making of the note, or any want of consideration therefor. The point presented in support of the appeal is so obviously without merit as to justify the inference that the appeal was taken for delay only. Lindemann v. Coryell, 59 Cal. App. 788, 212 P. 47.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. Carriers ⇐134.

Evidence justified finding that private carrier did not use ordinary care to prevent shipment becoming rain-damaged.

2. Carriers ⇐107.

It was private carrier's duty to use "ordinary care" to prevent damage to merchandise shipped (Civ. Code, § 2114).

"Ordinary care" is such care as would be used by person of ordinary prudence under same or similar circumstances.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Ordinary Care," see Words and Phrases.]

3. Negligence ⇐136(14).

What facts are necessary to prove use of, or lack of, ordinary care, is usually fact question for trier of facts.

If different conclusion on the subject of negligence can be rationally drawn from the evidence, it is a question of fact; but, if only one conclusion can reasonably be drawn from the evidence, it is a question of law.

4. Trial ⇐105(2).

Private carrier failing to object to evidence respecting damages to shipment and to method of measuring damages accepted it as competent and that correct rule was being followed.

5. Damages ⇐157(1).

If plaintiff was entitled to recover, that he sought damages according to wrong measure would not preclude awarding damages to which he was entitled according to their true measure.

6. Carriers ⇐134.

Evidence held to authorize damages for private carrier's negligence in permitting shipment to become rain-damaged.

7. Carriers ⇐135.

Damages allowable for permitting shipment to become rain-damaged was difference between market values of shipment in good condition and of deteriorated product at destination.

8. Damages ⇐45.

Party who in minimizing damages from another's breach of contract incurs additional expenses in good faith may recover such expenses as item of damages.

9. Carriers ⇐135.

Private carrier held liable for costs of reconditioning figs and fig paste damaged through its negligence and for freight to shipper's plant for reconditioning and returning merchandise to destination.

10. Trial ⇐139(1).

Motion for nonsuit should be denied if there is any evidence tending to sustain action.

The motion for nonsuit admits the truth of plaintiff's evidence, and every inference of fact that can be reasonably drawn therefrom, and on such motion, evidence should be interpreted most strongly against defendant, and any evidence in conflict with that favorable to plaintiff may be disregarded.

11. Evidence ⊂474(20).

Shipper's employee familiar with proper condition and value of shipper's products held qualified to testify to damage caused to shipment by rain.

12. Appeal and error ⊂232(2).

Overruling objection to question whether shipper was damaged because merchandise was rain-soaked held not to authorize competency or relevancy of subsequent questions relating to damages to be raised for first time on appeal.

13. Appeal and error ⊂1010(1).

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; Denver S. Church, Judge.

Action by W. C. Cook & Company, Incorporated, against the White Truck & Transfer Company. From an adverse judgment, defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Louis, Quillian & Pool, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Charles A. Hill, of Fresno, for respondent.

THOMSON, Justice pro tem.

This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment of the trial court, sitting without a jury, in the sum of $850.26, in an action for damages for injury to certain dried figs and fig paste, by reason of rain damage, while being transported by defendant from Clovis, Fresno county, Cal., to San Pedro, Cal. Defendant also attempted to appeal from the order of the trial court denying its motion for a nonsuit. Defendant's notice of appeal also sets forth an intention to appeal from the order denying its motion for a change of venue, but appellant concedes that that part of its appeal is not well taken and it is therefore dismissed.

On or about October 30, 1927, respondent engaged the services of appellant to transport, for a valuable consideration agreed upon by the parties, two truck loads of packed dried figs and fig paste, from Clovis to San Pedro. Pursuant thereto appellant loaded the merchandise at respondent's manufacturing plant at Clovis and hauled it to the agreed point of destination, where it was found that a portion of the merchandise was wet. Respondent claimed that the merchandise became rain-soaked by reason of the negligence of appellant's agents in not properly protecting it from the rain while in transit. Appellant denied the negligence.

At the close of respondent's case in chief appellant moved for a nonsuit, which motion was denied, and appellant now claims that the trial court erred in denying such motion and sets forth the following grounds for such asserted error: (1) That there was no proof of negligence on the part of appellant, and (2) that respondent failed to prove damage.

Appellant contends that the trial court applied the law relating to the liability of a common carrier and, therefore, held the appellant to the liability of an insurer. Respondent does not claim that appellant was a common carrier, but admits that appellant was a private carrier at the time of the transaction involved in this case. Nor does the record disclose anything to indicate that the trial court applied the law relating to the liability of a common carrier, or held the appellant as an insurer.

[1] Mr. Allan H. Rabin was the only witness called by respondent to prove its case in chief. He testified, in substance, that he was employed by respondent and was in charge of respondent's sales; that he was present at Clovis when all of the merchandise was delivered to appellant and loaded on appellant's two uncovered trucks, referred to by the witness as "stakebody, flat body trucks"; that he then and there examined each case and each other package of such merchandise and that all the merchandise was dry and "in absolutely first-class condition" when so delivered; that the first load left Clovis some time on October 30th and the second on October 31st, at 4 o'clock in the morning; that there had been no rain at Clovis while the merchandise was being loaded, but that it began to rain on the morning of October 31st; that he saw the merchandise when it arrived in San Pedro and the cases containing the merchandise were water-soaked and the floor of the truck had water on it. Mr. Rabin also testified that, while the merchandise was being loaded at Clovis, he told appellant's driver that the packages contained figs. Two documents in evidence, which were identified by Mr. Rabin on cross-examination, showed that appellant knew that the merchandise to be shipped consisted of dried figs and fig paste. Mr. Rabin further testified that the tarpaulins used to cover the loads of said figs and fig paste on the trucks "appeared to be old and not in first class condition"; that the tarpaulins were thrown flat over the trucks, and flat on the load, without any ridge pole; that he was informed by the driver of one of the trucks that he was delayed for the reason that the truck "was stalled up on the Ridge Route because of a terrific rain."

[2-4] With such evidence before it, the trial court was justified in concluding that appellant, knowing the nature of the merchandise intrusted to its care, did not use ordinary care in making such a long trip in rainy weather, with open trucks, using defective tarpaulins placed flat upon the loads of dried figs and fig paste, without the use of ridge poles. It was the duty of appellant as a private carrier to use at least ordinary care and diligence to prevent damage to such merchandise; that is, such a degree of care as would be used by a person of ordinary prudence under the same or similar circumstances (Civ. Code, § 2114; 4 R. C. L. p. 549; 4 Cal. Jur. p. 815; Garrette v. Grangers' Business Ass'n, 58 Cal. App. 396, 399, 208 P. 1010). What facts are necessary to prove the use of, or lack of, ordinary care in a given case is usually a question of fact for the jury, or the trial court if sitting without a jury (27 R. C. L. p. 1004; Garrette v. Grangers' Business Ass'n, supra. If different conclusions on the subject of negligence can be rationally drawn from the evidence, it is a question of fact; but, if only one conclusion can reasonably be drawn from the evidence, it is a question of law. Hoff v. Los Angeles Pacific Co., 158 Cal. 596, 599, 112 P. 53. In the instant case it cannot be said as a matter of law that the evidence failed to show a lack of ordinary care. In fact, there was ample evidence from which the trial court was justified in concluding that appellant failed to use ordinary care to prevent respondent's property from becoming rain damaged.

[5-7] Appellant further argues that respondent failed to prove any damages. It is appellant's contention that the basis of computing the damages to a shipment of merchandise of the character involved in this case is the difference between the market value of the commodity in good condition at the point of destination, and the market value of the deteriorated product at the same point, at the time of arrival. This is undoubtedly the rule as applied to perishable property. American Fruit Growers, etc., v. Pac. Elec. Ry. Co., 72 Cal. App. 682, 686, 238 P. 105; Murray v. Southern Pacific Co., 89 Cal. App. 741, 745, 265 P. 337; Murray v. Southern Pacific Co., 112 Cal. App. 150, 155, 296 P. 667. Although respondent apparently attempted to prove its damages in a different manner, that is, by having Mr. Rabin testify what the amount of loss was and then explain what that loss consisted of, appellant did not object to the introduction of such evidence, so far as the record discloses, nor suggest that a different method or measure be followed. This was in effect an acceptance of the evidence as competent upon the question of damage and that the correct rule for their measurement was being followed. As stated by the Supreme Court in the case of Durkee v. Chino Land and Water Co., 151 Cal. 561, 569, 570, 91 P. 389, 392: "If, in the opinion of defendant, the rule adopted" (for the measure of damages) "was not the correct one, it was defendant's duty to have objected to the evidence offered under it and to have insisted upon the proper rule being applied. This would have given counsel for plaintiff, if he was pursuing the wrong course, an opportunity for rectifying his mistake, or, in the event of dispute between counsel as to the true rule, would have afforded an opportunity to the court to declare it. * * * It is to be assumed that defendant deemed the rule which was followed as favorable to itself as any other which it might suggest." See, also, Phillips v. Stark, 186 Cal. 369, 371, 199 P. 509; Hamberger-Polhemus Co. v. Lewin, 101 Cal. App. 704, 707, 282 P. 425. If respondent is entitled to recover, the fact that he seeks damages according to the wrong measure is inconsequential and does not preclude the court from according him the damages to which he is entitled according to their true measure (Nielsen v. Swanberg, 99 Cal. App. 270, 277, 278 P. 876).

There was, however, sufficient properly admitted evidence before the court to sustain the conclusion that respondent was damaged and to support the court's conclusion as to the amount thereof, measured by the rule first above stated. Mr. Rabin testified that a certain portion of the merchandise was a total loss by reason of being water-soaked, when it arrived at its destination, and that the market value of this portion of the fruit, in an uninjured condition, was $450. He further testified that the difference in value of the damaged fruit which was reconditioned, before and after such damage, was much greater than $603. Although the witness, in using the above figures, did not specifically state that these figures represented the market value of such merchandise at San Pedro, at the time of arrival, he had just previously been testifying about the merchandise at San Pedro, and the time of its arrival there, and the market value of the merchandise, and the trial court was justified in drawing the inference that the witness meant such market value at said time and place.

[8, 9] On behalf of respondent Mr. Rabin testified that the cost of labor and other expenses for reconditioning the damaged figs and fig paste was $200, and that the freight for shipping that portion of the merchandise from San Pedro to respondent's plant at Clovis and for returning the reconditioned merchandise to San Pedro was $247.64. Appellant contends that these two items should not be allowed to respondent, and argues that the value of the merchandise after reconditioning might even be less than its value at San Pedro at the time of delivery there by appellant. But the testimony of Mr. Rabin was to the effect that the difference in market value of the merchandise before and after the damage was in excess of $603, whereas the cost of reconditioning that portion of the merchandise and the freight thereon amounted to a total sum of $447.64. It is the duty of one who knows he is threatened with detriment to his property through another's breach of contract for which he can recover damages, to do all that he reasonably can to prevent or minimize such damages. If, in thus forestalling injury, the party against whom the breach is committed incurs expenses which he would not otherwise have incurred, and thereby succeeds in preventing a still greater loss, such expenses, if made in good faith, become an item of damages which he is entitled to recover. 8 Cal. Jur. pp. 782, 783; Ash v. Soo Sing Lung, 177 Cal. 356, 362, 170 P. 843. As stated in 8 California Jurisprudence, p. 783: "Thus, expenses incurred in the reconditioning of injured goods, whereby their value was increased beyond the expense of the process, are properly allowed as damages for the injury, the defendant having the benefit of its increased value." See, also, Olcovich v. Grand Trunk Ry. Co., 179 Cal. 332, 337, 176 P. 459; Crystal Ice., etc., Co. v. Renschler P. Co., 99 Cal. App. 417, 423, 278 P. 874; Joerger v. Pac. Gas & Elec. Co., 207 Cal. 8, 28, 276 P. 1017. The evidence shows that the loss on the reconditioned portion of the merchandise, if not reconditioned, would have been in excess of $603, whereas the cost of reconditioning which was allowed as an item of damage by the court was only $447.64.

[10] The motion for a nonsuit admits the truth of plaintiff's evidence, and every inference of fact that can be reasonably drawn therefrom, and, upon such a motion, the evidence should be interpreted most strongly against the defendant, and any evidence in conflict with that favorable to plaintiff may be disregarded. If there is any evidence tending to sustain plaintiff's action, the motion for a nonsuit should be denied. Hoff v. Los Angeles Pac. Co., supra; Scrimsher v. Reliance Rock Co. (Cal. App.) 2 P.(2d) 862, Sept. 3, 1931; Murray v. Southern Pacific Co., supra.

From the foregoing it is apparent that respondent proved, in its case in chief, both actionable negligence on the part of appellant and also the damages allowed by the trial court, and the appellant's motion for a nonsuit, therefore, was properly denied.

[11, 12] Appellant contends that all of the evidence of the witness Rabin relating to damages was inadmissible because he was not qualified to testify upon the subject. However, the evidence shows that Rabin was in charge of respondent's sales. In such capacity he would naturally be familiar with the proper condition and value of respondent's products. Such objection would go to the weight, rather than the competency, of his testimony. If appellant was dissatisfied with the evidence touching upon the qualification of the witness, he should have examined him on voir dire as to such qualifications. Appellant objected to the following question: "Q. It was wet. By reason ——— do you know whether or not W. C. Cook & Company was damaged by reason of the fact that this merchandise was wet and water-soaked?" on the ground that it called for a conclusion and opinion of the witness. The court overruled the objection. Thereafter the witness, without objection, testified at length and in detail as to the matter of damages, giving market values, cost of minimizing the damage, and other information from which the amount of damage could be ascertained. Appellant contends that, because the objection above mentioned was overruled, the competency or relevancy of all the following questions and answers touching upon the subject of damages can be raised on appeal, based upon said original objection. In support of this assertion appellant cites the case of Sharon v. Sharon, 79 Cal. 633, 674, 22 P. 26, 131. But in that case the trial court outlined exactly what questions might be asked on the subject, and the Supreme Court held that it was not necessary to renew objections to questions that were within the direction of the court as to the extent to which the examination might go. In the case at bar, so far as the record discloses, the court did not indicate what questions touching upon the subject of damages might be answered or to what length the subject might be inquired into, and we are of the opinion that the original objection was not sufficient to allow the competency or relevancy of the following questions to be raised for the first time on appeal. Burnett v. Lyford, 93 Cal. 114, 117, 28 P. 855; Watrous v. Cunningham, 71 Cal. 30, 32, 11 P. 811; Wasserman v. Los Angeles Ry. Corp., 184 Cal. 202, 209, 193 P. 130; 10 Cal. Jur. p. 824.

[13] The foregoing opinion makes it unnecessary to discuss the grounds of appeal from the judgment, except to say that the evidence quoted by appellant in its brief merely discloses a substantial conflict in evidence which must be resolved in favor of the judgment. A reviewing court is not justified in disturbing a judgment unless it appears that upon no hypothesis is there sufficient substantial evidence to support it. Packer v. Wagner, 109 Cal. App. 26, 32, 292 P. 523; Waxman v. Jennings, 72 Cal. App. 671, 674, 238 P. 98; Taylor v. U. S. Fidelity & Guaranty Co., 86 Cal. App. 382, 386, 260 P. 898.

There is ample proof to support the findings, and in that condition of the evidence an appellate court will not disturb the judgment.

The judgment is affirmed.

BETTENCOURT et ux. v. BANK OF ITALY NAT. TRUST & SAVINGS ASS'N et al.

S. F. 13535, 13563.

Supreme Court of California.

Aug. 5, 1932.

Rehearing Denied Sept. 2, 1932.

1. Appeal and error ⇐110.

In action tried to jury, order granting new trial is not appealable unless jury trial was matter of right (Code Civ. Proc. § 963, subd. 2).

2. Jury ⇐13(1).

In equitable proceeding, jury trial is not matter of right, but court in its discretion may call jury to assist.

3. Trial ⇐374(2).

In equitable proceeding, court is not bound by jury's findings.

4. Jury ⇐14(3).

As regards right to jury trial, cases involving fraudulent trustees' sales for inadequate purchase price and suits for accounting are addressed to equity court.

5. Jury ⇐13(1).

As regards right to jury trial, court, in determining whether action is legal or equitable, is not bound by form of action, but by nature of rights involved as determined from whole pleadings and facts.

For such purpose, allegations of complaint, answer, and cross-complaint may be considered, as may also prayer for relief in complaint and in answer.

6. Jury ⇐13(1).

There is no right to jury trial where gist of action is for enforcement of right cognizable only in equity, though legal relief results as incidental part of recovery.

7. Jury ⇐13(1).

In determining whether proceeding is equitable, that prayer contains demand for damages is not controlling.

Such fact is not controlling since, where cause of action is essentially equitable, prayer for damages is but incidental to relief sought.

8. Equity ⇐39(3).

If action is properly brought in equity court, it will determine all issues, including claim for damages.

9. Appeal and error ⇐110.

In view of allegations, action for accounting, decree compelling reconveyance, and decree canceling deeds pursuant to trustee's sale, held essentially equitable, though tried to jury; hence order granting defendants new trial was nonappealable (Code Civ. Proc. § 963, subd. 2).

Complaint alleged in substance that plaintiffs executed note to defendant bank, secured by deed of trust; that bank and trustees and other defendants entered into fraudulent scheme to obtain property for inadequate consideration; that defendants, when about to sell under power of sale in deed of trust, informed plaintiffs it would be unnecessary for them to appear and bid; that defendants caused property to be sold for certain price and immediately thereafter bank resold it to certain of defendants; that transfers were made pursuant to fraudulent scheme to defraud plaintiffs; and that plaintiffs were deceived by statement of one of defendants who was their personal friend and adviser.

10. Appeal and error ⇐807.

Under circumstances, dismissal of appeal from nonappealable order held not precluded by denial of motion to dismiss before filing of briefs.

Circumstances disclosed that proper consideration of motion would have involved examination of entire record in advance of hearing upon merits.

11. Appeal and error ⇐801(4).

Supreme Court will entertain motion to dismiss in advance of hearing on merits only where mere inspection of record discloses that appellant is not entitled to relief.

12. Appeal and error ⇐17.

Supreme Court cannot by its acts acquire jurisdiction when none exists.

13. Appeal and error ⇐843(2).

On appeal from nonappealable order granting new trial in equitable action, contention that court had no jurisdiction to grant new trial held not properly before court.

Contention was based upon claim that notice of intention had not been served upon all of adverse parties, and that motion was prematurely made, since no findings had been filed prior thereto.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

Action by Joseph Bettencourt and wife against the Bank of Italy National Trust & Savings Association, the Bank of Half Moon Bay, Manuel Bettencourt, the El Granada Holding Company and others, in which the holding company filed a cross-complaint. From an order granting the new trial motion of the Bank of Half Moon Bay and Manuel Bettencourt, against which defendants a verdict had been rendered, and from a judgment and decree quieting title of cross-complainant, plaintiffs appeal, and defendants move to dismiss the appeal from the order.

Appeal from the order granting a new trial dismissed, and judgment on the cross-complaint, quieting title of cross-complainant, affirmed.

John H. Crabbe, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Louis Ferrari, of San Francisco, J. E. McCurdy, of San Mateo, Leep, Levy & Hurd, Lelia R. Leep, Sumner Hurd, Robert L. Levy, Sullivan & Sullivan and Theo. J. Roche, and George A. Stockfleth, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

TYLER, Justice pro tem.

This controversy involves two separate appeals. The first is from an order granting a new trial as to certain of the defendants, and the second is from a judgment and decree quieting title to the lands described in the complaint based upon written findings of fact and conclusions of law in favor of defendant El Granada Holding Company. The appeals have been consolidated.

The complaint contains four counts, the first of which alleges a fraudulent conspiracy on the part of defendants to obtain a sale at an inadequate price of plaintiffs' property under the terms of a certain deed of trust held by defendant Bank of Half Moon Bay. The second cause of action alleges an accounting to be due between plaintiffs and defendants. The third is based upon a common count for money had and received, and the fourth contains allegations for quieting plaintiffs' title to the property. A demurrer to this last cause of action was sustained, and the complaint was not amended, so that the actual trial was had on the allegations contained in the three causes of action above referred to. The right to possession of the lands was also tried. The prayer of the complaint asked for judgment for damages in the sum of $65,000; for a full and complete accounting; for a decree compelling defendants to make, execute, and deliver to plaintiffs a reconveyance of the property; and for a decree canceling and annulling each of certain deeds and conveyances made by the defendants of the lands in question. A decree quieting plaintiffs' title was also prayed for.

Defendants El Granada Holding Company and Lewis W. Martin demurred to the complaint, as did also defendants A. R. Dias and Isabel Dias, his wife. These demurrers were sustained as to the fourth cause of action. In addition thereto the El Granada Holding Company filed a cross-complaint to quiet its title to the property as against plaintiffs.

The Bank of Italy National Trust & Savings Association filed an answer denying all of the material allegations and set up, in addition thereto, the special plea of laches. Defendants Bank of Half Moon Bay, Horace Nelson, J. G. Gilcrest, and Manuel Bettencourt also filed an answer denying the material allegations, and likewise pleaded the defense of laches, and in addition thereto the bank alleged, as a separate defense, that plaintiffs had executed to it their promissory note in the sum of $8,000, which note was secured by a deed of trust to defendants Horace Nelson and J. G. Gilcrest, as trustees; that thereafter plaintiffs executed to said bank a second and further promissory note, also secured by a deed of trust; that no payments were made on account of principal, taxes, or interest in connection with said loans since August, 1923. A sale of the property for $10,000 to defendants A. R. Dias and Isabel Dias under the terms of the trust deeds is then recited. As a further defense, the bank pleaded laches and special denials to the other causes of action.

When the case was called for trial, the court instructed the clerk to call a jury. Thereupon objection was made by defendants that plaintiffs were not entitled to a jury trial, as the cause was one involving purely equitable issues and an accounting. The court concluded to have a jury pass upon the issues. Upon the conclusion of plaintiffs' case, all of the defendants moved the court for a nonsuit. They also moved to strike certain testimony from the record and asked for a directed verdict. These motions were denied. On conclusion of the evidence, the trial court, at the request of defendants, submitted special interrogations to the jury as to whether fraud or conspiracy was committed, and by whom. At the same time it instructed the jury to render a verdict in favor of the defendants Lewis W. Martin and El Granada Holding Company, and against the plaintiffs. After deliberation the jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs in the sum of $20,000, and against the defendants Bank of Half Moon Bay, Manuel Bettencourt, A. R. Dias, and Isabel Dias. Judgment was entered accordingly. In addition thereto and upon the special interrogations submitted to it, the jury found that there was fraud concerning the matters alleged in the complaint, and that such fraud was committed by the Bank of Half Moon Bay, and further that there was a conspiracy and the defendants guilty of such were said bank, Manuel Bettencourt, A. R. Dias, and Isabel Dias. Judgment was also entered quieting the title of defendant El Granada Holding Company as against plaintiffs.

Thereafter, the Bank of Half Moon Bay and Manuel Bettencourt moved the court for a new trial. The motion was based upon the grounds of excessive damages, insufficiency of the evidence; that the verdict was contrary to law, and errors of law occurring at the trial. The motion was granted, but the order did not specify that it was made upon the insufficiency of the evidence.

[1-8] Defendants here contend that this court has no jurisdiction to hear the present appeal; that the action being essentially equitable, the order appealed from is a non-appealable order. We are of the opinion that respondents are correct in their contention. Section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure precludes an appeal from an order granting a new trial where a trial is had by jury, unless such trial is a matter of right (subdivision 2). The rule is well settled in this state that in an equitable proceeding a jury trial is not a matter of right, but the court may in its discretion, if so advised, call a jury to assist in the trial of the matter. However, the jury trial not being a matter of right, the court is not bound by the findings of the jury. 15 Cal. Jur. 331, § 11. Cases which involve fraudulent trustees' sales for inadequate purchase price are cases addressed to a court of equity, as are also suits for an accounting. In determining whether an action is legal or equitable, and consequently whether a jury may be demanded, the court is not bound by the form of the action, but rather by the nature of the rights involved, as determined from the whole of the pleadings, and the facts of a particular case. The allegations of the complaint, the answer, and the cross-complaint may be considered, as may also the prayer for relief in the complaint and in the answer. 15 Cal. Jur. 334, § 12. There is no right to a trial by jury where the gist of the action as thus determined is for the enforcement of some right cognizable only in equity, even though legal relief results as an incidental part of the recovery. The fact, therefore, that the prayer contains a demand for damages is not controlling, for where the cause of action is essentially equitable, the prayer for damages is merely incidental to the relief sought, and if the action is properly brought in a court of equity, that court will determine all the issues in the case. McCarthy v. Gaston Ridge Mill & Mining Co., 144 Cal. 542, 78 P. 7.

[9] That plaintiffs' action is of a purely equitable character in its essentials is shown from a reading of the complaint. It alleges in substance that appellants owned certain described property; that they executed a promissory note to the Bank of Half Moon Bay promising to pay the bank a certain sum of money; that they secured the note by a deed of trust on such property; that defendants J. G. Gilcrest and Horace Nelson were trustees under the deed of trust; that thereafter said note matured, and at that time defendants entered into a fraudulent scheme and collusive arrangement to obtain the property from plaintiffs for an inadequate consideration; that defendants, when about to sell the property under the power of sale granted in the deed of trust, informed plaintiffs it would not be necessary for them or anyone representing them to appear and bid at said sale; that defendants agreed to sell the property at the best obtainable price and pay to plaintiffs the surplus, if any, over and above the indebtedness. It is then alleged that defendants caused the property to be sold to the bank for $10,000, and immediately thereafter the bank resold the same to A. R. and Isabel Dias, who in turn sold the same to the El Granada Holding Company. It is then charged that all of the foregoing transfers were made pursuant to the fraudulent scheme, and for the purpose of defrauding plaintiffs. Allegations follow to the effect, in substance, that Manuel Bettencourt was a very close and personal friend and adviser of plaintiffs and that they had the utmost confidence in his statements, relied thereon, and were lulled into a false sense of security, and were deceived thereby. An accounting is asked for, and a decree compelling defendants to make a reconveyance, and also for a decree canceling and annulling each of the deeds made by the defendants in the transaction.

[10-12] Without further comment on the allegations, it is plainly manifest that the action is essentially equitable. This being so, appellants were not entitled as a matter of right to a trial by jury, and therefore, under the provisions of the Code above cited, the matter is nonappealable, and this court is without jurisdiction to hear the same. Nor is this conclusion in any manner affected by the fact that a motion to dismiss the appeal upon the grounds herein discussed was heretofore denied. The action of this court in denying the motion to dismiss was made before any briefs were filed, and to have properly entertained the motion, it would have involved an examination of the entire record in advance of a hearing upon the merits. It is only where a mere inspection of the record discloses that an appellant is entitled to no relief, that this court will entertain a motion to dismiss, and thus save unnecessary delay and expense of litigation. Hibernia Sav. & Loan Soc. v. Doran, 161 Cal. 118, 118 P. 526. Moreover, this court by its acts cannot acquire jurisdiction when none in fact exists.

[13] Appellants present the further claim that the court never acquired jurisdiction to grant a new trial. In support of this claim, it is first contended that the notice of intention was not served upon all of the adverse parties. It is further contended that the motion was prematurely made, as no findings had been filed prior thereto. Assuming these facts to be true, they do not present questions properly before us.

Nor is there any merit in the appeal taken from the judgment and decree quieting title on the cross-complaint filed by El Granada Holding Company. The issues presented by the pleadings on this branch of the case were purely equitable, and the action of the trial court in directing the jury to bring in a verdict in favor of this defendant did not constitute error. There was no evidence of fraud on the part of Martin. With reference to this branch of the case, however, it may be stated that it has been brought to our attention that the trust deed executed by the Diases, to secure the payment of the amount they were indebted to the bank, the payment of which was assumed by the El Granada Holding Company, has been foreclosed. Bank of Italy National Trust & Savings Association, successor of Bank of Half Moon Bay, became the purchaser. The Diases and the El Granada Holding Company have lost all their interest in the property and are no longer interested parties, and the title is again in the bank.

It might be said in conclusion that in the event of a new trial, appellants should see to it that more satisfactory evidence be presented upon the question of the value of the land in controversy. Upon this subject the evidence shows that when the bank made the loan to Bettencourt, the value placed thereon was between $14,000 and $15,000. The property was shortly thereafter sold under the deed of trust for $10,000, and resold to the Diases for $17,500, the bank advancing nearly all of the purchase price. Horace Nelson, the president of the bank, estimated its value to be about $13,000 in 1925. It is true, plaintiff testified he was offered $65,000 for the same, at or about the time of the original trustees' sale, by defendant Martin. Martin denied ever having offered such sum, although he testified that he afterward contracted to buy the property for $100,000, but he paid only the sum of $2,500 on his contract. It further appears that the El Granada Holding Company, to which he transferred the property, was entirely owned and controlled by defendant Martin, and the property was subsequently foreclosed for the nonpayment of the Dias obligation, the payment of which was assumed by Martin. This evidence of value is mostly incompetent and it is unsatisfactory to say the least. The trial judge during the course of the trial so indicated in denying one of respondent's motions, for he stated in effect that he did not agree with the verdict as he knew the property and that plaintiffs had paid all or more than it was worth at the time of their purchase. He also stated that the evidence showed no fraud. His opinion concerning the value of the property is further evidenced in his rulings on the evidence, and in the instructions to the jury. If the value of the land is what appellants claim it to be, it should be a very easy matter to prove such value by competent and convincing evidence.

We do not deem a further discussion of the case to be necessary. The motion to dismiss the appeal taken from the order granting a new trial is granted, and the appeal is dismissed.

The judgment on the cross-complaint, quieting the title of cross-complainant to the real property described in the judgment, is affirmed.

McCANN et al. v. JORDAN, Secretary of State.*

S. F. 14586.

Supreme Court of California.

Aug. 10, 1932.

Rehearing Granted Sept. 8, 1932.

1. Corporations ⇐19.

In absence of statute requiring prescribed fee for filing original articles of corporation having non-par stock, secretary of state held unauthorized to demand fee (St. 1931, p. 1762; Pol. Code, § 409, subd. 5, as amended by St. 1931, p. 445).

2. Corporations ⇐19.

Secretary of state has no discretion in exacting statutory fee for filing incorporation articles, and his duties are purely ministerial (St. 1931, p. 1762; Pol. Code, § 409, subd. 5, as amended by St. 1931, p. 445).

In Bank.

Application by Leo C. McCann and others, incorporators of the Lincoln Shares Corporation, for a writ of mandate against Frank C. Jordan, to compel respondent, as Secretary of State, to accept and file articles of incorporation of a corporation having a non-par stock structure on payment of fees as tendered by petitioners.

Alternative writ made peremptory.

Ellis, Lyman & Steindorf, of San Francisco, for petitioners.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and William F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

LANGDON, J.

On February 5, 1932, petitioners, the incorporators and first directors of Lincoln Shares Corporation, presented duly executed and acknowledged articles of incorporation to respondent secretary of state for filing. At such time they tendered the necessary nominal fees for comparing documents, etc. Respondent refused to file the articles unless first paid the sum of $1,000 as a filing fee, based upon the provision in the articles for 1,000,000 shares of non-par stock. Thereupon petitioners sought a writ of mandate in this court.

[1] The controversy arises out of a strange legislative omission. Section 409, subdivision 5, of the Political Code, as amended by St. 1931, p. 445, states the fees required for filing articles of incorporation. These fees are graduated in accordance with the amount of "capital stock." Thus, where the amount is $25,000 or less, the fee is $15; if it is between $500,000 and $1,000,000, the fee is $100. No method is contained in said section whereby there may be computed the fee to be charged on non-par stock. Prior to 1931, section 290d of the Civil Code made express provision for this situation by declaring that for the purpose of fixing the fee prescribed by section 409 of the Political Code, in the case of non-par stock, the basis thereof should be an amount equal to the number of shares multiplied by $10. In other words, each share of non-par stock was given an arbitrary value of $10, and in the instant case the 1,000,000 shares would have been valued at $10,000,000, and a filing fee of $1,000 would have been proper. But in 1931, with the enactment of the General Corporation Law (St. 1931, p. 1762), section 290d was repealed. No provision remains in any of our statutes which sets a valuation upon non-par shares for purposes of filing original articles of incorporation. There is, however, a provision (Pol. Code, § 409, subd. 7) for the valuation of such shares upon the filing of amended articles abolishing par stock, and authorizing the issuance of non-par stock, or authorizing the issuance of additional shares of non-par stock.

The question presented by these facts may be simply stated: Is the secretary of state entitled to collect a fee which is not required by the statutes prescribing fees? Obviously the answer is no.

[2] Whatever may have been the purpose of the omission, and it seems clearly to have been inadvertent, its effect is to leave no method by which a filing fee for non-par stock may be computed where original articles are filed. The secretary of state has proceeded to apply the same rule which prevailed under the repealed Civil Code section. We see no warrant for such action. There is nothing discretionary in the exaction of a statutory filing fee of this sort, and his duties are purely ministerial.

Respondent argues that, since the statute makes payment of the prescribed filing fees a condition precedent to filing articles [Pacific Gas & Electric Co. v. State of California (Cal. Sup.) 6 P.(2d) 78], the duty to collect a fee remains, even though the standard of measurement has been eliminated; and that to exempt corporations with non-par stock from this requirement would result in an unconstitutional discrimination. Neither contention can justify the imposition of a fee which the statute does not require. The fact that the statute does provide for fees where articles are amended only indicates that the repeal of the provisions formerly contained in section 290d of the Civil Code was inadvertent. It is impossible by construction to make the subdivision on amended articles applicable to original articles.

It necessarily follows that respondent had no authority to demand a filing fee of $1,000, and that it is his duty to file said articles forthwith. The alternative writ heretofore issued should be made peremptory, and it is so ordered.

$19,750 for abrasions, contusions, concussion of brain, and possible skull fracture, causing monetary loss of $554, held excessive by $9,750.

Evidence disclosed that plaintiff, at time of injury, was 21 years of age and was receiving $100 per month wages; that he was off duty for about six weeks and that at time of trial his wages had been increased to $120 per month; that injuries consisted of abrasions and contusions of both legs and ankles and in lumbar region, concussion of brain, and possible basal fracture of skull; and that injuries caused partial deafness in one ear, irritability, headaches, dizziness, loss of memory, and thought disturbance.

Superseding opinion in 11 P.(2d) 679.

Samuel J. Crawford, of Santa Monica, for defendant J. W. Anderson.

Charles A. Thomasset, C. T. Lester, and Thomasset & Lester, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHENK, J.

This is an appeal from a judgment on a verdict for the plaintiff in the sum of $19,750, in an action for damages for personal injuries.

The plaintiff was, and so far as the record shows still is, an employee of the Los Angeles Gas & Electric Corporation. On May 7, 1928, he was standing, in the discharge of his duties to his employer, over an open manhole and behind a metal railing or guard within the intersection of Twelfth street and Maple avenue in the city of Los Angeles. A collision occurred between an automobile driven by the defendant Vanderlip and another automobile driven by one Anderson, an employee of the defendant Los Angeles Creamery Company. As a result of the collision the car driven by Anderson was thrown against the metal guard around the manhole, which guard in turn was thrown against the plaintiff, who was thereby projected against the curb and received the injuries sued upon. Verdict and judgment went against both Vanderlip and the creamery company.

It is not disputed that negligence was established as against the appealing defendants. In support of the appeal it is contended: (1) That the verdict was grossly excessive; (2) that testimony of an inciting and prejudicial nature was received over objections; (3) that certain instructions bearing upon the alleged contributory negligence of the plaintiff were improperly refused; (4) that the jury was misdirected on the subject of contributory negligence; and (5) misdirection of the jury on the question of damages.

After an examination of the record as to specifications 2, 3, 4, and 5, we have concluded that there is not sufficient substance in these contentions to require or justify a reversal or to merit further discussion thereof. The claim that the verdict is grossly excessive will receive more extended comment.

At the time of the accident the plaintiff was twenty-one years of age, and was receiving wages at the rate of $100 per month.

As a result of the accident he was rendered semiconscious. He recalled seeing the manhole and realized that he was being placed in an ambulance after the accident. He testified that he completely "passed out" on the way to the receiving hospital, but recalled the medical treatment he received on arriving there. The impact caused him to bleed at the right ear, nose, and mouth. He was removed to the Santa Fé Hospital, where he remained for about four weeks. Thereafter he was off duty for about six weeks, and was discharged by his physician on July 20, 1928, when he returned to work. At the time of the trial, in July, 1929, he was still working and his wages had been increased to $120 per month. His monetary loss was $250 in wages and $304 in expenses.

The extent of the injuries to the plaintiff, while greatly in dispute as to certain of them, appear to have been abrasions and contusions of both legs and ankles and in the lumbar region, a concussion of the brain, and a "possible" basal fracture of the skull, although the X-rays failed to disclose such fracture and the presence of any head injuries was not physically demonstrable.

The plaintiff testified to a partial deafness in one ear, irritability, headaches, dizziness, loss of memory, and thought disturbance. It may not be gainsaid that he received very serious and excruciatingly painful injuries, but without indulging further in details, we are persuaded from an examination of the evidence that the verdict is so out of proportion to the extent of the damage suffered as to suggest as a matter of law that the jury was influenced by considerations of passion and prejudice in fixing the amount. The absence of any contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff, which the jury was entitled to and did impliedly find, and the wanton negligence of the defendant Vanderlip, undoubtedly caused the jury to feel outraged against said defendant and produced the result of a verdict which we find to be grossly excessive. Ten thousand dollars at the outside is the maximum which can, under all the circumstances, be permitted to stand.

It is ordered that in the event that the plaintiff, within thirty days from and after the filing of the opinion, file with the clerk of this court his written consent to a modification of the judgment in his favor by a deduction therefrom of $9,750, leaving the same to stand for $10,000 and the costs of suit, said judgment shall be modified accordingly and as so modified stand affirmed; but in the event that said consent be not so filed within said time, the judgment shall be reversed.

WOLFORD v. WOLFORD.

S. F. 13941.

Supreme Court of California.

July 29, 1932.

1. Divorce ⇐133(1).

Evidence held insufficient to support judgment for divorce on ground of desertion by husband.

2. Divorce ⇐171.

If no new cruel acts were shown after parties had resumed marital relations, and previous final divorce decree had been denied, divorce decree on ground of cruelty was improper.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; F. B. Brown, Judge.

Divorce action by Edgar Warren Wolford against Almitta May Wolford, in which defendant filed a cross-complaint. From the judgment, plaintiff appeals.

Reversed.

William R. Biaggi, of San Jose, for appellant.

William H. Johnson, of San Jose, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

Plaintiff brought an action for divorce on grounds of desertion. Defendant filed an answer denying the allegations of the complaint, and a cross-complaint praying for divorce on grounds of cruelty and desertion. Plaintiff filed an answer to the cross-complaint, alleging as a special defense that such allegations of cruelty were identical with those pleaded and litigated in a previous action brought by defendant wife against him, wherein an interlocutory decree of divorce was granted, but a final decree was denied when it appeared that the parties had resumed marital relations.

The lower court granted defendant's motion for a nonsuit, and granted an interlocutory decree of divorce to defendant upon her cross-complaint. The court also determined the character of and divided the community property.

Plaintiff's chief ground of attack is the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the findings and judgment; and he also points to several errors of the court.

[1] An examination of the findings, conclusions of law, and the decree, shows that the trial court did not clearly indicate whether the decree was based upon the allegations of cruelty or desertion, although orally the court stated that the ground would be desertion. However, on said issues, the evidence does not support the judgment. In the prior divorce action brought by the wife an injunction was issued at her request, restraining her husband from entering their home or otherwise molesting her. Subsequently the parties cohabited to such an extent that the court refused to enter the final decree. Some months later Mrs. Wolford threatened to invoke the terms of the restraining order. Mr. Wolford offered to live with her if she would go to her attorney and have the order dissolved, which she refused to do. In this state of the record we are unable to sustain a finding of desertion. There is nothing to show that plaintiff knew the order to be of no further effect, and the condition attached to his offer to cohabit was a reasonable one.

[2] On the issue of cruelty, the court failed to find on the special defense that the allegations of cruelty were identical with those made in the prior action. Obviously, if no new acts of cruelty were presented, no judgment on that ground would be proper. The absence of this finding makes it uncertain whether the judgment is supported by any competent evidence.

Having reached the conclusion that the judgment should be reversed, it is unnecessary for us to consider the contentions that the findings as to community property are erroneous, and that the award for the support and maintenance of the minor children is excessive.

The judgment is reversed.

Action by Emma S. Topley against John Zeeman and wife. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals.

WASTE, C. J.

Plaintiff appeals from a judgment entered for the defendants pursuant to a directed verdict. The action is one for damages for personal injuries sustained by plaintiff as the result of a fall in a bathtub in a hotel operated by the defendants.

It appears from the evidence that the plaintiff had been living at the hotel for several days, and had used the bathtub many times prior to the accident. She testified that as she stepped into the tub on the night of the accident "the legs spread out from under the tub and my feet slipped, and I fell back on my back on the rim of the tub." Plaintiff also testified that, as the legs of the tub spread, the front end thereof was precipitated to the floor, causing her to fall as above narrated.

The tub was installed against the wall of the bathroom and approximately five or six inches above the level of the floor. Originally it was supported by four metal legs, but it appears from the evidence, and defendants do not deny the fact, that several years prior to the accident one of the legs on the side next to the wall had been broken off and that side of the tub was thereafter supported by three blocks of wood piled one on top of the other. These blocks were not fastened together nor were they in any manner fastened to the floor. They were apparently held in place solely by the weight of the bathtub resting on them. Plaintiff's testimony discloses that prior to the accident she had seen the blocks under the tub but "didn't know what they were there for" because "they were way back, and it was dark in there. I just saw the ends of boards."

Immediately following the accident examination disclosed that the two metal legs on the front side of the tub were spread apart and broken off and the wooden blocks were displaced, causing the tub to tilt and rest on the floor.

Defendants' evidence was to the effect that the blocks had been supporting the tub for over eight years; that the bathroom and the tub had been inspected frequently by Mrs. Zeeman, one of the defendants; that at no time had she ever found the tub to be in any way defective; that the blocks at all times appeared to be firmly in place; and that, when examined subsequent to the accident, they were not water logged or cracked and appeared to be in good condition. However, on cross-examination, Mrs. Zeeman stated that when inspecting the bathroom prior to the accident she did not look "to see if [the blocks] had slipped" for "they always seemed in place when I went into the room."

[1] It is the defendants' contention, in effect, that the evidence conclusively establishes that plaintiff's fall was not due to any defective condition of the tub, but that necessarily she must have slipped as she stepped into the tub, and that, in falling against the side of the tub, her weight caused the metal legs to give way and the tub to slip from the blocks. It is therefore urged that a directed verdict was not only proper but required by the evidence. We cannot accede to this reasoning. A court may direct a verdict only when, disregarding conflicting evidence and giving plaintiff's evidence all the value to which it is legally entitled, including every legitimate inference which may be drawn therefrom, no evidence of sufficient substantiality to support a verdict in favor of plaintiff, if given, may be found. Mairo v. Yellow Cab Co., 208 Cal. 350, 351, 281 P. 66; Cal. Packing Co. v. Lopez, 207 Cal. 600, 603, 279 P. 664, 64 A. L. R. 1412; Bannister v. L. A. Ry. Corp., 203 Cal. 427, 429, 264 P. 756; Estate of Caspar, 172 Cal. 147, 155 P. 631.

[2] We are not prepared to say that a verdict for plaintiff based on the evidence now before us, and the inferences reasonably deducible therefrom, would have to be reversed on appeal for want of substantial evidence to support it. This being so, it was error for the court below to direct a verdict for the defendants. It is entirely conceivable, and not at all an unreasonable inference to be drawn from the evidence, that the blocks supporting one side of the tub, while in substantially the same position in which they had been placed some eight years previously, had nevertheless imperceptibly shifted from time to time so as to be in such a position as to be easily displaced with the application of the weight of any one using the tub. A bathtub maintained in such condition in a hotel open to the public would undoubtedly be negligently maintained.

The above inference does not disappear from the case with Mrs. Zeeman's testimony that she had periodically inspected the bathroom, which inspection disclosed the blocks to be in place under the tub. Such evidence is not at all inconsistent with the theory that the blocks, while in place under the tub, had nevertheless shifted so as to be dangerous to any one using the tub.

[3] Defendants contend that, while an innkeeper is liable for his own willful acts and for his negligence, he is not an insurer of the safety of the premises nor of the hotel equipment, and therefore cannot be held liable for patent defects; the guest assuming such risks. 14 Cal. Jur. 325, § 11. While this is undoubtedly the law, we cannot agree with the defendants that the defect involved in this case was such as to constitute a patent defect of which the plaintiff had knowledge. Her testimony, as above quoted, is clear and uncontradicted to the effect that, while she was aware of the presence of certain boards under the bathtub, they were so placed in the back of the tub and against the wall, where the light was poor, as to preclude any one from definitely ascertaining the purpose they were serving. This evidence was sufficient to require the submission to the jury of the issue of knowledge on the part of plaintiff. Her testimony in this regard finds some corroboration in the testimony of Mr. Zeeman, one of the defendants, who, though he occupied the hotel as lessor for several years prior to the accident, was unable to testify as to the number or size of the blocks that had so long supported the bathtub. His testimony tends to indicate that the blocks must have been so placed as to be substantially concealed from the view of persons using the bathroom.

For present purposes at least, defendant's theory that plaintiff must have slipped and fallen against the tub and thereby dislodged it from its position is controverted by plaintiff's uncontradicted testimony that the tub went down as she attempted to step into it and that she then for the first time slipped and fell, and solely because of the tub having become dislodged and one end thereof dropping to the floor.

We find it unnecessary to detail the evidence as to the extent of plaintiff's injuries. It is sufficient to say that she introduced some evidence as to damage; the extent thereof being a matter for the determination of the jury.

In conclusion, it is our opinion that the evidence was such as to require a submission of the principal issue to the jury, and, in the absence of evidence tending to show that plaintiff as matter of law was guilty of contributory negligence, it was error for the court below to direct a verdict for the defendants.

The judgment is reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sutter County; K. S. Mahon, Judge.

Action by George C. Shintaffer against the Bank of Italy National Trust & Savings Association, a national banking association, and others, in which named defendant and defendant Minnie E. Backus filed cross-complaints. From the judgment, the last-named defendant appeals.

SEAWELL, J.

This action is in the nature of a bill of interpleader filed by plaintiff, George C. Shintaffer, to determine conflicting claims to a one-fourth portion of the wheat crop grown and harvested by him during the year 1930 on land in Sutter county leased from defendant Henry D. Hook, under a lease providing for delivery of one-fourth of the wheat crop to the lessor. By consent a judgment for one-third of said one-fourth portion of the crop was awarded to Ellis Hook, an incompetent person, who owned an undivided one-third interest in the leased property and did not join in the execution of said lease or any of the other instruments hereinafter referred to. The respondent Bank of Italy, in whose favor the trial court rendered judgment, and appellant, Minnie E. Backus, assert rival claims to the remaining two-thirds of said one-fourth portion, consisting of 34,706 pounds, valued by stipulation at $500. In our opinion appellant is entitled to a reversal.

The appeal is before us on a bill of exceptions, from which it appears that the case was tried on an agreed statement of facts presenting the single legal question now before this court for consideration. The land leased to Shintaffer by a lease executed on March 1, 1929, was subject to a prior real estate mortgage executed by Henry Hook. The crop in question was planted, grown, and harvested by Shintaffer in 1930 during the one-year period of redemption following the foreclosure of the real estate mortgage and sale of Henry Hook's two-thirds interest in the property to the mortgagee, appellant Backus, on August 24, 1929. Subsequent to the institution of the action for foreclosure of the real estate mortgage, but prior to the foreclosure sale, and while Shintaffer, the lessee, was in possession, Hook executed a crop mortgage in favor of respondent Bank of Italy upon the one-fourth portion of the crop which he was entitled to receive from Shintaffer under the terms of his lease. The real estate mortgage from Hook to appellant, Backus, was recorded and respondent Bank of Italy, which held a second lien on the realty, was made a party to, and appeared in, the foreclosure action. For the reason that there is no controversy as to the facts which are stipulated to, it would serve no purpose to recite them in greater detail.

[1] The claim of appellant, Minnie E. Backus, mortgagee and purchaser at the foreclosure sale, to the wheat grown during the period of redemption by a lessee of the premises and deliverable to the mortgagor as rent, must be upheld. Section 707, Code of Civil Procedure, provides as follows: "The purchaser from the time of the sale until a redemption, and a redemptioner, from the time of his redemption until another redemption, is entitled to receive, from the tenant in possession, the rents of the property sold, or the value of the use and occupation thereof.

But when any rents or profits have been received by the judgment creditor or purchaser, or his or their assigns, from the property thus sold preceding such redemption, the amounts of such rents and profits shall be a credit upon the redemption-money to be paid. * * *" The construction placed on said section by this court in the case of Clarke v. Cobb, 121 Cal. 595, 54 P. 74, 75, is determinative of the question in the instant case. In that case, as in the instant case, the owner of land subject to a real estate mortgage leased the property under a lease providing that the lessee should give annually for the use thereof a portion of the crops of grain and other products of the land. A dispute arose between the executors of the mortgagor lessor on the one hand and the mortgagee purchasers at the foreclosure sale on the other, as to the portion of the crops harvested during the redemption period which the lessee had set aside as annual rental. This court reached the conclusion that the crops involved were rent due from the tenant to his landlord, and stated that the matter stood "exactly as though the land had been rented for a cash rental payable at harvest time," in which event the purchasers would be entitled to the portion of the annual rental earned subsequent to the purchase and prior to the redemption or expiration of the redemption period. Accordingly, the lower court was directed to enter judgment in favor of the mortgagee purchasers for an amount in proportion as the time intervening between their purchases and the expiration of the year term for which the rent was payable bore to the year rent period. The lower court had erred in entering judgment for the mortgagee purchasers for the full amount of the rent portion of the crop, and not limiting the purchasers' recovery to the amount of wheat earned as rent after the foreclosure sale.

No question of apportionment of rent arises in the instant case. The lease term began in March, 1929. The foreclosure sale took place on August 24, 1929. That portion of the crop planted and grown in 1930, and harvested in the summer of that year, which was returnable under the lease as rent, must necessarily be for a rent period commencing after the foreclosure and sale.

The language of the opinion in Clarke v. Cobb, supra, is directly applicable to the case herein. The court there said: "Rent is a compensation paid for the use of land. It need not be money. * * * These contracts are in no sense cropping contracts. The single difference differentiating them from ordinary conventional leases is that the rent is to be paid in products of the soil, after harvest, rather than in money." The court further declared that, if there is nothing in the language of the lease to indicate an intention that the crops raised on the land are to be held in cotenancy, then the products to be delivered to the landlord after harvest by the tenant will be deemed the property of the tenant until that time, and treated as rent to be then paid.

[2, 3] The rights of the respondent Bank of Italy, the holder of a crop mortgage upon that portion of the crop due the lessor as rent, can be no greater than those of its mortgagor, Hook, in and to said crop. The right of the mortgagee purchaser, Backus, to receive the rents from a tenant in possession during the period of redemption was fixed at the time the real estate mortgage was entered into. The mortgagor lessor, by a subsequent chattel mortgage of the portion of the crop which he would be entitled to receive as rent from his tenant but for an intervening foreclosure and sale, cannot cut off or abridge the statutory rights of the purchaser under a prior mortgage.

Title passes to the purchaser at a foreclosure sale. Section 700, Code Civ. Proc.; Pollard v. Harlow, 138 Cal. 390, 71 P. 454, 648; 18 Cal. Jur. 612 et seq., and cases there cited. The law grants to the mortgagor the right to redeem the property and to remain in possession pending the expiration of the period of redemption. If the mortgagor remains in possession personally, we do not doubt that he may mortgage and otherwise dispose of the crops harvested during the period of redemption. His crop mortgage would prevail over a purchaser at the foreclosure of an antecedent real estate mortgage for the reason that, even in the absence of a crop mortgage, the said purchaser would have no rights in the crop. Such cases as First National Bank of Lindsay v. Garner, 91 Cal. App. 176, 266 P. 849, relied on by respondent bank, involved a mortgagor in possession, and are not applicable where the property foreclosed is leased to a tenant, in which event the title acquired by the purchaser carries with it the right to receive rent from the tenant in possession, whether payable in cash or products of the land.

[4] The principle applicable in the instant case in no way conflicts with the rule that a real estate mortgage does not cover growing crops. First Nat. Bank of Lindsay v. Garner, supra; Simpson v. Ferguson, 112 Cal. 180, 40 P. 104, 44 P. 484, 53 Am. St. Rep. 201; Locke v. Klunker, 123 Cal. 231, 55 P. 993; Bank of Woodland v. Heron, 120 Cal. 614, 52 P. 1006; Cowdery v. London, etc., Bank, 139 Cal. 298, 73 P. 196, 96 Am. St. Rep. 115. It was by virtue of this principle that we held in Clarke v. Cobb, supra, that the purchaser was not entitled to the entire portion of the crop harvested during the period of redemption which was payable as rental, but only to the portion earned during that period. A real estate mortgage confers no lien on crops grown during the term of the mortgage, but, when the mortgage is terminated by foreclosure and sale, the purchaser as an incident to the legal and equitable title acquired by him is entitled to rent earned during the period of redemption whether payable in money or produce.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to the lower court to enter judgment for appellant, Backus, on the findings set forth by said court.

SLINACK et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR TULARE COUNTY et al.

L. A. 13565.

Supreme Court of California.

July 27, 1932.

1. Prohibition ⇐10(2).

Supreme Court may issue writ of prohibition where it appears that superior court appointing receiver acted in excess of its jurisdiction because another court first acquired exclusive jurisdiction to make appointment (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1102, 1103).

2. Courts ⇐475(1).

Where two tribunals have concurrent jurisdiction over same parties and subject-matter, tribunal in which jurisdiction first attaches retains it exclusively.

3. Courts ⇐475(5).

Superior court in Tulare county, in action wherein it appointed receiver for corporation holding trust property, held without jurisdiction where superior court of Los Angeles county had first acquired jurisdiction of trust res and beneficiaries and parties in second action were represented in first action.

An action was commenced in the superior court in Los Angeles county on January 15, 1932, for the construction of a trust agreement under which corporation sold certificates evidencing ownership in proportionate shares of all trust deeds and mortgages purchased by it and deposited with a named trust company. On January 26 following, a complaint in intervention was filed praying for the appointment of the interveners as trustees in the place of the depositary trust company. The action brought in the superior court in Tulare county was not commenced until January 25, and prayed for the appointment of a receiver to take charge of and operate the trust property and preserve the same from loss to the certificate holders. The beneficiaries and parties in the second action were represented in the first action, and the court in such action, in exercise of its equity jurisdiction, had power to bring before it all persons who might be affected by its decrees.

4. Receivers ⇐35(1).

Where trustees had been appointed to take possession of trust res and to actively administer trust, facts held not to present case of great emergency so as to authorize appointment of receiver upon ex parte application.

Original application by O. E. Slinack and others, as trustees, for a writ of prohibition prayed to be directed to the Superior Court in and for Tulare County, and Frank Lamberson, a Judge thereof, to restrain the respondents from exercising jurisdiction in an action brought for the partition of personal property and the appointment of a receiver.

Peremptory writ of prohibition issued.

James M. Carter and Guy Knupp, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PER CURIAM.

This is an application for a writ of prohibition to restrain the respondent superior court from exercising jurisdiction in an action brought for the partition of personal property and the appointment of a receiver.

The petition alleges an agreement entered into between California Reserve Company, a California corporation, and Metropolitan Trust Company of California, approved by the commissioner of corporations, whereby the former company was authorized to purchase first and second mortgages and trust deeds upon improved California real estate and to deposit the securities so purchased with said Metropolitan Trust Company of California, which is designated as the depositary. The California Reserve Company was authorized to sell and did sell to the public certificates evidencing ownership in proportionate shares of all trust deeds and mortgages so purchased and deposited. These certificates provided for interest at 8 per cent., payable quarterly. The agreement contained many provisions as to safeguards and guaranties, terms and manner of repurchase of certificates, and duties, obligations, rights, and powers of the respective parties not necessary to note. It is sufficient to state that the California Reserve Company was constituted the agent of the certificate holders to collect installments of principal and interest falling due under the mortgages and trust deeds, make payment of interest to the certificate holders, and reinvest the principal and deposit newly acquired securities with said depositary. In said agreement certain acts or omissions on the part of the California Reserve Company were declared to constitute a breach of the agreement on its part. In the event of a breach and written notice as provided, the company was to be considered divested of all of its rights, powers, and interest, which should thereupon become vested in the depositary which in turn should hold the mortgages and trust deeds on deposit for the account and benefit of the company and the owners of certificates then outstanding, for the purpose of enforcing the provisions of the mortgages and trust deeds and disbursing the proceeds as the interests of the company and certificate holders might appear.

It further appears from the petition that operations were conducted under this agreement until, at the times hereinafter mentioned, the certificates outstanding numbered 2493, bearing a face value of $1,882,350. The securities deposited evidenced a value of more than $2,000,000. In October, 1931, because of insufficient funds remaining after complying with demands for numerous repurchases of certificates, the company defaulted in the payment of quarterly interest due on certificates outstanding, and it appeared that it would continue to be in default. At the request of California Reserve Company and pursuant to a written waiver of notice executed by it, the Metropolitan Trust Company of California, in December, 1931, took over the management and control of the company's affairs. Subsequently in the same month the plaintiffs, who are three of the largest certificate holders, and two others who later resigned, were nominated by the certificate holders as a committee to meet and advise with the Metropolitan Trust Company of California. On January 15, 1932, the latter company commenced an action in the superior court in Los Angeles county naming as defendants the California Reserve Company and two certificate holders, W. G. Nott and J. T. Keirns. By that action the plaintiff sought to have construed the trust agreement referred to and to have declared and defined its rights, powers, and duties pursuant thereto under the circumstances noted. In the complaint in that action it was alleged that the defendants Nott and Keirns held and represented divergent views as to the rights, powers, and duties of the plaintiff trustee under said trust agreement, also held by the numerous certificate holders, and that each of said defendants Nott and Keirns was joined in the action not only individually but, because of the impracticability of joining all certificate holders in said action, also as the representative and for the benefit of all certificate holders or beneficiaries of the trust, thus divided into two classes, who held the same views as each of said defendants respectively. It was also sought by said complaint to have the court assume continuing jurisdiction of the parties and the subject-matter and the questions arising during the administration of the trust, for the purpose of giving further instructions and affording additional relief as the need might arise. The defendants in that action were served and appeared therein prior to January 22, 1932.

On January 25, 1932, Marie K. Seuss, Eloise A. Seuss, and Rheta M. Seuss, three of the certificate holders, commenced an action in the superior court in and for Tulare County against California Reserve Company, Metropolitan Trust Company, sixty-five named certificate holders, and certificate holders designated as John Doe One to John Doe Five Thousand. In the complaint in that action it was alleged that no one was authorized to protect and preserve the liens secured by second mortgages and trust deeds purchased by the California Reserve Company and on deposit with Metropolitan Trust Company of California, and that it was necessary that a receiver be appointed to take charge of and operate said property and preserve the same from loss to the certificate holders. The plaintiffs therein also sought a partition of said property, or a sale thereof and a division of the proceeds in accordance with the respective rights of the plaintiffs and defendants. On that complaint and the ex parte application of the plaintiffs, the superior court in Tulare county, the respondent herein, on the same day, ordered the appointment of S. H. Rosenthal as receiver and, upon the filing of certain bonds, vested in him authority to take possession of and operate all of the properties involved herein. It is alleged that S. H. Rosenthal qualified and is purporting to act as such receiver.

On January 26, 1932, the petitioners herein filed a complaint in intervention in the action pending in Los Angeles county praying for the appointment of themselves as trustees in the place of Metropolitan Trust Company of California on the ground that their administration of the trust, without compensation, would be for the best interests of the certificate holders. On the following day, one of the plaintiffs in the Tulare county action also intervened in the Los Angeles county action and purported to show that the issues raised by the complaint in the Los Angeles county action were then moot, inasmuch as the superior court in Tulare county had appointed a receiver and instructed him on all the questions raised by the action in Los Angeles county and that instructions from the superior court in the Los Angeles county action were then neither proper nor necessary. The issues in the Los Angeles county action came on for hearing, the Metropolitan Trust Company resigned as trustee and the court in said action made its findings and conclusions, and on February 19, 1932, rendered judgment establishing the trust pursuant to said trust agreement, ordering Metropolitan Trust Company of California to file its account, decreeing that intervener Seuss take nothing by her complaint in intervention, and appointing the petitioners herein trustees of the trust property subject to the continuing jurisdiction of the court, upon the filing of a bond in the sum of $50,000, which was subsequently furnished. The court there also ordered that title and possession of the property involved be transferred to the trustees so appointed.

On March 1, 1932, pursuant to notice, the petitioners presented to the superior court in Tulare county, respondent herein, a motion to be substituted as defendants in the place of the defendant Metropolitan Trust Company of California in the action pending in Tulare county, for an order vacating the appointment of the receiver in that action, and for an order staying the proceedings pending in Tulare county on the ground that another and prior action involving the same subject-matter and parties was pending in the superior court in and for Los Angeles county. Those motions were based on the judgment roll in the action pending in Los Angeles county, which was received in evidence on the hearing of the motions, and on the answer of the petitioners as such trustees and successors of Metropolitan Trust Company of California to the amended complaint filed by the plaintiffs Seuss in the Tulare county action. It also appeared as an undisputed fact that all of the securities involved were in the possession of Metropolitan Trust Company of California at its offices in Los Angeles, and that all of said securities constitute second incumbrances on real property substantially all of which is situate in the county of Los Angeles, that no part thereof is situate in the county of Tulare, and that the distance between the seats of Los Angeles and Tulare counties is more than 200 miles. The respondent court denied the motions so made, on the ground, in part, that it desired not to release Metropolitan Trust Company of California as a party in the cause pending before it.

It further appears by the petition herein that on February 24, 1932, a petition in bankruptcy on behalf of California Reserve Company was filed in the District Court of the United States for the Central Division, Southern District of California, and that an ex parte order was made by said court appointing G. W. McCune and said S. H. Rosenthal coreceivers in bankruptcy to act until a trustee be appointed. The petition also shows that said S. H. Rosenthal, as such receiver in bankruptcy, has notified the Metropolitan Trust Company of California not to transfer possession or dispose of any property or funds in its hands belonging to said bankrupt; that due to the conflicting orders of the two superior courts there is no one who, with authority, can represent the interests of the certificate holders in said bankruptcy proceeding; and that in the meantime the equities in the real property evidenced by the mortgages and deeds of trust involved are in danger of becoming lost through foreclosure of prior incumbrances. It is stated that this proceeding is therefore brought to have determined the conflict of jurisdiction existing between the superior court in Los Angeles county and the respondent superior court.

The respondents by their answer herein admit all of the allegations of the petition with the exception that they deny the allegation that the petitioners have no plain, speedy, or adequate remedy at law. It may be assumed that the petitioners herein could have appeared as defendants in the Tulare county action and have prosecuted an appeal from the ex parte order appointing a receiver.

[1-3] It has been held that a proceeding in prohibition is available to test the validity of such an order although the petitioners have a remedy by appeal. A. G. Col Co. v. Superior Court, 196 Cal. 604, 238 P. 926. Parity of reasoning compels the conclusion that this court may in its discretion exercise its jurisdiction to issue a writ of prohibition if it appear that the court appointing a receiver is acting in excess of its jurisdiction by reason of the fact that another court has acquired the exclusive jurisdiction to make the appointment. Sections 1102, 1103, Code Civ. Proc.; Lieberman v. Superior Court, 72 Cal. App. 18, 26–28, 236 P. 570. Both the action commenced in Los Angeles county and that brought in Tulare county involve the appointment of an officer or officers to administer the trust res and for other equitable relief. The action in Los Angeles county was commenced and jurisdiction of the parties was obtained therein prior to January 22, 1932. The action in Tulare county was not commenced until January 25, 1932. Jurisdiction of the superior court in Los Angeles county over the subject-matter of the action and of the trust res, therefore, attached before the action in Tulare county was commenced. In view of the pending bankruptcy proceedings, it is conceded that the controversy narrows down to a conflict of the jurisdiction of the two superior courts only as to the matter of the appointment of an administrative officer. The respondents admit that the conflict in that respect exists. The case is then controlled by the application of the general rule that where two tribunals have concurrent jurisdiction over the same parties and subject-matter, the tribunal in which jurisdiction first attaches retains it exclusively. Lieberman v. Superior Court, supra; 7 Cal. Jur. 591. The respondents contend that the parties are not the same in both actions. They admit, however, that the trust res involved is the same, and that the receiver appointed by the respondent court and the trustees appointed by the superior court in Los Angeles county cannot both act to administer the trust at the same time. All of the beneficiaries and parties in the Tulare county action are represented in the action pending in Los Angeles county and the court there in the exercise of its equity jurisdiction has power to bring before it all of the persons who may be affected by its decrees. More than that is not necessary under the circumstances existing here.

[4] Furthermore, following the principles stated in A. G. Col Co. v. Superior Court, supra, sufficient appears to justify the issuance of the peremptory writ on the ground that the respondent court under the facts disclosed acted in excess of its jurisdiction in appointing a receiver on an ex parte application. This became apparent when the several motions were made and it was revealed, if it was not theretofore known to the respondents, that the action was pending in Los Angeles county for the purpose of instructing the trustee under the trust agreement and that an officer competent to protect and preserve the property from loss had possession of and was actively administering the trust res at the time the ex parte application for the order appointing a receiver was made in Tulare county. This was not, therefore, a case of the greatest emergency, where, without such ex parte appointment, irreparable injury would unquestionably have resulted. A. G. Col Co. v. Superior Court, supra, page 613 of 196 Cal., 238 P. 926.

In addition to the foregoing it should further be apparent that in this case representation in the bankruptcy proceedings of the interests of the certificate holders by the same person who is also therein appointed a co-receiver of the property and assets of the alleged bankrupt might give rise to a conflict of interest and might result in placing the receiver in a position which he should prefer not to hold. On this application, therefore, in order better to serve the interests of the certificate holders it appears that the trustees appointed by the superior court in Los Angeles county to succeed the Metropolitan Trust Company of California as trustee should continue in their office as such trustees exclusive of representation by the receiver appointed in the action in Tulare county.

The respondents also contend that prohibition will not lie where the lower court has itself not passed or ruled upon the question of its jurisdiction. The respondents state that the court in Tulare county was never presented with a motion or proceeding nor did the court pass upon the question of its jurisdiction to entertain the action in partition. But their answer admits that motions raising the question of jurisdiction were presented and that the court failed to rule thereon for the reason that it refused to substitute the petitioners in the action. Assuming the proposition presented to be correct in law and procedure, it cannot be deemed to be well taken under the facts admitted.

The respondents do not question that the petitioners are persons beneficially interested so as to be entitled to institute this proceeding. Section 1103, Code Civ. Proc.

Let the peremptory writ issue as prayed.

Supreme Court of California.

Aug. 1, 1932.

Rehearing Denied Aug. 29, 1932.

1. Attachment ⇐333.

To avoid liability on bond to prevent attachment, sureties must show that attachment proceedings were void and null from inception.

2. Attachment ⇐352.

Truth of recitals in affidavit for attachment that action was on contract for payment of money cannot be tried in independent action on undertaking to prevent or release attachment (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 537, 540).

3. Attachment ⇐352.

Whether action for money received and conversion was based on contract or tort was not matter of jurisdiction, but of evidence, as to which complaint on which attachment was based was not conclusive in action on undertaking to prevent attachment (Code Civ. Proc. § 537).

4. Attachment ⇐333.

Undertaking, given to prevent attachment, that sureties would pay plaintiff amount of judgment recovered "in said action," held not limited to cause of action for money received, so as to relieve them from liability because of court's failure to make finding on issues raised thereby.

Words "in said action," taken in their ordinary meaning, referred to "right or power to enforce an obligation," nature of which was stated by complaint comprising all counts or causes of action therein stated.

Action by Maurice T. L. Koehler against J. H. Serr and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants Serr and others appeal.

Affirmed.

Superseding opinion in 5 P.(2d) 928.

Michael F. Shannon and Thomas A. Wood, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHENK, J.

This is an appeal from a judgment for the plaintiff in an action to recover on an undertaking given to prevent an attachment.

The undertaking recited the commencement of an action by the plaintiff against Leonards & Co. to recover the sum of $14,748.30, the issuance of a writ of attachment in that action, and the desire of the defendant Leonards & Company to prevent the levy of the same. The sureties on the bond to prevent the attachment, who are the defendants herein, "in consideration of the premises and to prevent the levy of said attachment," undertook and promised that, "if the plaintiff shall recover judgment in said action against Leonards & Company," they will pay to the plaintiff on demand the amount of the judgment not exceeding the sum mentioned. In the attachment suit the plaintiff recovered judgment against the defendants therein including Leonards & Co. in the sum of $10,910.90, with interest.

In the present action the defendants interposed defenses on two theories: First, that the attachment proceedings were illegal and void, and the bond given to prevent such an attachment was therefore a nullity. Second, that the judgment in the attachment suit was not recovered on the cause of action upon which the attachment was issued. The trial court rejected these defenses, and rendered judgment against the sureties on the bond, from which judgment this appeal is taken. The only question presented is whether the defendants should have prevailed on either of said defenses.

On the trial the judgment roll in the attachment suit was introduced in evidence. The complaint in that action alleged four causes of action. The first was a common count for money had and received in the sum of $14,748.30. The second was for the conversion of 10,000 shares of stock of Comstock Silver Mining Company and cash in the sum of $1,750, of a total value of $9,950. The third charged the conversion of the sum of $2,010.90 paid by the plaintiff as the purchase price of stock which he never received; and the fourth was for the conversion of shares of stock and cash of the total value of $2,450. The prayer was for the recovery of the sum of $14,748.30, with interest.

The defendants contend that the plaintiff's real grievance in that action was founded in tort and not on a contract for the payment of money, as provided by section 537 of the Code of Civil Procedure, that the attachment proceedings were void, and that there was therefore no consideration for the undertaking.

The question for determination is whether the rule stated in Passow & Sons v. United States F. & G. Co., 177 Cal. 31, 37–40, 170 P. 1124, 1127, consistently applied in this state (see McMillan v. Dana, 18 Cal. 339; Smith v. Fargo, 57 Cal. 157; Pierce v. Whiting, 63 Cal. 538, 540; McCormick v. National Surety Co., 134 Cal. 510, 66 P. 741; Bailey v. Ætna Indemnity Co., 5 Cal. App. 740, 91 P. 416; Tormey v. McIntosh, 43 Cal. App. 411, 184 P. 1012; Heine v. Wright, 76 Cal. App. 338, 244 P. 955; Barrios & Co. v. Indemnity Ins. Co., 101 Cal. App. 675, 282 P. 386; 3 Cal. Jur. p. 532; see, also, 2 R. C. L. 890, 891), is applicable to the facts here presented, or whether the case is controlled by the holding in Mudge v. Steinhart, 78 Cal. 34, 20 P. 147, 12 Am. St. Rep. 17, and Pacific National Bank v. Mixter, 124 U. S. 721, 8 S. Ct. 718, 31 L. Ed. 567.

[1] Stone v. Superior Court (Cal. Sup.) 4 P.(2d) 777, 77 A. L. R. 743, and similar cases (San Francisco Iron & Metal Co. v. Abraham, 211 Cal. 552, 296 P. 82; Willett & Burr v. Alpert, 181 Cal. 652, 185 P. 976; Hallidie v. Enginger, 175 Cal. 505, 166 P. 1; Powers v. Freeland, 114 Cal. App. 146, 299 P. 736), are cited by the defendants as supporting their contention that the attachment proceedings in the action of Koehler v. Leonards & Company were void. The defendants may not rest content with the assertion that the attachment proceedings need be shown to be merely voidable in order to support their contention that they are not liable on the bond. The case of Passow & Sons v. United States F. & G. Co., and cases to like effect, hereinbefore cited, show the lack of any merit in that contention. Therefore, in order to avoid the application of the rule in those cases, the defendants must show in a proper proceeding that the attachment proceedings in the case of Koehler v. Leonards & Company were void and a nullity from their inception. See Mudge v. Steinhart, 78 Cal. 34, 20 P. 147, 12 Am. St. Rep. 17. They urge that the case of Stone v. Superior Court, supra, so determined. But that case involved, not a collateral attack as in the present case, but a direct attack upon the order discharging the attachment. There the plaintiff had joined with her cause of action for damages for fraud and deceit a common count for money had and received. On the ground that the cause of action sounding in tort was the true basis of the plaintiff's right to recover in that action, it was determined that the defendants were entitled to have the writ of attachment discharged. The other similar cases relied upon by the defendants also involved a direct attack on the attachment proceedings, and the necessity of determining whether the attachment proceedings were void or merely voidable was not presented.

[2] The case of Passow & Sons v. United States F. & G. Co., supra, was an action upon an undertaking given to release an attachment. The defense interposed was that the averment in the affidavit in support of the attachment, that the debt was not secured by a lien, was false. There it was said: "No attack was made upon the attachment by Bowman [the defendant] in the main action. Instead of moving that it be dissolved on the ground that the affidavit that the debt was not secured by a lien was false, he procured the exemption of his property from the levy by giving the undertaking here sued on. In this condition of affairs the present defendant executed the undertaking sued on. It must be presumed to have accepted the conditions then existing as the measure of its rights, and to have executed the undertaking with that understanding. The principle is settled in this state that a surety upon an undertaking given under section 540 to release an attachment cannot interpose the objection, in a suit upon such undertaking, that the property attached, if any, was not subject to levy, or that the attachment was irregularly issued because of a false affidavit filed by the plaintiff to procure it. In McMillan v. Dana, 18 Cal. 349, the court said of such an undertaking that: The sureties promise, 'in consideration of the release of the property from the attachment, that in the event of a recovery of the judgment by the plaintiff, they will pay the amount of the judgment. * * * The object of giving the undertaking was to procure this release, and this release was had in consequence of the undertaking; and the consideration of the undertaking therefore is the release so procured. In consideration of this release, the obligors agree to pay the judgment. Whether the property was redelivered to Vischer or not was wholly immaterial. * * * Nor does it matter whether the property was subject to attachment or not. That matter cannot be tried in this collateral way. It is enough that the plaintiff had this property levied on as subject to his debt, and that these sureties procured its release upon the stipulation that, in consideration of such release, they would pay the amount of the judgment to be recovered by the plaintiff in the attachment suit. Nor was any proof necessary of the preliminary proceedings connected with or preceding the levy; for these defendants admit the levy of the attachment on this property, and this is enough.' On petition for rehearing the court said that 'by the contract the parties have bound themselves to pay in an event independent of all considerations of this sort,' referring to the fact that they had bound themselves to pay the judgment in consideration of the discharge." The court reviewed other previous decisions in this state as supporting its decision and concluded: "In view of these authorities, we are of the opinion that the defendant here is not in a position to complain of the conduct of the plaintiff in bringing the action upon a debt which was previously secured by some sort of lien upon property, which he might have enforced instead of waiving it and bringing suit for the debt. The surety must be presumed to have been aware of the facts and to have made its contract accordingly. It was an unconditional agreement to pay the amount of the judgment when rendered."

The doctrine of the Passow and like cases is controlling here. The consideration for the undertaking in the present case is, as recited therein, the prevention of the levy of the writ of attachment, and supports the promise on the part of the defendant as sufficiently as the promise to release the attachment in the Passow Case. If, on collateral attack, the fact that the affidavit is false as to the unsecured status of the debt is no defense, then the falsity of the affidavit as to the true character of the plaintiff's cause of action as disclosed by the proof can be no defense, where, as here, the allegations of the complaint and the averments of the affidavit are prima facie sufficient. If the defense is good in the one case, it should be good in the other.

In Pacific National Bank v. Mixter, supra, an attachment against the property of national banks was involved. Such an attachment was expressly prohibited by statute, and it was held that the attachment proceedings were on that account void and ineffective for any purpose because issued without any authority of law. As to the present case, there is authority of law for the attachment if the action counts upon a contract, express or implied, for the payment of money, based upon an affidavit reciting those facts; and we are of the view that the truth or falsity of such recitals cannot be tried in an independent action to recover upon the undertaking given to prevent or release such an attachment. In other words, as applied to the present case, the attachment proceedings in the former action were voidable only, and are beyond inquiry on collateral attack. If it be deemed that the Mixter Case is inconsistent with the language contained in the opinion of the Passow Case, we must conclude that nevertheless the latter controls the present case.

[3] Nor is the case of Mudge v. Steinhart, supra, opposed to this view. The action in Koehler v. Leonards & Company was in personam, wherein the court without question had jurisdiction of the parties and the subject-matter. The case of Mudge v. Steinhart was an action in rem, wherein the jurisdiction of the court depended on the validity of the attachment proceedings. Here the question whether the plaintiff's grievance in the action of Koehler v. Leonards & Company was based on contract or tort was a matter, not of jurisdiction, but of evidence, as to which the complaint upon which the attachment was based was an important but not a conclusive factor. San Francisco Iron & Metal Co. v. Abraham, 211 Cal. 552, 296 P. 82.

[4] The defendants further contend that said undertaking was issued only upon the first cause of action stated in the complaint in the case of Koehler v. Leonards & Company, and that, as the court in that action made no findings upon the issues raised by the first cause of action, they are not liable on the undertaking. A complete answer to this contention is that the undertaking is not so limited. The defendants undertook and promised that, if the plaintiff shall recover judgment "in said action" against the defendant, Leonards & Co., they will pay to the plaintiff the amount of said judgment. The words "in said action" must be taken in their ordinary meaning, unless otherwise expressly limited, and, when so considered, they refer to "the right or power to enforce an obligation," and the complaint, comprising all of the counts or causes of action therein set out, is a statement of the nature of the obligation or obligations sought to be enforced in the action. See Frost v. Witter, 132 Cal. 421, 64 P. 705, 84 Am. St. Rep. 53.

The judgment is affirmed.

Assessing such expenses against the wife procuring receiver's appointment over co-respondent's property was no abuse of discretion, because, though alleged co-respondent was named as party defendant and charged as co-respondent, this should not justify the seizure of her separate property, because she consistently resisted the receivership proceeding, and because the receivership was not created for her benefit.

WASTE, C. J.

This is an appeal from an order discharging a receiver and directing plaintiff to pay his fees. Plaintiff brought this action against her husband for permanent support and maintenance and to secure a division of their community property. The other named defendants were alleged to improperly claim some interest or estate in the property. Among other things, the complaint averred that certain real property known as the "Sunland Ranch," standing in the name of the defendant and alleged co-respondent Lavender, was in fact the property of the defendant husband and had been vested in the former solely for the purpose of defrauding the plaintiff. Defendant Lavender denied these allegations in her answer. At plaintiff's request, a receiver was appointed to take charge of the properties, including that standing in the name of the defendant Lavender, during the pendency of the cause. At the conclusion of the trial a decree was entered granting to the plaintiff support and maintenance and providing for a division of the properties of the spouses. The decree further declared, in accordance with the findings, that the "Sunland Ranch," standing in the name of the defendant Lavender, was in fact her sole and separate property and that plaintiff was without right, title, or interest therein. From this latter portion of the judgment the plaintiff noticed an appeal to this court, which was dismissed on June 3, 1930, for lack of prosecution. After the remittitur had gone down the defendant Lavender moved for a discharge of the receiver and the return of her property. In due time the court below made its order approving the final report and account of the receiver, directing that plaintiff pay his expenses and fees aggregating $2,200, and directing that the receiver return possession of the "Sunland Ranch" to its owner, the defendant Lavender. The order further provided that the expenses and fees of the receiver "should not be chargeable to the defendant Judith Lane Lavender, and should not be made a charge or lien against any property belonging to her."

From this order the plaintiff wife and the receiver have both appealed, the appeals being consolidated by stipulation. The plaintiff complains of the order in so far as it discharges the receiver and places the burden on her of paying his expenses and fees, while the receiver complains that the plaintiff is in indigent circumstances and that his expenses and fees should therefore be paid out of the property or by the third party owner thereof, the defendant Lavender.

[1] In our opinion the order appealed from was, and is, a proper order. At the time of its entry the "Sunland Ranch" was the only property remaining in the receiver's hands. Inasmuch as the judgment decreeing this ranch to be the sole and separate property of the defendant Lavender had theretofore become conclusive and final, and it appearing that the receiver had otherwise fully served and fulfilled the purpose for which he had been appointed, it was proper that the court below should direct the receiver to return the possession of the "Sunland Ranch" to the defendant Lavender and then discharge him.

[2, 3] We perceive no impropriety in assessing the receiver's fees and expenses against the plaintiff, who sought and procured his appointment, rather than against the defendant Lavender or her property. As a general proposition the costs of a receivership are primarily a charge upon the property in the receiver's possession and are to be paid out of said property. However, this is not an invariable rule. In many cases a direct liability is imposed upon the parties to the action, or upon some of them, for the remuneration of the receiver. Such direct liability may result from an irregularity in the appointment, insufficiency of the property, agreement of the parties, etc. Ephraim v. Pacific Bank, 129 Cal. 589, 592, 62 P. 177; Frick v. Fritz, 124 Iowa, 529, 531–536, 100 N. W. 513, 514; 53 C. J. 299, §§ 495–497, 501.

The language of the Iowa case, supra, is particularly applicable to the present case. It is there stated:

"The general rule is well established that the expenses of the receivership are to be satisfied out of the property or funds coming into the hands of the receiver, and this rule is so universally accepted as the starting point for all discussion that authorities supporting it need not be cited. Where the object of the receivership is to preserve the property pending a determination of the rights of the parties to the litigation with reference to such property or the proceeds thereof, there is no question but that the successful party, availing himself of the fruits of the litigation, must take subject to the burden of the costs of the receivership, and it is immaterial whether the plaintiff has succeeded in asserting the rights in aid of which the receivership has been asked, or whether the defendant has established the invalidity of plaintiff's claims. * * * And this rule is properly applied where the contest is not as to the regularity or legality of the proceedings for the appointment of the receiver, but only as to the disposition of the proceeds of the property or funds. * * *

"But where the right of the plaintiff to subject the property for which he seeks to have a receiver appointed to the payment of his claim is resisted from the beginning, and the effect of the appointment of a receiver is to subject to the control of such receiver property in which the plaintiff is, as the result of the litigation, found to have had no interest or right whatever, it would evidently be manifestly unjust that, after determination of the case against the plaintiff, he should be allowed to have the expenses of the receivership, which he has occasioned by his unfounded claim, and from which the opposite party derives no benefit, satisfied out of the property itself. Such a result would be inequitable, for it would throw upon defendant the burden of a litigation instituted by plaintiff without right. * * * And it seems to be a well-established rule that property which should not have been brought within the jurisdiction of or taken possession of by a receiver should not be appropriated to the payment of the expenses of the receivership. In such cases the receiver must look for his compensation to the portion of the fund which was properly brought within his jurisdiction, or, if there is no such fund, then to the plaintiff on whose application the receivership was secured."

While in the instant case the defendant Lavender was named as a party defendant and charged in the complaint as co-respondent, this should not justify the seizing and sequestering of her sole and separate property. From the institution of the action she asserted her complete and separate ownership of "Sunland Ranch," denying by way of answer and otherwise that either plaintiff or defendant Andrade had any interest in or claim upon the same. For this reason she has consistently resisted the taking of her property by the receiver. The receivership necessarily was not created for her benefit. On the contrary, it could only have been detrimental to her interests, and from the beginning has been a violation of her property rights. It would be inequitable to charge the expenses and fees of the receiver against the property of one who has established her right to the property in hostility to the entire receivership proceedings. Under the circumstances, it is our opinion that the court below acted with propriety and not in abuse of its discretion when it decreed the return of defendant Lavender's property free and clear of any receivership charges.

[4] What we have said sufficiently disposes of the present appeal. We do not find it necessary, therefore, to consider the many points urged by the appellant as to the defendant Lavender's alleged relations with the defendant Andrade or having to do with the propriety of the judgment decreeing the "Sunland Ranch" to be the sole and separate property of defendant Lavender. These and many other points raised by the appellant were determined by the judgment entered in the cause on August 6, 1927, which judgment has long since become final. It is elementary that any and all matters therein determined are now beyond review.

Examination of the transcript satisfies us as to the propriety of the trial court's conclusion. We find that appellant was in no way prejudiced by the rulings on the evidence.

There is nothing in appellant's briefs calling for further discussion.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

PASADENA JUNIOR COLLEGE DIST. et al. v. BOARD OF SUPERVISORS OF LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al.

S. F. 14668.

Supreme Court of California.

July 25, 1932.

1. Schools and school districts ⇐103(4).

Tax levied to reimburse junior college for educating outside students should, under stipulation, be considered as reimbursing expenditures for preceding year (School Code, §§ 4.270, 4.271 [St. 1931, pp. 2575, 2576]).

2. Schools and school districts ⇐103(4).

County supervisors have no discretion to reduce amount payable to junior college for educating outside students (School Code, § 4.271 [St. 1931, p. 2575]).

3. Schools and school districts ⇐103(4).

That new junior college district was organized in county just before tax levy held not to authorize deduction from amount due junior college for educating outside students (School Code, § 4.271 [St. 1931, p. 2575]).

4. Schools and school districts ⇐103(4).

County supervisors, having made illegal reduction in levying taxes to reimburse junior college, for expense of educating outside students, could make relevy in following year to make up deficit (School Code, § 4.271 [St. 1931, p. 2575]).

5. Schools and school districts ⇐103(4).

Where original levy for reimbursing junior college for educating outside students was insufficient, new levy should be made on property within new junior college district which was formerly relieved of tax (School Code, § 4.271 [St. 1931, p. 2575]).

According to the stipulation, the previous levy to defray cost of educating junior college students residing outside of junior college district was limited to property outside new junior college district, and tax on property owners in new district lower than that originally levied would be sufficient to make up deficit.

This is an original proceeding in mandamus to compel the defendants to levy, assess, and extend a tax sufficient to repay the plaintiff junior college districts moneys expended by them during the school year 1930–31 for educating pupils residing in the county of Los Angeles but not in any junior college district.

The plaintiffs are junior college districts organized under the laws of the state of California and the trustees of the respective districts. During the school year 1930–31, each of the plaintiff junior college districts received in their junior colleges and educated therein pupils who resided in Los Angeles county and not in any junior college district, and expended the following amounts, respectively, for such purpose:

Pasadena Junior College.....	$114,016.83
Glendale Junior College.....	44,869.86
Compton Junior College.....	94,334.75
Long Beach Junior College.....	30,163.34
Fullerton Junior College.....	25,103.24
Chaffey Junior College.....	33,512.37

The superintendent of schools of Los Angeles county on July 20, 1931, pursuant to sections 4.630 to 4.634 of the School Code (as then existing), reported these amounts to the board of supervisors of Los Angeles county, which, together with the claims of other junior college districts, constituted the amount to be raised for the junior college tuition fund. Among the students who were enrolled in plaintiff junior college districts and the cost of whose education was included in said districts, were students who resided in the Los Angeles city high school district. This district was organized as a junior college district by virtue of an election held in March, 1931, but did not become fully organized until July 1, 1931, which was after the close of the school year 1930–31. It therefore appears that, at the time the tax levy for the year 1931 was required to be made, on September 1, 1931 (Pol. Code, § 3714 [as amended by St. 1929, p. 1129]), property within the Los Angeles city high school district and the newly organized junior college district was not strictly speaking property within the county of Los Angeles outside of a junior college district, but that at all times during the school year 1930–31 and during which time the pupils were educated, the property within the Los Angeles city high school district was property in the county of Los Angeles not within any junior college district. It was urged by the defendant supervisors and auditor that the property within the Los Angeles city high school district, by reason of its creation into a junior college district, could not be taxed for the cost of educating pupils during the school year 1930–31, and therefore there was deducted from the claims of the respective districts the cost of educating pupils residing in the Los Angeles city high school district, and a supplemental report purporting to be in place of the one previously filed was filed by the superintendent of schools with the board of supervisors and auditor on August 31, 1931. This was after the time for making changes in any part of the county budget had elapsed. Pol. Code, § 3714. Deducting these costs from the claims of the district left a balance of $199,427.87 to be raised for the junior college tuition fund. However, because the board of supervisors wished to keep the total school tax levy under 48 cents per $100 valuation, and not being willing to decrease the amount of the elementary school tax, which would be necessary if the junior college tuition fund tax were increased, the superintendent of schools fixed the amount to be raised at approximately $139,998.36. At the time the board of supervisors passed its resolution fixing the tax rate for the junior college tuition fund, it fixed the amount to be raised for such fund at $139,001.45, and made the tax levy accordingly. This levy was not made upon any property situate in the newly created Los Angeles city junior college district which formerly comprised the territory of the Los Angeles city high school district, but was levied upon all other property in Los Angeles county not within a junior college district either at the time of the levy or during the school year of 1930–31. These deductions had the following effect upon the respective plaintiffs as to the amounts claimed by each:

Name of District	Deduction for Los Angeles Pupils	Further Deduction to Reduce Tax Rate	Total Still Due District
Pasadena	$ 30,999.30	$24,739.22	$ 55,738.52
Glendale	29,138.02	4,688.09	33,826.11
Compton	65,376.34	8,629.61	74,005.95
Long Beach...	22,114.57	2,398.53	24,513.10
Fullerton	784.01	7,247.13	8,031.14
Chaffey	704.80	9,776.66	10,481.46
Totals	$149,117.04	$57,479.24	$206,596.28

If the tax levy of $.026 per $100 as to real property and $.011 per $100 as to personal property fixed by the supervisors for the junior college tuition fund had been levied on all property in the county outside of junior college districts and inclusive of property within the Los Angeles city high school district, more than sufficient funds would have been raised to repay plaintiffs the amounts due them for educating pupils residing outside of junior college districts during the school year 1930–31, and, if a levy were made this year for the purpose of meeting the deficit and was levied only upon property formerly situated in the Los Angeles city high school district, the rate would not exceed the said rate of $.026 on real property and $.011 on personal property.

It is to be noted that, while the school tax estimates are to be submitted on the 20th day of July in each year (Pol. Code, § 3714, subd. 1), and in the instant case the estimate then submitted by the superintendent included the full amount necessary to pay to plaintiffs the cost of educating pupils residing outside of junior college districts, and while these estimates cannot be changed or modified by the board of supervisors (Pol. Code, § 3714, subd. 4), and no change can be adopted even as to the county general tax after the 30th of August (Pol. Code, § 3714, subd. 4), the board and superintendent of schools, in the instant case, did, on the 31st day of August, 1931, reduce the amount of the estimate for the junior college tuition fund and on the next day, and before plaintiffs could in any way object, the board made a tax levy raising only a portion of the funds required to reimburse plaintiffs for their expenditures previously made, and plaintiffs did not learn of this action on the part of the board of supervisors until after the levy had been made.

On May 16, 1932, plaintiffs made a demand upon the board of supervisors that it recognize and allow the deficit thus created as a valid claim against the junior college tuition fund and provide funds for its payment by a levy to be made this year (1932) upon property liable for the deficit. The board, by resolution adopted on the same day, refused to recognize or allow the claim or to take any steps whatever looking toward the raising of money for the purpose of paying the same. This proceeding then followed such refusal.

It is the position of respondents in the first place that the levy for the junior college tuition fund tax made on or about September 1, 1931, was made to pay current expenses for the school year, 1931–32, and not for the next preceding school year 1930–31, and therefore, as the Los Angeles junior college district had been organized prior to the commencement of the school year 1931–32, the board of supervisors of the county of Los Angeles was without authority to levy a tax on the property situated therein to pay any expenses incurred by the plaintiffs' junior colleges for the year 1931–32. The factual situation which the respondents contend existed at the time of the levy of said tax is inconsistent with and directly contrary to the stipulation of facts signed by the parties and filed herein. Paragraphs IV and VI of said stipulation read as follows:

"IV. That at all times herein mentioned one A. R. Clifton was the duly appointed, qualified and acting Superintendent of Schools of said Los Angeles County, and G. F. Gairing was his duly appointed, qualified and acting deputy; that on July 20, 1931, the said County Superintendent of Schools, by said deputy, made to said defendant Supervisors and to said defendant Auditor a written report, in which he showed and stated that the plaintiffs had expended the sums above set forth during the school year 1930–1931, in educating junior college pupils, residing in said Los Angeles County and not in any junior college district; that said report referred to the sums so spent by plaintiffs during the school year 1930–1931 and all of the defendants above named understood and were aware of said facts. That said report was correct and correctly set forth the true amounts expended by junior college districts, including plaintiffs, during the school year 1930–1931, in educating pupils residing in said Los Angeles County and not within a junior college district.

"VI. That following the receipt of said report of said County Superintendent of Schools of Los Angeles County, the said defendant Supervisors and said defendant Auditor represented to said County Superintendent of Schools that the cost of educating pupils residing in said Los Angeles City High School District during the school year 1930–1931 could not and should not be included in the tax to be levied by said defendant Supervisors in September, 1931, for the purpose of raising money for the junior college tuition fund for educating pupils residing in Los Angeles County and not in any junior college district, for the reason that a junior college district had been organized in said Los Angeles City High School District in 1931, to-wit, said Los Angeles City Junior College District, and directed said Superintendent of Schools to deduct from the said cost incurred by plaintiffs, as aforesaid, all costs incurred in educating pupils residing in said Los Angeles City High School District."

It clearly appears from the facts thus stipulated that the report of the superintendent of schools made in July, 1931, and the action of the board of supervisors in making the levy on or about September 1, 1931, both related to and were taken for the purpose of reimbursing the junior colleges for the cost of educating students, residing in the county of Los Angeles and outside of any junior college district, for the next preceding school year (1930–31), and not for the succeeding school year (1931–32). At the time of said levy, September 1, 1931, the law governing the subject was found in sections 4.270 and 4.271 (St. 1931, pp. 2575, 2576), which are as follows:

"4.270. Not later than the twentieth day of July of each year the superintendent of schools of each county in which there is not a county junior college shall certify to the board of supervisors and to the county auditor of such county the total cost for education during the next preceding school year of all junior college pupils residing in such county and not in any junior college district and the estimated amount needed for that purpose for the current year.

"The said total cost shall not include outlays for permanent construction or improvements, nor moneys received from state apportionment, but shall include sixty-five dollars per unit of average daily attendance for the use of buildings and equipment.

"4.271. The board of supervisors with whom such certificate is filed must, at the time of making the tax levy for that year for county purposes, levy a special tax upon all taxable property in the county not situated in any junior college district, sufficient in amount to defray the costs, during the preceding school year, of educating all junior college students residing in such county and not in any junior college district."

It will thus be seen that under the law in force at the time of said levy and which remains unchanged, it was the duty of the board of supervisors to "levy a special tax * * * sufficient in amount to defray the costs, during the preceding school year, of educating all junior college students residing in such county and not in any junior college district."

[1] It is apparent, therefore, that the superintendent of schools and the board of supervisors at the time of said levy were governed by the provisions of these two Code sections. Under the law it was their duty to provide for the reimbursement of the junior colleges for money already expended by said colleges during the preceding year for the educating of students residing in the county of Los Angeles and not within any junior college district. They made certain deductions from the amounts actually expended by the plaintiffs in the education of these outside students, and the board of supervisors refused to levy a tax on property within the former Los Angeles city high school district, then within the Los Angeles city junior college district, for the reason that said junior college district had been created during the school year 1930–31. These matters will be given later consideration. We are now concerned simply with the object and purpose of said levy made on September 1, 1931, which, as we have seen, was to reimburse the plaintiff districts for money expended by them during the school year 1930–31, and was not to provide funds for the current school year 1931–32. Respondents claim that the cost of educating said outside students for the school year 1930–31 was paid by a tax levied by the board of supervisors on September 1, 1930. We think this claim cannot be sustained. Paragraph XVII of the stipulation of facts covers this subject, and is as follows:

"That junior college districts have uniformly presented claims to the Superintendent of Schools showing the cost of educating students residing outside of junior college districts during the preceding school year and that the Superintendent of Schools has submitted this cost as being the amount necessary for the junior college tuition fund and that junior college districts have reimbursed themselves from moneys received from such fund for their expenditures made during the preceding school year for the education of such pupils."

From this stipulation it appears that it had been the uniform practice for junior colleges to be reimbursed for expenditures incurred by them in the education of outside students by a tax levy made during the school year immediately following that in which said expenditures were made. This being the case, the money raised by the tax levy of September 1, 1930, did not pay the plaintiff districts for the cost incurred by them during the year 1930–31, but was for the cost incurred during the preceding year (1929–30). Respondents contend that under the law as in force prior to the enactment of section 4.271 of the School Code in 1931, which was in reality only an amendment of section 4.631 of said Code, (St. 1929 [School Code, p. 181]) there was no authority vested in the board of supervisors for levying a tax to pay the cost of educating outside students for the next preceding year, but that said section 4.631 of the School Code, and the corresponding provision of the statute creating junior colleges (St. 1921, p. 756) each expressly provided for the levy of a tax to pay the expenses of educating outside students for the current year, which would be for the school year following the levy and not for the school year next preceding said levy. Conceding that the statute of 1921 and these School Code sections are susceptible of the construction claimed for them by respondents, it is evident that neither the officers of the junior colleges, nor the authorities charged with the administration of these laws, placed any such a construction upon them. On the other hand, these public officials followed the uniform practice of reimbursing the districts after and not before the districts had made the expenditures. Finally in 1931, evidently to clear up any uncertainty that might exist in the law upon this subject and possibly to make the law fit the practice followed by said officials, the Legislature enacted section 4.271 of the School Code expressly providing that the tax levy should cover "the cost during the preceding year" of educating said outside students. From the foregoing it is perfectly apparent that the costs of educating outside students for the school year 1930–31 were not paid to these plaintiffs by funds raised by the tax levy of 1930. These costs were unpaid at the close of said year, and, under the law in force at the time of the levy of September 1, 1931, it was the duty of the board of supervisors of the county of Los Angeles to levy a tax sufficient in amount to defray the same.

[2] Having determined that it was the duty of the board of supervisors of the county of Los Angeles to levy a tax "sufficient in amount to defray the costs during the preceding school year, of educating all junior college students residing in such county and not in any junior college district," we will now take up the deductions which the superintendent of schools under the direction of the board of supervisors and later the board of supervisors in effect made from the actual costs incurred by the plaintiffs for the education of such students for the school year 1930–31. The first of these deductions was the sum of $149,117.04, which was made by reason of the fact that the Los Angeles city junior college district had been organized on July 1, 1931, after the close of the school year 1930–31. The other deduction, amounting to the sum of $57,479.24, appears to be simply the result of an arbitrary act of the officials, and no serious attempt is made by respondents to justify such deduction. The provisions of the School Code (section 4.271) is mandatory upon the board of supervisors. It has no discretion to revise or in any manner modify the amount as fixed by legally constituted authorities. Practically the same question was before this court in the recent case of Esberg v. Badaracco, 202 Cal. 110, 259 P. 730, and it was there held that, while it was the duty of the board of supervisors to levy the tax, the determination of the amount thereof was for the board of education. The facts in that case and the law applicable thereto are in principle similar to those in the instant case. The deduction of $57,479.24 was therefore without any lawful authority, and was illegal.

[3] The deduction of $149,117.04 by reason of the fact that the Los Angeles city junior college district had been organized prior to the tax levy of September 1, 1931, is justified by the respondents under the terms of the statute (section 4.271 of the School Code), which limits the levy therein provided for to "taxable property in the county not situated in any junior college district." According to the strict letter of the statute, the action of the board of supervisors in making this deduction might be sustained. Respondents rely upon the ruling of this court in the case of Hughes v. Ewing, 93 Cal. 414, 419, 28 P. 1067. In that case the board of supervisors of Fresno county levied a tax upon land which had been excluded from the Fresno city school district. The purpose of the tax was to pay for a school building which the electors of the district had voted to construct just prior to the exclusion from said district of the lands sought to be taxed. The board levied the tax upon all property within the district at the time the vote was taken, including the excluded lands. Plaintiffs, the owners of said excluded lands, brought said action to declare the tax null and void. The action was finally determined in their favor, not because the excluded lands were not within the district at the time of the levy, but because the owners of said lands would receive no benefit whatever from the building to be constructed. In that case it was sought to justify the levy of the tax upon the excluded territory by resort to a strict construction of the statute which provided that the levy of the tax should be made upon the property "within the district voting for the same." It was argued, as the excluded lands were within the district when the tax was voted, that they were a part of the district "voting for the same," and therefore should be subject to the tax to pay for the improvement even though the owners of said lands had been excluded from all benefits to be derived from the construction of the building. In answer to this argument, this court said: "Irrespective of the construction thus given to the section, it would be difficult, upon principle, to uphold the validity of a tax upon property which is without the district to be benefited by the expenditure of the money so to be raised. The theory upon which the power of taxation is authorized is the benefit to the tax-payer. It would be manifestly unjust to compel a contribution by tax to an object or for the benefit of a class in which the taxpayer is directly excluded from participating." That case differs most materially from the instant case. Here the tax sought to be imposed upon the property owners within the newly created Los Angeles city junior college district was for the purpose of raising funds to pay for a benefit which said property owners had already received and enjoyed. It would be most inequitable and unjust to impose this burden upon the plaintiffs, or to spread it over the balance of the property in said county not within a junior college district, after the organization of the Los Angeles city junior college district. We are satisfied that the Legislature never intended to create any such indefensible condition. "It is the purpose of all revenue laws as nearly as possible to impose upon all property its just proportion of taxation, and a construction of the statute should not be had which will permit * * * properties * * * to escape their just proportion of such taxation." Chesebrough v. City and County of San Francisco, 153 Cal. 559, 568, 96 P. 288, 291. It would be contrary to the very spirit of our laws, which seeks to impose upon all property in the state its just proportion of taxation, for this court to hold that the property owners within the territory embraced within the newly organized Los Angeles city junior college district, after enjoying the privileges afforded by the several plaintiff junior colleges during the school year of 1930–31, could escape paying for these privileges by organizing a district of their own just prior to the time fixed by law for the next tax levy. We are satisfied that such result was never intended. The deduction by the board of supervisors of the said amount for pupils residing in the newly organized Los Angeles city junior college district was therefore unauthorized and illegal.

[4] Finally the respondents contend that there is no power or authority in the board of supervisors of Los Angeles county to make a relevy of taxes to meet the amounts illegally and unlawfuly deducted by said board in their levy of September 1, 1931. By reference to section 4.271 of the School Code, it will be seen that it is made the duty of the board of supervisors to levy this tax "at the time of making the tax levy for that year for county purposes." The time fixed for the levy of taxes for county purposes is fixed as not later than September 1st. It is now argued by the respondents that as the board of supervisors levied a tax on September 1, 1931, for the purpose of defraying the cost of educating outside junior college students for the preceding year, even though the tax levied was not sufficient for that purpose, said board has no power or authority to make a relevy at the appointed time in the year 1932 to make up said deficit due to the insufficient levy of the previous year. If the board is without such authority, it follows, of course, that the court will not issue its writ of mandate to compel the performance of an illegal or idle act. Respondents have cited four cases in support of their assertion that the board of supervisors has no right or authority to make such relevy. The earliest of these cases is Board of Education of City of San Diego v. Common Council, 128 Cal. 369, 60 P. 976. This case involved an application for a writ of mandate to compel the common council of San Diego to levy a tax for the purpose of maintaining the public schools of San Diego for the fiscal year 1899. The common council refused to make such a levy. The petitioner then applied to the board of supervisors of the county to levy the tax. The board levied the tax, and that tax had been paid. On page 370 of 128 Cal., 60 P. 976, the court said: "It is * * * apparent that the object sought to be obtained by the writ asked for has already been accomplished through a different instrumentality." The court therefore held that the writ would not issue to compel the taxpayers to pay the same tax twice—such a procedure would be unjust and unfair. This was the real basis of the opinion. The court further held, however, as an additional ground for denying the writ, that the writ could not issue because the time of the levy had already expired. The court held that "a levy made after the date therein provided would be invalid." It will be noted, however, that the tax which the plaintiffs there asked to have levied was for the purpose of raising funds for maintaining said schools for the fiscal year 1899, and it was to compel the levy of this 1899 tax that the plaintiffs asked for a writ of mandate against the common council. The city charter of the city of San Diego expressly fixed the date of levying the tax as "on or before the second Monday in May." The common council refused to make the levy as demanded by plaintiffs. Plaintiffs then instituted said action to compel the levy, which action was commenced after the time fixed for making the levy for that year. The board of education in that case did not wait, as did the plaintiffs in this case, and demand a relevy at the time fixed for levying taxes for the next succeeding year, but immediately commenced their action to force the common council to make the levy during the year 1899. As the time in which the board could act in making said levy for the year 1899 has passed, the action was, of course, commenced too late, and the court very properly held that a tax levy for the fiscal year 1899, made thereafter and during that year, would be invalid.

The next case cited is the case of Board of Education v. Common Council, 1 Cal. App. 311, 82 P. 89. The opinion therein is very brief. It simply follows Board of Education v. Common Council, 128 Cal. 369, 60 P. 976. Each action arose under the charter of the city of San Diego.

McDonald v. Richards, 79 Cal. App. 1, 248 P. 1049, is the third case cited by respondents. That action was brought against the county auditor to compel that officer to levy a tax for high school purposes to meet the deficit caused by the failure of the board of supervisors to levy a sufficient tax to raise the amount required for the maintenance of the high school during the school year 1925–26. It was sought by that proceeding to change and increase the tax levy for high school purposes which had already been made by the board of supervisors. This state of facts is evident from the following statement found on page 19 of 79 Cal. App., 248 P. 1049, 1056: "The facts before us show that the time has long since gone by when any authority exists to order any change in the tax levy already made. The different sections of the Political Code relating to the levying of county taxes, the making out of the assessment rolls by the different ministerial officers having to do therewith show that the power to direct any other assessment has ceased to exist, and that any levy, if it were possible in this proceeding for this court to so order, would but lead to confusion and that, under such circumstances, mandamus will not issue." It is quite evident that by that action it was sought to change and increase the tax levy already made by the board of supervisors for that year, and that the court refused relief on the ground that the assessment rolls for that year were no longer in the custody or control of the auditor, against whom the action was directed, and therefore the power, which the auditor at one time possessed to make an assessment when the board of supervisors had neglected to do so, had ceased to exist.

The fourth and last case cited by respondents is Rice v. McClellan, 202 Cal. 650, 262 P. 1092, 1093. This action was filed September 29, 1927. It was instituted by the board of trustees of the La Ballona high school district against the members of the board of supervisors of the county of Los Angeles, and by means thereof the plaintiffs sought a writ of mandate directed to the defendants commanding them to levy a tax sufficient in amount to maintain said high school for the school year 1927–28. The time fixed for the levy of said tax was not later than September 1, 1927. This court very properly held that "The time has passed when that may be done." That case, like the others cited by respondents and discussed above, involved an application for a writ of mandate to compel the board of supervisors to levy a tax during the current year after the levy date had passed. These cases do not involve the question as to whether a tax can be levied in the subsequent year for an obligation already incurred. After the date upon which the tax can be levied has passed, obviously a writ will not issue to compel its inclusion in the levy of that year.

The authorities just discussed shed but little, if any, light upon the question before us, which is whether the board of supervisors may levy a tax during the present year to make up the deficit in last year's levy caused by the board's failure to levy a tax sufficient to meet the legal demands of the plaintiffs for educating outside students during the school year of 1930–31. We have seen that the claims of plaintiffs were legal demands against the territory situated in the county of Los Angeles and outside of junior college districts. They in reality constituted a debt due plaintiffs by the property owners residing in said territory. It would be most unjust and inequitable to hold that the plaintiffs' right to recover their just demands may be defeated by the refusal of the duly constituted officials to perform their duty. This precise question seems never to have been before the appellate courts of this state. It would seem, however, that the law is impotent indeed if it afforded no remedy for redressing such a palpable wrong. At least one California case appears to lay down a rule of law that might well be applied in the present proceeding. In the case of Nevada Nat. Bank v. Board of Supervisors, 5 Cal. App. 638, 91 P. 122, 128, the board of directors of an irrigation district failed to levy taxes for the purpose of paying certain bonds and interest thereon as required by law. Plaintiff, the owner of certain of said bonds, obtained a judgment against the district for the amount of the principal and interest due on said bonds, and thereafter brought an action to compel the levy of an assessment sufficient to pay the same. The district, like the respondents in the instant case, contended that, when the board of directors failed at the time fixed by law to levy the taxes for the payment of said principal and interest, its power became exhausted, and that it was without authority at any time thereafter to levy any tax for said purpose. This contention was not sustained by the trial court, but judgment was given in plaintiff's favor. On appeal, the court, in sustaining the judgment, said: "We are not inclined to consider the law so impotent as is implied by appellants' argument. We hold that the burdens of the property owners have not been increased since they incurred the obligation to pay these bonds. The statute, in our opinion, does not expressly nor by implication prohibit the method adopted herein for the collection of the money due."

So in the present case, the burden on the property owners is not increased by compelling them to pay this year what they by rights should have paid last year. Furthermore, there is nothing in statutes governing the levy of the tax in question which expressly or by implication prohibits a levy of the tax during the present year after the failure of the board of supervisors to perform their duty in that respect at the time fixed for the levy of last year.

In other jurisdictions there is to be found ample authority in support of petitioners' contention in behalf of the legality of the relevy. The case most directly in point is one from the Supreme Court of Iowa, Perrin et al. v. Benson, 49 Iowa, 325. In that case it was said: "As we understand, the question for determination is, where the authority of the board of supervisors is full and complete, and it is their duty to levy school-house taxes at the proper time in 1875, and they neglect to do so, whether they have the power to make such levy in 1876, at the time provided by law for levying taxes." In that case the board levied the taxes in 1876, and the action was brought to enjoin its collection. The court further held: "As it was the duty of the board of supervisors to make the levy, mandamus would lie to compel the performance of such duty. Suppose this course to have been taken, a disposition of such action in all probability could not have been obtained during 1875. If not the compulsory levy could not have been made earlier than 1876." Some discussion was had as to whether the tax could be levied after the year 1876, and, if not levied in 1876, whether the right to compel the levy might not have been thereby waived. Following this discussion, the court used this direct and significant language: "We do not determine at what time the tax will be deemed waived because of a failure to make a levy at the time provided by law. What we do hold is, that where a levy is not made at the proper time, through negligence or mistake, it may be made at the time fixed by law for making the succeeding tax levy."

A similar ruling was made by the Court of Appeals of Kentucky in the case of Morton v. City of Fullerton, 229 Ky. 76, 16 S.W.(2d) 797, 798. The facts in that case show that the city council attempted to levy a tax in 1927. It was not recorded as required by law, and it was held to be void. In 1928 the city council at the time of levying the 1928 taxes attempted to cure the defect in the 1927 levy, and relevy the 1927 taxes. In upholding this levy, the court said: "If the council has, by inadvertence or neglect, failed to perform a duty imposed upon it by law at the proper time, it may yet perform it. The city government has been established for the reason that it was deemed necessary for the peace and good order of the community, and a mere mistake of the council will not be allowed to destroy the government, or cripple its efficiency. Where the council has failed to make a proper levy it may subsequently do so."

The case of Hubert v. New Orleans, 215 U. S. 170, 30 S. Ct. 40, 43, 54 L. Ed. 144, is also in point. In this case it appears that a tax levy was required to meet the obligations of the city of New Orleans to pay certain sums authorized to be raised by taxation for the support of the metropolitan police. The tax had been levied and collected. It was not, however, paid over, but was diverted to other purposes. The court held that the board did not exhaust its power until the obligation fixed by the statute had been actually satisfied, and that, if there had been a diversion of the money raised by a levy in one year, this did not prohibit a levy in a subsequent year to take care of the obligation which should have been paid by a tax levy of the preceding year. The court there stated: "The city exerted its power, as required by law, levied and collected the taxes, but applied them to other purposes, and has failed to turn them over upon demand. We think the power to levy these taxes still exists. As to the creditor, deprived thereof by the action of the city, it is as though such power had never been exercised." That is a much stronger case than the case at bar. There the board had acted and levied the tax as required by law, but failed to legally apply the proceeds. Here the board of supervisors has failed to act at all in so far as the territory within the present Los Angeles city junior college district is concerned. If the power still existed to levy the tax after one had been levied, but the proceeds thereof diverted to other purposes than those required by the statute, we think that the same rule would apply, but with greater force, where, as here, the board charged with the duty of levying the tax failed at the appointed time to act as the law directed it should. Under such circumstances we think it clear from the case just discussed and others cited herein that the board of supervisors of the county of Los Angeles did not exhaust its power to levy a tax to meet the obligations due the plaintiffs and that the power continues to exist until said obligations have been fully paid and satisfied. As the time has long since passed to make said levy during the year 1931, the board not only has the power, but it is its duty to levy in the present year, 1932, a tax sufficient to meet the balance due on said obligations after the payment thereon of the money raised by the levy of 1931.

[5] The only remaining question for consideration is as to the manner of levying the tax, or as to the precise property on which the levy should be made. This question we think has been simplified by the stipulation of the parties filed herein. According to this stipulation, in 1931 for the purpose of reimbursing the plaintiffs for the cost of educating outside students in said year, a levy of $.026 per $100 of valuation as to real property and $.011 per $100 in valuation as to personal property was levied upon all taxable property situated in the county of Los Angeles, and outside of any junior college district, except the property situated in Los Angeles city high school district, later organized into the Los Angeles city junior college district, and "that if a levy were made for the fiscal year 1932–1933 exclusively on all taxable property situate in said Los Angeles city high school district sufficient to raise enough money to pay the balance claimed by plaintiffs, the owners of said property would not be called upon to pay as high a tax on their property for said purposes as the amount of the tax levied and paid upon all other property in said county not situate in a junior college district during the school year 1930–1931." It will thus be seen that all property situated in the county of Los Angeles (except that formerly within the Los Angeles city high school district), which was liable and subject to a tax to meet the demands of the plaintiffs, has paid its just proportion of said tax, and that by a levy of a tax equal thereto upon the property formerly situated in the Los Angeles city high school district, and now within the Los Angeles city junior college district, a sufficient amount will be raised to pay the balance due plaintiffs with some additional. The only objection that the respondents make to the application of such a levy is that it would create an inequality between the Los Angeles city territory and the balance of the outside territory. But, as long as the tax on the Los Angeles city territory will be less than that paid by the balance of the outside territory, the property owners in the Los Angeles city territory cannot complain. Those in the outside territory, not within the Los Angeles city junior college district, have already paid the tax levied against their property. There is no way of levying this tax suggested by either of the parties to the proceeding, and none occurs to us, which will make it bear absolutely equally upon all the territory subject to the original tax. The fact that the tax rate now required is less than that paid by the balance of the outside territory under the levy of 1931 does not, in our opinion, render the levy illegal or void. It is fair and just and equitable. As stated above, it is the purpose of revenue laws as near as possible to impose upon all property its just proportion of taxation. Chesebrough v. City and County of San Francisco, 153 Cal. 559, 568, 96 P. 288. In imposing a tax to be levied against the property within the Los Angeles city junior college district sufficient to meet the claims of plaintiffs, although absolute equality is not thereby attained, we are as near as possible causing all the property originally liable for the payments of these obligations to bear its just proportion of this burden.

It is therefore ordered that a peremptory writ of mandate issue out of this court directed to the respondents commanding them to allow the sum of $206,596.28 as a proper claim and charge against the junior college tuition fund in favor of the plaintiffs for the amounts expended by them respectively during the school year 1930–31, for educating pupils residing in the county of Los Angeles but not in any junior college district, and further that said board of supervisors levy, assess, and extend at the time of making the tax levy for the year 1932 for county purposes, a special tax, sufficient to raise the sum of $206,596.28, due and owing plaintiffs as aforesaid, upon all nonoperative taxable property situated in the territory formerly comprised within the boundaries of the Los Angeles city high school district, and now constituting the Los Angeles city junior college district.

CURTIS, J.

Plaintiffs, who are husband and wife, are the owners of certain real property situated in the county of Glenn. They acquired the property by deed dated January 23, 1930, and executed by J. R. and Frances R. Covington, which deed contained a recital in the following words: "Subject to a deed of trust dated August 25, 1925, and recorded August 25, 1926, in Book 97 of Trust Deeds at page 313." The consideration paid by them for said real property was their own unsecured note for $500. Plaintiffs instituted this action for the purpose of enjoining the sale of said real property under proceedings brought to foreclose said deed of trust. The regularity of said proceedings is not questioned. No claim is made that the promissory note, mentioned in said deed of trust, or any part thereof, has been paid, nor that it was not long past due at the time of the institution of said foreclosure proceeding. Plaintiffs admit that at the time they acquired said real property they had actual as well as constructive notice of said deed of trust, and of the indebtedness which it was given to secure. The principal ground upon which the plaintiffs relied for relief before the trial court against the defendants, was that while J. R. and Frances Covington executed and delivered said trust deed, they did not execute the promissory note described and mentioned therein. Upon this issue the trial court found that said deed of trust was given to secure a promissory note for the sum of $9,400 and interest, no part of the principal of which had been paid except the sum of $700, and that said note was the property of the defendant the Tuxedo Land Company. The plaintiffs have appealed and they now make the same point here that they made before the trial court.

[1-3] The evidence shows that the land described in the deed of trust was formerly owned by Lulu L. Spencer, who conveyed it to J. R. Covington and Frances R. Covington by deed dated August 25, 1925. The deed of trust involved herein bears the same date. The note for $9,400 was also dated August 25, 1925. The deed of trust was not acknowledged until March 18, 1926. It was recorded August 25, 1926. The evidence further shows that a brother of J. R. Covington, named E. P. Covington, and his wife, Nora Covington, had in the early summer of 1925 a lease and option to purchase said land, and that the two Covington brothers and their wives undertook to buy the land in August of the same year. Whether any deed to the land was made to them at this time does not clearly appear, but it was shown that the two Covingtons and their wives executed a deed of trust covering said land to secure a promissory note for $9,400, which represented either the whole, or practically the whole, of the purchase price that was to be paid for said land. While this deed of trust was executed and acknowledged, it never became effective, was never recorded, and there appears to be some uncertainty as to what finally became of it. After this transaction the Covington brothers remained on the land under a joint claim until some time in January, 1926, when E. P. Covington and his wife left the property. J. R. Covington and his wife remained in possession of the land. On August 25, 1926, a deed to said land from Lulu L. Spencer to J. R. Covington and wife was filed for record in the office of the county recorder of Glenn county in which county said land is situated. This deed was dated and acknowledged on August 25, 1925, exactly one year prior to the date of its recordation. On the same day the deed was recorded there was also filed for record in the office of said county recorder the deed of trust involved in this action. As we have seen it was executed by J. R. Covington and wife and recites that it was given to secure a promissory note for $9,400, executed by J. R. Covington and wife. These facts are undisputed, and the only contention which the appellants make is that, while J. R. Covington and his wife executed and delivered the deed of trust which was recorded on August 25, 1926, they did not execute or deliver the promissory note, which said deed of trust purports to secure. J. R. Covington and his wife testified that they, with E. P. Covington and wife, executed a promissory note for $9,400 on August 25, 1925, and on the same day executed a deed of trust on the land involved herein to secure said promissory note. This was the deed of trust heretofore referred to as never having become effective and which was never recorded. They further testified that in March, 1926, they executed and delivered the deed of trust which is the subject of this action, but they did not at that time nor at any time execute or deliver the promissory note referred to in said trust deed. In other words, their testimony is to the effect that while they executed and delivered a new deed of trust covering said land and purporting to secure a new promissory note, they did not in fact execute or deliver this new or second note. Appellants rest their case upon this testimony of the Covingtons. As against this testimony there were admitted in evidence six letters written by J. R. Covington which were admittedly signed by him and in which he admitted his indebtedness on the note. These letters with the deed of trust which was admittedly signed by J. R. Covington and his wife, Frances R. Covington, were before the trial judge who had an opportunity to, and who undoubtedly did, compare the genuine signatures of the Covingtons as shown by these documents with the signatures appended to the disputed promissory note which was also in evidence. It was for the trial judge to determine, with these writings before him, whether the promissory note which purported to be signed by J. R. and Frances Covington actually bore their genuine signatures. Having determined this issue in favor of the respondents upon the conflicting evidence, it is not for this court to disturb the finding. Besides the evidence which these writings furnished as to the genuine signatures of the Covingtons, the six letters, written over a period beginning July 9, 1927, and ending February 28, 1930, with the possible exception of the last one, contain direct reference not only to the deed of trust, but to the note of the Covingtons. In one of these letters (all of which were written to respondents) J. R. Covington refers to a promise made by him to send "a hundred dollars payment on interest due on my note." In another he asks that "$1300 credit I have on my original note" be considered as "interest to date." In the same letter he writes that, "As soon as I could get the government loan through I could pay the loan from you." Other letters contain equally damaging statements against the claim of Covington that he had not signed the note which the trust deed was given to secure. With such persuasive testimony before the trial court, we are unable to perceive how it could have found otherwise than as it did. There is an utter lack of merit in the contention of the appellants that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding of the trial court that the promissory note, recited in the deed of trust involved herein, was not signed by J. R. Covington and Frances R. Covington.

[4, 5] The other grounds advanced by appellants for the reversal of the judgment are equally untenable. It is claimed that the assignment of the note by the original payee thereof to the Tuxedo Land Company was without consideration, and that the assignment was made without any right or authority. The assignment was in writing and was presumed to be for a valid consideration. There was no evidence introduced which purported to overcome this presumption. Besides this was not a matter which concerned the appellants. While the land was originally owned by Lulu L. Spencer and was conveyed by her to the Covingtons, the note and deed of trust were taken in the name of Edward F. Harris, who was a relative and agent of Lulu L. Spencer. It is contended by appellants that Harris held the note and deed of trust in trust for Lulu L. Spencer and was without authority to assign the same except with her consent. Lulu L. Spencer by permitting the note and deed of trust to be taken in the name of Harris, and thus creating him the ostensible owner of said note and deed of trust, would be thereafter estopped from denying his authority to assign these documents. She is not now complaining, and the appellants are in no position to question the validity of an assignment executed by Harris. Section 869a, Civ. Code.

[6] The assignment of the note and deed of trust by Harris to the respondent Tuxedo Land Company purported to assign not only the promissory note and the deed of trust, but also an interest in the real property covered by the deed of trust. Appellants contend that Harris as beneficiary under the deed of trust held no title to the land described therein, but that said title was in the trustees named in said deed of trust, and therefore said assignment was not effective for any purpose. It is true that Harris, as the beneficiary under said deed of trust, had no title to the land described therein. No assignment or other conveyance by him would pass title to said land. While the assignment given by him to the Tuxedo Land Company was ineffective for the purpose of passing any title to said land, it was valid as an assignment of the promissory note secured by the deed of trust, and the assignment of the note carried with it the security of the deed of trust. Section 2936, Civ. Code. The assignment was drawn and recorded in compliance with section 2934 of the Civil Code, and as a transfer of the note and security was effectual for all purposes.

Lastly the appellants contend that the Tuxedo Land Company had assigned and transferred its interest in the promissory note prior to the institution of the proceeding to foreclose the trust deed and, therefore, that it had no interest in said note which would entitle it to institute said foreclosure proceedings. There was some semblance of evidence that said company had made a transfer of said note prior to the time it began said proceedings of foreclosure; but the whole transaction was fully explained at the trial, and the evidence as a whole fully sustains the finding of the trial court that no such assignment had been made by the Tuxedo Land Company. Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the appellant, the most that can be said is that the evidence as to the assignment is conflicting.

There is practically no legal question presented on this appeal. The whole case involves questions of fact, and whether the evidence is sufficient to support the findings. Upon every point advanced by the appellants the record shows ample evidence to support the findings of the trial court. We have examined the record with care and find nothing therein which furnishes any justification to appellants in taking this appeal. It is entirely barren of merit and frivolous in the extreme. Appeals of this character should be discouraged, both in the interest of litigants directly interested in the particular case, and of those who have meritorious causes awaiting the consideration of the courts. If the court's time is taken up with frivolous appeals, it cannot be given to those possessing merit. The only reasonable conclusion at which the court can arrive in determining an appeal which is so destitute of merit as is the present one, is that it was taken for delay merely, and that in affirming the judgment it should impose damages upon appellants.

The judgment is affirmed, and damages imposed upon the appellants in the sum of $150, on the ground that the appeal is frivolous and was taken for delay.

Evidence held sufficient to support conviction of murder in the first degree.

2. Homicide ⇐169(1).

In prosecution of defendant for murder of his partner, evidence regarding deceased's assignments, deeds, and mortgages, made with intent of hiding his property from his creditors, held properly excluded as irrelevant.

3. Homicide ⇐340(2).

In murder prosecution, instruction not clear as to meaning and inapplicable to case, given inadvertently, held not prejudicial.

Instruction was in substance that, if defendant was engaged in performance of unlawful act, and deceased attempted in lawful manner to prevent performance of such unlawful act, and if, while so endeavoring to prevent it, defendant in anger, and solely for purpose of revenge, or to enable him to carry out unlawful design so interfered with by deceased, attacked deceased with deadly weapon, intending to kill deceased, and carried out intention, fact that defendant was in passion would not mitigate or excuse homicide, but crime committed would be murder in first degree.

SEAWELL, J.

The defendant, Albert Fuller, was convicted in the Superior Court of the county of Madera of first degree murder. The jury did not relieve him of the extreme penalty of the law, and, his punishment being fixed in such cases by the law, the court accordingly sentenced him to suffer the death penalty. The person murdered was J. W. Kipp, commonly known in the section wherein he resided as "Jim" Kipp. The crime was committed October 8, 1931. Kipp's father was of the white blood and his mother was a California Indian. He was forty-eight years of age at the time he met his death by drowning in a mine shaft, and had many years prior thereto suffered the loss of his right leg. By trade he was a shoe repairer. He used a crutch to assist him in locomotion. It seems that the deceased had spent the most, if not his entire life, in the county of Fresno and counties contiguous thereto, and had been somewhat successful in his business, which, primarily, was that of conducting a shoe repairing business. His disappearance, from the locality in which he resided, under unusual circumstances, caused a search to be organized which resulted in the discovery of his body on October 15, 1931, in a mine shaft of the old Wagner mine, which shaft was two hundred feet deep, the lower one hundred feet of which was filled with water. Said mining grounds were located in an isolated mountain district of Madera county. The nearest approach of a traveled way to said abandoned shaft was one and one-half miles distant. The dimensions of the shaft at its mouth were six by seven feet. Five feet below its surface it narrowed to three by four feet, but lower down it widened again. By reason of the uneven and broken surface of the locality the mouth of said shaft was not readily discernible until one approached within twenty feet of the opening. The locality gave evidence of earlier mining activities, and "dumps" from the mine clearly marked the locality as the site of a former mining enterprise.

The defendant, his wife, Marjorie Fuller, and the deceased had been mutually acquainted for a period of some five years. This acquaintance began at Big Creek, Fresno county, where the deceased had conducted a shoe repairing business before he became acquainted with Fuller. Kipp had also known Marjorie Fuller at Big Creek and at the city of Fresno before Fuller had made her acquaintance. It seems that prior to her marriage with Fuller, which took place less than five years before the death of Kipp, she had been employed in restaurant and hotel work at Fresno and outlying villages. The defendant at the time he became acquainted with the deceased, Kipp, was working for the Southern California Edison Power Company. He was so employed for about one year, when, according to his own admission, he had engaged in selling whisky for a period of three years in and about Big Creek. In this he claims Kipp joined him. This relationship, according to defendant's story, continued until he and Kipp bought a general merchandise business at the village of Seville, Tulare county, in October, 1930. Upon the purchase of said business defendant Fuller applied for and was appointed postmaster of the village. Kipp seemed to have been engaged to the time of said purchase in conducting a shoe repairing business and attending to other business affairs. The defendant, his wife, Marjorie, and Kipp, after the purchase of said business, lived at the same house located near the store until July 25, 1931, on which day the wife left Fuller and went to Fresno, which circumstance will be referred to as this opinion progresses. Fuller testified that he and Kipp frequently disagreed as to the management of said merchandise business. Kipp was presumably engaged in the shoe repairing business, and seems to have attended to the financial business of the partners. Fuller was more active in the sales department. Some time after the business was taken over, the exact month does not appear in the record, Fuller and Kipp obtained three policies of fire insurance. Whether said policies were issued through the solicitation of Fuller or Kipp or both does not appear. John C. Herring, the agent of the company which issued the policies, referred to them in the procurement of said insurance merely as Al. Fuller and J. W. Kipp. The policies ran to said partners in the order named. These policies were issued in the following amounts: On stock, $2,000; on shoe equipment, $1,000; on Frigidaire, $500; total, $3,500. On September 19, 1931, said store and its contents, including the shoe repairing department, were destroyed by fire.

The fact that Fuller had allured Kipp to the mine shaft in a lonely district to accomplish the thing which actually happened was, in all probability, divulged by his wife, who was not called as a witness, to the officers of the law. This conclusion is suggested by the fact that Fuller and his wife began to consort together immediately after Kipp disappeared, and he admitted at the trial that he told his wife of the incident which resulted in Kipp losing his life immediately thereafter, and she advised him to keep the matter a secret. Upon being arrested on the third day following the commission of said crime at the home of his friend Eaton by the sheriff of Fresno county, W. H. Collins, in explanation of his arrest he said to Eaton, as he was leaving with the sheriff, "Well, I think I know what it is about, it serves a man right for trusting a woman." There were, however, other circumstances which placed Kipp, when last seen, in company with Fuller, going in the general direction of the shaft from which Kipp's body was recovered four days after Fuller's arrest and seven days after Kipp's death, at a depth of one hundred feet, floating among waterlogged timbers at the water line. The facts briefly stated in this respect are that Kipp and Fuller were seen to leave Seville in Kipp's Victoria Studebaker Six automobile on October 8, 1931, at approximately 10:30 a. m., going westerly. Kipp was driving the car. They reached Raymond between 2:30 and 3 o'clock p. m. and bought three gallons of gasoline. They then entered a restaurant and ice-cream parlor and ordered sandwiches. Fuller called for two glasses, and said to the attendant that he had what he wished to drink with him. He produced a bottle, from his pocket, containing whisky, and several rounds of drinks were had. This he admitted as a witness. He was seen upon his return passing through Raymond and going in the general direction of Fresno at 5 or 5:30 p. m., alone and driving Kipp's Studebaker car. At about 10 o'clock that night he drove into Lounsbury's garage at Merced in Kipp's Studebaker, and left the next morning, October 9th, at 7 o'clock. At 5:30 p. m. of the same day Kipp's car was stored at a Modesto garage and was checked out at 8:30 the next day. On that afternoon, October 9th, the defendant drove into another garage in Merced —Thorington's—at 3:30, in his own car, an Oldsmobile, and left at 9 o'clock that night. On October 10th, at 2 p. m., defendant's Oldsmobile was stored at Modesto and checked out the following morning at 8:30. The garage man in this instance would not undertake to identify the defendant as the man who stored said car for the night. As to said automobiles being cars personally owned or under the control of Kipp and Fuller respectively there is no dispute. Each garage owner kept records of the license numbers and descriptions of said cars as they were shifted from one garage to another. Nor is there any doubt as to the identity of the defendant with the storage of said cars as described by the several garage owners. On October 10th the defendant arrived at the Auditorium garage at Oakland in Kipp's Studebaker car, represented himself as J. W. Kipp, who was the registered owner of the car, made arrangements for the storage of said car for a year at the rate of $4 per month, paid one month's storage in advance in the name of J. W. Kipp and took the name and address of the garage for future reference in case he wished to withdraw said car at the end of the first month. He told the garage owner that he was going north, and departed. The sheriffs and deputy sheriffs and other officers of Fresno, Tulare, and Madera counties gathered such information as justified the filing of a charge of murder against the defendant, and he was placed under arrest by Sheriff Collins on Sunday, October 11, 1931. When interrogated by the officers, he said he was uncertain as to the last time he saw Kipp, but he finally decided that it was October 8th. He and Kipp drove into Fresno from Seville in Kipp's Studebaker, and before reaching Fresno the latter remarked that he had an appointment with a man named Johnson at a designated street corner in Fresno. They parked Kipp's car, and, upon Johnson's arrival in his car, the three entered Kipp's car and proceeded to the place of a bootlegger named Sam, where they had a few drinks, and returned to the place where Johnson had parked his car; whereupon he, Fuller, left the party and went to get his car, which was being repaired by a man named Statham. He placed the time he left Kipp at noon, but later changed the hour to possibly 2 o'clock p. m. In the presence of Sheriff Overholt, Sheriff Hill, Sheriff Rhodes, Sheriff Collins, and Deputy Sheriff Tarr, he also stated that Kipp and the mysterious Johnson left him at Fresno, each in his own car driving toward San Francisco, and he believed that Kipp had gone to San Francisco to enter into a liquor transaction with Johnson. He could not name any one in Fresno who was acquainted with Johnson except himself and Kipp. Later, in accounting for the absence of his friend and former partner, he offered the theory that, inasmuch as a divorce was pending between himself and his wife, and there was some probability that Kipp, by reason of the friendship which existed between them, would be called as a witness on his behalf, and as Kipp did not care to testify in the case, he would be absent for two or three weeks. He said that he and Kipp were friendly. When it was suggested that Kipp might be dead or injured, he made the assuring reply that Kipp would show up in a couple of weeks; he would come back; he would walk right in and everything would be all right. He regarded Kipp's absence, in some strange fashion, as a friendly act on the part of Kipp. As additional reasons supporting his grim optimistic prediction that the man known by him to be dead would soon return, he said he was absent partly on business and partly because he did not want to get mixed up in his divorce action. Upon arriving at Madera in the company of the officers, they were met by two members of the Fresno police department who had in their possession a suitcase which Fuller identified as his property. It contained, among other articles of clothing, a pair of trousers from which were taken four keys which were identified as keys belonging to Kipp. Two of them were keys to his safe deposit boxes. Fuller said that they were keys to his safe deposit boxes, but the bank officials identified said keys by their records as having been issued to and used by Kipp, one of which was issued long before Fuller ever knew Kipp. Fuller never had had access to Kipp's safe deposit boxes, and he never presented himself to the bank as a person who had such a right. Fuller did not attempt to show that he had a safe deposit box at any time. On October 13th Fuller was taken to Modesto and asked to point out the hotel to which he had stated he had gone to meet a woman from Seville on the night of October 10th, and after meeting her had registered under the name "J. E. Spears, San Francisco." Upon arriving at Modesto he refused to talk further, acting upon the advice of counsel, but the officers located the hotel and inspected his registration, which appeared upon the hotel register in the manner above set forth. From the suitcase identified by Fuller as his property there was taken a shirt which he admitted belonged to him. This shirt had been recently washed, but still showed stains upon it. The stains were submitted to a chemist for examination, and were pronounced by him to be stains made by human blood.

The day following the death of Kipp, October 9th, Fuller appeared at the office of John C. Herring, the insurance agent who had issued the policies of insurance against loss by fire upon the stock and fixtures of the store, a Frigidaire, and the shoe repairing equipment, property of the partnership, amounting to $3500, with a man whom he introduced as Mr. Johnson. Fuller presented a purported executed assignment by Kipp of all his interest in the moneys due or collectible upon said policies, to Fuller. Johnson made an affidavit in which he averred that he witnessed the signature of Kipp to said purported assignment of his interest in said policies to Fuller. The assignment was acknowledged by Herring, who was also a notary, and delivered to Fuller. The assignment was not produced at the trial or accounted for by Fuller, notwithstanding his attempted explanation from the witness stand that about a week before the death of Kipp, the latter had spoken to him (Fuller) about assigning his claim to the insurance money for the purpose of hiding his assets from his creditors. Johnson was not produced at the trial nor was any evidence given which had a tendency to establish his identity in the smallest degree. A demand to produce the alleged assignment for inspection was not complied with.

The foregoing is a fair statement of Fuller's attempts to account for the absence of his partner and explain his connection with him on the day when Kipp was last seen alive. The record contains other incriminatory acts which we shall not pause to narrate. All that has been related to the present time occurred or was discovered prior to the day on which it became known that Kipp's body was in the mine shaft, to wit, October 15th, seven days after it had been cast into the shaft.

An inspection of the rocks and soil immediately in the proximity of the mouth of the shaft revealed splashes of dry blood upon rocks and upon weeds and grasses. A chemical analysis of these blood spots showed that they were human blood spots. The body, when drawn to the surface, showed a laceration over each ear about an inch long and a laceration about three inches in length above the center of the forehead extending to the skull. About an inch above the outer corner of the left eye there was a puncture wound, described by the autopsy physician as being about the size of a person's little finger and a little bit jagged on the edges. The instrument which produced this wound entered to a depth of approximately three inches and ended at the cavity of the right jawbone. The doctor did not think any of the wounds would produce immediate death. The lungs were filled with water, which would indicate that death was immediately caused by drowning. The walls of the shaft were not exactly perpendicular, and a body dropped from the opening would likely touch the sides in its descent. Ledges of rock in certain places projected from the walls to the extent of a foot and a half. The body had other less important bruises upon it in addition to those specifically described. It seems to have been the theory of the prosecution that the deceased was struck with a miner's pick or some other sharp pointed instrument which rendered him unconscious and his body was then cast into the shaft. Fuller owned a half interest in a mining claim which he had worked, in close proximity to the old Wagner mining shaft in which Kipp's body was discovered. He had been at his mining claim many times, but denied that he had ever before seen or known of the old abandoned Wagner mining grounds. Slight reference was made to spikes, which were not described, in one corner of the shaft to which some apparatus was attached. This subject was not specially stressed in the evidence.

The defendant took the witness chair in his own behalf. After having heard the case made against him at the trial and recognizing that his first plan of defense had absolutely broken down with the discovery of Kipp's body, he boldly branded all that he had told the officers with respect to Kipp's movements and alleged plans, in the hope of discouraging further investigation, as "lies." He said there was no truth in what he had said.

His testimony in attempting to establish his second plan of defense is so fraught with inconsistencies and contradictions by other evidence, and is so definitely overthrown by the facts and by reason, as to render it of no greater strength than was his original abandoned plan of defense.

His account of the manner in which Kipp lost his life, putting out of consideration his cunningly planned attempt to possess himself of Kipp's property, is so far out of joint with all reasonable probabilities as to bring it into the realm of absurdities. Conflicting statements run through his professions of friendship for Kipp. At the particular time when he sought to make it appear that Kipp had stolen his wife's affections and that whatever happened to Kipp was a casualty brought about by his resisting a deadly assault made by Kipp with the intent of killing him in order that Kipp might possess himself of Fuller's wife, he was engaged in procuring a divorce from her and she had cross-complained against him. A divorce seemed reasonably certain. He stated that the trip was proposed by Kipp, who told him that he had a load of whisky cached in the mountains, and he went to assist in loading it into the automobile. He stated that Kipp had taken a number of drinks from his bottle, and insisted on more, and he said to him that he did not want to get too drunk, and he thought he had enough. Kipp replied that he could drink Fuller drunk any time, and Fuller acceded to the statement. Upon arriving at the locality where the liquor was supposed to be hidden, Fuller said, "Well, let's go and get it and get back home, go back to Fresno," and Kipp said "Why is it you want to go back to Fresno; I suppose you want to go back to see Marjorie?" "And I says, 'Jim, you are getting pretty drunk,' and I says, 'You have had enough to say about Marjorie now,' and I says, 'What her and I does is none of your business; you have nothing to do with it, now, and let's quit talking about it and get this whiskey and go to Fresno. * * *' He says, 'We will go down this trail and get it,' and we got out of the car and crossed a barbed wire fence and we started down this trail and walked something like twenty steps and Jim turned around all at once and says, 'You dirty son-of-a-bitch, I will see that you do not get back to Fresno to see Marjorie,' and he had a gun in his hand, and I struck that gun with this left hand and hit him right in the nose with the right hand, and the blood flew out of his nose and the gun fell to the ground and I started to reach down to pick the gun up, and as I did Jim sprang back with his crutch [illustrating] and he got overbalanced and fell right into the hole, and that is the way this Jim Kipp went into the mine shaft."

He said that he did not hear anything of Kipp after he went into the shaft. He claimed that he called three or four times, but heard no sound, and after five minutes he picked up the gun, went back to the car and drove into Fresno. On the way back he thought he would notify the sheriff at Madera, but changed his mind and went to Fresno and called Marjorie over the phone, and she met him and he told her what had happened. He informed her he was going to tell the sheriff of Fresno county, but she said to him he would have to explain why he went to the mine, and she advised him not to tell it. He offered as another reason for keeping the matter secret that he did not want to disgrace his wife's name by making public what had taken place between Jim and his wife, and they agreed to say nothing about the matter. At this very moment there was on file in the county clerk's office of Fresno county a complaint verified by Fuller, asking for a divorce from his wife in which he charged that "the defendant has, without reason or cause, on various occasions, left the home of plaintiff and defendant, and has made extended visits in Fresno and other places, where she stayed at hotels in a drunken condition, and consorted with various men, some known to plaintiff and some unknown to plaintiff, and has appeared with such various men in public places, at late hours at night, in a drunken condition."

Kipp's hat and crutch were both in the shaft with the body. Upon his person was found a bill of sale and other papers of business import. His watch was found in his trouser pocket. His key ring containing four keys, two of which unlocked his safe deposit boxes, were afterwards found in the possession of Fuller.

The defendant offered in evidence a letter produced by him which he claimed was in his wife's handwriting. The letter was addressed to Kipp at Visalia, and was dated Fresno, July 27, 1931. Fuller's wife left him July 25th, and was driven from her home at Seville to the Rolland Hotel at Fresno by Kipp on that day. It would be strange indeed if Fuller did not, as he claims, know that his wife was to leave him at the time in question. Seville is a village of some seventeen or eighteen houses. The home of Fuller and Kipp was about one hundred yards from their store. Fuller was at the store at the time his wife took her departure in daylight. An employee of the partnership drove the company's truck in which the wife's trunk was carried to Visalia. Fuller's effort at the trial was to make it appear that Kipp was on affectionate terms with his wife, and therefore it was not improbable that he would have made the deadly assault upon him in the manner related by Fuller at the trial. Fuller's explanation as to how his wife's letter to Kipp came into his possession was, first, that he found it, and on cross-examination he said that he took it out of Kipp's coat pocket. He claimed that he charged Kipp with receiving said letter, but Kipp denied it, and he read the letter to Kipp, and the latter replied that he thought "maybe Marjorie was drunked up when she wrote it." Said letter began, "Dearest Friend Jim," and related what the lawyer she had engaged in her suit for divorce had told her. She requested that he loan her $20 or $25 to pay the costs, and said, "I will sure pay you back some how, some way when I possibly can. I told Thusen [her attorney] that you would be in Wednesday night, and I would try and have the money then * * * So dearest if you will please let me have it Wednesday night when you come in. I will sure pay you back some way or some how. And you never will be sorry. * * * I am so lonesome and I am afraid to go out much if he is coming to town today or tomorrow. * * * I have no one to talk to and nothing to look forward to only you dear. How true it is what people say. That I depend on you. I guess I do all right honey. Don't you think so. But you sort of like me to dont you, dear? * * * But I am so lonesome I just wanted to talk to you and this is the only way I can is on paper. Dearest I will look for you between 10 & 10:30 Wednesday night. So by by dearest until then. * * * You can tell me all about Al. when I see you so wont ask about him now." The letter closed with the request that he bring her sewing basket, needles, and other domestic articles. No written communication of any kind addressed by Kipp to Fuller's wife was produced. Nor was there any evidence produced aside from Fuller's testimony which indicated that Kipp was unduly familiar with his wife. Fuller makes no direct charges that Kipp was intimate with his wife. He cites circumstances which, unexplained, might afford ground for suspicion. In his divorce action he made general sweeping accusations, but named no persons specifically.

His friendship for Kipp, according to his professions, never faltered, notwithstanding the above letter which he claims to have intercepted. His profession of friendship for Kipp is somewhat shattered by the testimony of Mrs. E. L. Frieman, proprietress of the Rolland Hotel, the place at which Mrs. Fuller stopped after she left the defendant and which place was frequented by Fuller. Her testimony in this respect was that, after Mrs. Fuller had left her husband, Fuller related to her circumstances from which meretricious conduct might be inferred, and Mrs. Frieman said to him, "Why don't one of you buy the other out if you can't get along," and Fuller said, "I think I will buy his interest, and when I buy him out I will have a couple of my gang to take it away from him when I pay it to him." Later he said that, when Kipp came home late on a particular night, they sat down at the table to have a bite to eat, and he (Fuller) laid Kipp's gun and his gun on the table and said, "Now you tell me whether you have been helping Marjorie or not, and giving her anything, and we will fight it out," but Jim would not fight. Whether Fuller in good faith had substantial reason to mistrust Kipp, whose reputation was not impeached in any respect on any element involved in the case, of misconduct with his wife whom he had known for many years, was a question which the court permitted to go to the jury to play whatever part it might in the determination of the guilt and punishment of the defendant. Of course such misconduct, if shown to exist, could not justify the defendant in taking life. The jury evidently was not impressed with the stories told by the defendant, and indeed they were most incredible, and, when subjected to the test of scrutiny, their transparency becomes apparent. In order to build up a ground of justifiable assault upon Kipp, occurring upon the brink of said shaft, the defendant would make it appear that Kipp's eagerness to possess Fuller's wife, whom he was trying to put away himself and who in turn was trying to get rid of him, furnished a motive for Kipp's conduct as described by Fuller. The jury impliedly found that it was not Kipp's love for Fuller's wife that was the immediate cause of his death, but rather Fuller's desire to enjoy Kipp's property as shown by the case presented.

[1] A number of assignments of error are made both as to the court's ruling on questions of evidence and also as to certain instructions given and refused. Appellant suggests that the record is technically sufficient to sustain the judgment, but that a close case is presented, and for that reason a careful inspection should be made of the evidence and instructions to the end that the defendant should be relieved of the extreme penalty should there be discovered any technical violation of his rights. We have read the entire record, and find that the evidence most conclusively establishes the guilt of the defendant. The main incriminatory circumstances have not been weakened in the slightest degree by contradictory evidence. In fact, the defense produced no evidence of a credible character which tended to disprove defendant's guilt or rebut the case made against him.

[2] Defendant attempted to introduce in evidence certain assignments of property made by Kipp to certain persons other than the defendant, in the early part of 1929. These were excluded. The defendant also offered in evidence an assignment of certain property made by Kipp to the defendant, which was received. The offers of the excluded assignments were made, so it was claimed, for the purpose of showing that decedent made said assignments to one Smith with the intent of hiding his property from his creditors. This transaction and others of a similar import had no materiality whatsoever to the issues involved. What we have said has reference also to all the deeds and mortgages which defendant offered to put in evidence. Such evidence was unquestionably irrelevant and immaterial. In fact, the court made no errors in its ruling upon the admissibility of evidence.

[3] The jury was fully and correctly instructed on questions of law pertinent to the case. The long approved and now codified instruction (section 1096, Pen. Code) defining reasonable doubt was given, and the importance of requiring the evidence to satisfy the minds of the jurors on every material fact or issue beyond a reasonable doubt was repeatedly called to the jury's attention.

One instruction given by the court has puzzled us both as to meaning and its applicability to the case. Said instruction reads: "If the accused was engaged in the performance of an unlawful act, and if the deceased attempted in a lawful manner to prevent the performance of such unlawful act, and if, while so endeavoring to prevent the same, the defendant in anger and solely for the purpose of revenge, or to enable him to carry out his unlawful design, so interfered with by said deceased, attacked the latter with a deadly weapon, intending to kill said deceased, and did, under such circumstances, carry such intention into execution, the fact that the defendant was in a passion would not mitigate or excuse such homicide, but the crime committed would in such case be murder in the first degree."

As to just what the thought might have been that prompted this instruction or in what way it may have been regarded as of assistance to the jury in their deliberations, we are wholly unable to make satisfactory answer. It must have been inadvertently given. We have, however, given consideration to the effect that it may have had upon the jury's verdict and have concluded that it could have had none.

No errors appearing in the record which tended to deprive the defendant of a fair and impartial trial, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

MAGGIO BROS. CO., Inc., v. WOOD.

L. A. 12952.

Supreme Court of California.

Aug. 29, 1932.

1. Sales ⇨479(7).

Seller in claim and delivery action, alleging that buyer purchasing truck and agreeing to pay therefor by hauling for seller, refused to continue hauling, must show buyer broke hauling contract in order to recover.

2. Sales ⇨479(7).

Evidence in claim and delivery action did not sustain finding that buyer refused to do agreed hauling for seller in payment for truck purchased.

Under purchase contract, buyer could make all payments on truck out of work and hauling to be done for seller, and could also do hauling for other persons, and facts disclosed that the hauling the seller permitted buyer to do for it was irregular and not of any particular amount, and that at no time did buyer refuse to do any hauling requested by the seller.

3. Sales ⊂=476.

Purchase contract requiring truck buyer to hold himself open to undertake hauling for seller did not require buyer to remain at seller's place of business, but permitted buyer to haul for others, unless his services were required by seller.

PER CURIAM.

The petition for hearing in this matter was granted in order that this court might amend the judgment entered by the District Court of Appeal of the Fourth Appellate District; otherwise the opinion written by Mr. Presiding Justice Barnard and concurred in by Associate Justice Jennings and Associate Justice Scovel, sitting pro tempore, is adopted.

[1] This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff in an action in claim and delivery for the return of a truck. The truck in question was sold by the respondent to the appellant under a contract which provides that it shall be paid for "in monthly payments," although the contract neither provides for any particular amount per month, nor, in view of its other terms, for any regularity in making the payments. The contract provides that the buyer shall have the right to make any and all payments upon the truck "out of work and hauling to be done by second party with said truck for the first party." The contract also provides: "And it is the intention of the two parties that the first party shall employ the second party, from time to time hereafter, as a truck driver to make certain trips with said truck about the State of California in hauling fruit and produce for the first party. That the second party shall, from the proceeds accruing to him from such trips, be enabled to make monthly payments on the said purchase price of said truck, to first party, until said truck of $3,200.00 has been fully paid; and that during the time from this date until said full purchase price has been fully paid, the second party shall hold himself open at all time to undertake such work with said truck, for the first party." Another contract was entered into at the same time between the parties providing that the appellant shall do "certain hauling" for the respondent for a period of two years, but failing utterly to make any provision as to what hauling, the amount thereof, when it is to be done, or that it shall be done with any regularity. While this contract fixes the price to be allowed for trips to various sections of the state, nothing is mentioned as to how many trips shall be made or when. These contracts did not even provide that the respondent should give all of its hauling to the appellant, and it fully appears from the evidence that a large part of its hauling was given by respondent to other persons, when cheaper rates could thereby be obtained. The vagueness of these contracts is only exceeded by the indefiniteness of the complaint filed. While the action purports to be in claim and delivery, the complaint neither alleges title in the plaintiff, right of possession in it, nor that demand has been made and possession refused. The prayer does ask for possession of the truck. However, the essence of the complaint seems to be that the respondent sold the truck to the appellant, to be paid for by hauling done therewith by the appellant for the respondent, and that the appellant had broken the contract by refusing to do any more hauling for the respondent. If any cause of action is set up by the complaint, proof that the appellant has broken the contract in this particular respect is essential to a recovery by the respondent. The court found that the appellant complied with all of the terms of the contracts up to March 7, 1930, and that he then failed and refused to do any more hauling for the respondent, and took the truck to "parts unknown" and absconded therewith.

[2] The only point presented which need be considered is that the evidence does not support this finding, which contention we think must be sustained. It appears that the appellant lived at Puente while the respondent had its principal place of business at El Centro. While the appellant did not haul for the respondent continuously, and while much of respondent's hauling was given to other parties, no difficulties arose until in March, 1930. It is conceded by the respondent that the appellant was given specific permission to use the truck in hauling for other people during the months of January and February, 1930. The court correctly found that the appellant fully lived up to the terms of the contracts until March 7, 1930. However, it appears that in September, 1929, the respondent signed and delivered to the appellant the pink registration certificate applying to this truck, and the appellant reregistered the truck in his own name, both as legal and registered owner. The respondent contends that this was done only for the purpose of enabling the appellant to take out insurance on the truck. In any event, the matter was not seriously questioned until March 6, 1930, when the president of the respondent company told the appellant to bring back the pink slip. While the respondent contends the appellant agreed to bring this back on March 10th, the appellant testified that he said he would bring it back either on that day or as soon thereafter as he came to El Centro. While the appellant had previously complained to the respondent of the fact that the respondent was giving its hauling work to others at a lower price instead of calling upon the appellant under these contracts, it is fully apparent that this action arose out of a dispute over the return of this pink slip. The appellant did not return the pink slip on March 10th, as on that day he was using the truck to haul a load of hay to Ontario. On that day respondent's president and manager called the sheriff's office, and also ordered all his employees to watch for the truck. On the same day, one of respondent's agents saw the appellant with the truckload of hay in Brawley, whereupon he tried to induce an officer to take possession of the truck, asked appellant to immediately return the truck to El Centro, told appellant that he had no interest therein, and threatened him with arrest. Appellant replied that he had to deliver the load of hay, but would return with the truck to El Centro the next day. Before he could return, he was arrested and this action was started.

The respondent does not call our attention to a word of evidence and we have been unable to find any evidence in the record that even tends to support the finding of the court that the appellant failed and refused to do any hauling for the respondent, or that the respondent ever at any time requested the appellant to do any hauling which was not done. The court found that the appellant had fully complied with the contract up to March 7th. Respondent's president and manager testified that he had no conversation with appellant in the month of March, 1930, concerning hauling. The evidence as to a conversation between the president of the respondent company and the appellant on March 6th shows that it related entirely to the return of the pink slip by the appellant. The evidence as to the conversation between respondent's agent and the appellant on March 10th related to this pink slip, the ownership of the truck, and the demand for its possession and the claim that the appellant had no further interest therein. There is not a word of evidence that on either occasion the appellant was asked to do any hauling or that he refused any such request.

[3] Apparently respondent relies upon the contention that the clause in the contract to the effect that the appellant "shall hold himself open at all time to undertake such work" required the appellant to be at respondent's place of business at all times with the truck; that respondent's permission to use the truck in hauling for others was limited to two months, which had expired; and that appellant breached the contract when he failed to come to respondent's office in El Centro on March 10th. No such an interpretation of the contracts is tenable. Under the terms of the contracts, the appellant had the absolute right to haul for other parties at any time he chose, unless his services were required by the respondent, and any special permission to so haul was both unnecessary and immaterial. The respondent did not agree to give him any particular amount of hauling or with any regularity. The parties lived at different places, and, under the vague and loose provisions of the contract, the clause as to holding himself in readiness must be given a reasonable interpretation in the light of its other provisions. It was not incumbent upon the appellant to sit in respondent's office waiting until they should need him and he was entitled to be notified when his services were required. The provision that he should hold himself in readiness, the absence of a provision that he should report regularly for duty, the fact that he lived in a city many miles away, the indefiniteness as to when his services would be required, and the fact that the other party to the contract was left free to give him much or little of its hauling, all import the necessity for a reasonable notice to appellant when his services with the truck were required. This is especially true, in view of the additional evidence that he had been particularly told that work was slack with the respondent, and that he might obtain work elsewhere during the next "couple of months." Both the terms of the contract and the nature of this consent demanded a reasonable notification when his services were required before he could be put in default and his interest in the truck taken from him. Even if he had been notified at the conversation on March 10th that his services were then required, under the circumstances, it would have been a sufficient compliance with the contracts for the appellant to have delivered the load he then had upon the truck and reported to the respondent for work the next day. However, no such notice was given him, and the action was started at a time when all of the evidence in the record shows he was not in default.

All of the evidence being contrary to this particular finding, and there being no other findings to support the judgment, the judgment is reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Cruz County; H. C. Lucas, Judge.

Action by John Holzer against E. C. Read, John MacKenzie, and others, in which defendants last named and others filed a cross-complaint. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants last named and others appeal.

Affirmed.

Frank Thunen, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Wyckoff & Gardner, of Watsonville, Hubert C. Wyckoff, Jr., of San Francisco, Wyckoff, Gardner & Parker, of Watsonville, and George M. Naus, of San Francisco, for respondent.

TYLER, Justice pro tem.

Action to quiet title to certain lands situated in the county of Santa Cruz. The land described in the complaint consists of about fifty acres. Some seventeen persons were made defendants, all of whom defaulted except John F. MacKenzie, Maria MacKenzie, Peter Colly, and Mary Ann Colly. These defendants denied title in plaintiff to a certain portion of the lands, and by way of cross-complaint alleged title to such portions in themselves by adverse possession. The trial court found all the allegations of the complaint to be true and all of the allegations of the cross-complaint of defendants to be untrue. Judgment was accordingly rendered in favor of plaintiff and against defendants, who have appealed from the judgment.

The MacKenzies claimed an irregular-shaped parcel containing approximately one acre of land, which overlaps the fifty-acre tract claimed by plaintiff. The Collys' claim involves the westerly line of plaintiff's tract and a portion of the southerly line forming common boundaries between their respective lands. The main controversy is based upon the location of the proper boundary line of what is known as Rancho San Augustin. Plaintiff, in support of his claim of title, introduced testimony by three surveyors to establish the true boundary line. These witnesses located the original monuments and made surveys, and, with the aid of government notes, established a retracement of the original survey which fully supported plaintiff's claim to all of the lands. In further support thereof, plaintiff then establishd a connected chain of title as to the entire tract described in the complaint, beginning with a patent from the federal government dated May 20, 1870, and extending down by regular muniments of title to one Clementina M. Howe in the year 1885. Appellants concede that down to this point respondent's chain of title is regular. A deed was then introduced in evidence dated December 4, 1885, running from Clementina M. Howe, James H. Howe, and J. J. Johnson to Joseph Orr, but this deed does not embrace the lands in dispute. Another deed dated the 29th day of July, 1886, executed by Clementina M. Howe to John Kiley was in evidence. This last deed embraces the lands in question. There was then introduced a deed executed by John Kiley dated the 13th day of September, 1886, to Helena Jane Orr.

Plaintiff herein claims title under a warranty deed dated May 3, 1916. This document was in evidence, and it includes the land described in the complaint. It is signed by Mrs. E. C. Read, A. F. Orr, and G. J. Orr, and recites that the property described therein was duly awarded the grantors under a decree of distribution on the 25th day of April, 1916, in the matter of the estate of Joseph Orr, deceased. At the time of the trial, the then attorney for appellants conceded that plaintiff had established a prima facie case under this deed. It is now claimed, for the first time on appeal, that respondent's paper chain of title lacked one link, as nowhere in the record does it appear that any conveyance or transfer of title was ever made from Helena Jane Orr to Joseph Orr, for which reason, irrespective of the true location of the disputed boundary line, respondent failed utterly to prove his title. Had counsel for appellants not made the concession he did, respondent might have been able to supply evidence to complete his paper title. Aside from the right of appellants to raise this question for the first time on appeal, the record does not support their contention of lack of proof of title in respondent.

[1] Plaintiff did not rely alone on a connected paper chain of title, he having alleged that by himself and his predecessors in interest he became and was for twenty years prior to the commencement of the action the owner of the lands in dispute and in the possession thereof. During the course of the trial, a neighbor who had lived on adjacent land for a period of twenty-four years volunteered the statement during the course of his examination, without objection, that the property in question had belonged to Joseph Orr during his lifetime. While this evidence might have been stricken out and plaintiff thereby put to better proof, it was relevant to the issue of ownership, and tended to prove such issue.

[2-4] The general rules as to the weight and sufficiency of the evidence in all forms and character of actions are applicable in determining the sufficiency of the evidence in proceedings to quiet title. Where a witness goes beyond the scope of the questions and makes an answer not responsive thereto, if it furnishes relevant facts, they are none the less admissible merely because they are not specifically asked for. 2 Wigmore on Evidence (2d Ed.) § 785. If the answer is in itself proper evidence, the party who is examining the witness has the right to take and retain it if he chooses to do so. Hirshfeld v. Dana, 193 Cal. 143, 148, 223 P. 451, and cases cited. While opposing counsel may move to strike it out if for any reason it is improper to be admitted, so long as it stands it is competent evidence to be considered. Where, as here, the insufficiency of the evidence is the question to be determined, full weight must be given to evidence which would have been excluded had objection been made, and even to evidence erroneously admitted against objection provided it be relevant. Evidence may tend to prove the issues and yet be incompetent. Hayne on New Trial and Appeal, § 98.

In Goode v. Smith, 13 Cal. 81, one of the questions involved was as to the ownership of land. A witness had been permitted to testify upon the subject. In discussing this evidence, the court held that, while it was not the best mode of proving the fact, nevertheless no objection having been taken to its admissibility, it was proper for the purpose. See, also, Janson v. Brooks, 29 Cal. 214; Wright v. Roseberry, 81 Cal. 87, 91, 22 P. 336.

[5, 6] We are of the opinion, therefore, that plaintiff, notwithstanding the break in his paper chain of record title, sufficiently proved his title by tracing back a chain descending in Joseph Orr and thence from his estate. We are of the further opinion that plaintiff's title as proved was in no manner affected or impaired by appellants' claim of title by adverse possession. This controversy arose over a mistaken boundary line wrongfully established by a surveyor employed by defendants. No one is here disputing plaintiff's title to the major portion of his lands. By the great weight of authority, where the occupation of land is by a mere mistake, and with no intention on the part of the occupant to claim as his own, land which does not belong to him, but with the intention to claim only to the true line wherever it may be, the holding is not adverse. 2 Cor. Jur. p. 139, § 242.

[7] The same may be said with reference to the payment of taxes. Here there was no established boundary line by the parties, and each paid his taxes upon lands described in his deeds. Under such circumstances the question of the payment of taxes is not an element in the case. 1 Cal. Jur. p. 568, § 50; Reynolds v. Williard, 80 Cal. 605, 22 P. 262; McDonald v. Drew, 97 Cal. 266, 32 P. 173; Wilder v. Nicolaus, 50 Cal. App. 776, 195 P. 1068.

[8-10] The further contention that appellant MacKenzie is entitled to the land he claims by virtue of an estoppel in pais is also without merit. In this connection it appears from the record that MacKenzie constructed valuable improvements on the portion of the lands claimed by him, and that such improvements were made in good faith. Upon this subject there was evidence to show that plaintiff aided MacKenzie in the construction of the improvements and was paid for his services. But the evidence also shows that plaintiff was misled concerning the true boundary line through the mistake of defendants' surveyor, and he performed his services through an honest mistake concerning the true line. There must be some degree of turpitude in the conduct of a party before a court of equity will estop him from the assertion of his title. Here there was none, and the invoked doctrine does not apply. Biddle Boggs v. Merced Mining Co., 14 Cal. 279, 368; Stockman v. Riverside L. & I. Co., 64 Cal. 57, 28 P. 116. Moreover, defendants failed to plead an estoppel. The rule is well established in this state that an estoppel, to be available, must be specially pleaded. Promis v. Duke, 208 Cal. 420, 426, 281 P. 613.

The judgment is affirmed.

HARTFORD ACCIDENT & INDEMNITY CO. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al.

S. F. 14572.

Supreme Court of California.

July 20, 1932.

1. Master and servant ⇐383.

Provision for giving of bond by employer on securing certificate of consent to self-insure against compensation claims, held within power of Legislature (Const. art. 20, § 21; St. 1917, p. 857, § 29, subd. a, par. 2, as amended by St. 1925, p. 494).

2. Master and servant ⇐397.

Industrial Accident Commission had jurisdiction to render award against surety on self-insurer's bond, in proceeding instituted by employees for compensation (St. 1917, p. 868, § 55; p. 857, § 29, subd. a, par. 2, as amended by St. 1925, p. 494).

3. Master and servant ⇐397.

Industrial Accident Commission having jurisdiction over subject-matter can determine every issue raised.

4. Master and servant ⇐417(8).

Failure to make commutation of compensation awards in ordering payment thereof by surety on self-insurer's bond, held not prejudicial, where amount actually due exceeded amount of bond (St. 1917, p. 856, § 28, subd. d).

5. Master and servant ⇐416.

Order directing payments by surety on self-insurer's bond in pro rata proportion to compensation claimants held not objectionable (St. 1917, p. 868, § 55; p. 857, § 29, subd. a, par. 2, as amended by St. 1925, p. 494).

It was not likely that the distribution provided would subject surety to additional liability beyond penal sum of bond, since the claimants were bound by the awards and were required to give surety full release of all claims, and since provision was made in the awards for protection and payment of claims filed pending distribution moreover the order contained requirement for retaining portion of funds and surety's payment of full amount of bonds in state compensation insurance fund, to be disbursed under direction of Industrial Accident Commission, would bar further claims against surety.

6. Master and servant ⇐417(9).

Award to compensation claimants against surety on self-insurer's bond for full penal sum thereof should be annulled as to portion granting attorney's fees in addition, though bond provided for surety's liability for attorney's fees (St. 1917, p. 868, § 55; p. 857, § 29, subd. a, par. 2, as amended by St. 1925, p. 494).

The bond contained a provision that the surety was bound for payment of reasonable attorney's fees incurred in proceedings to enforce payment of the bond, but further provided that in no event should total liability of surety exceed penal amount of bond.

Original proceeding by the Hartford Accident & Indemnity Company for writ of certiorari to be directed to the Industrial Accident Commission, and others, to review an order directing petitioner to pay compensation awards under self-insurer's bond, and to pay attorney's fees.

Award of Industrial Accident Commission affirmed in part and annulled in part.

CURTIS, J.

The Pickering Lumber Company, at all the times herein mentioned, was a corporation organized under the laws of the state of Delaware, and duly authorized to transact business in this state, and during the same time the petitioner herein, the Hartford Accident & Indemnity Company, was a corporation organized under the laws of the state of Connecticut, duly authorized to become sole surety on bonds and undertakings in this state. On the 14th day of May, 1926, said Pickering Lumber Company, pursuant to section 29, subd. (a), par. 2 of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act of 1917 (as amended by St. 1925, p. 494), as an employer under said Compensation Act, secured the payment of compensation to its injured employees and to the dependents of its killed employees by securing from the Industrial Accident Commission a certificate of consent to self-insure, said certificate being issued on May 14, 1926, and the same remained in force and effect continuously from said last-named day to and including the 17th day of July, 1931, at which date it was revoked. As a prerequisite to the issuance to said Pickering Lumber Company of said certificate to self-insure, the Industrial Accident Commission pursuant to the power given it by said section 29, subd. (a), par. 2 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, required said Pickering Lumber Company to execute and deposit a surety bond with the treasurer of the state of California. The amount of said bond was fixed by the Industrial Accident Commission at $20,000. The form of said bond was prepared and furnished by the Industrial Accident Commission and was in the usual form then required by the Industrial Accident Commission in connection with the issuance of certificates of consent to self-insure. Pursuant to said requirement of the Industrial Accident Commission, and in order to secure the issuance of said certificate of consent to self-insure, said Pickering Lumber Company, as principal, and said Hartford Accident & Indemnity Company, as surety, on the 13th day of May, 1926, executed and delivered to said Industrial Accident Commission a surety bond as required by said commission as aforesaid. Said bond was deposited with the state treasurer, and thereupon the Industrial Accident Commission issued to the Pickering Lumber Company a certificate of consent to self-insure. Said bond remained in full force and effect continuously from its date to June 12, 1931. During the time said bond was in full force and effect, a large number of awards, some forty in number, were made by the commission against said Pickering Lumber Company in favor either of injured employees of said company, or of dependents of killed employees of said company whose injuries arose out of and in the course of their employment by the Pickering Lumber Company, and all of said awards were covered by said bond.

On May 9, 1931, in the District Court of the United States for the Western Division of the Western District of Missouri, Geo. R. Hicks was appointed receiver of all the property and assets of the Pickering Lumber Company located in Missouri, and on May 12, 1931, in the District Court of the United States for the Southern Division of the Northern District of California, said Geo. R. Hicks was appointed ancillary receiver of all of the property and assets of said Pickering Lumber Company in the state of California. Said receiver and ancillary receiver after his said appointment stopped payment of all of said awards, and refused to make any payments of compensation out of the property of the Pickering Lumber Company to any of said injured employees, or to the dependents of said deceased employees. At the time said receiver stopped payment on said awards, the total amount due thereon far exceeded the sum of $20,000, the amount of said bond. Whereupon the beneficiaries under said awards, as applicants, filed their petition before said Industrial Accident Commission for an order requiring the Hartford Accident & Indemnity Company, as surety on said bond, to pay or provide payment of the compensation remaining unpaid on account of said awards. The Hartford Accident & Indemnity Company appeared in said proceeding and contested the petition of said applicants. A hearing was had and at the conclusion thereof, the commission made findings embodying the facts recited herein, and upon said findings made its order or award that the Hartford Accident & Indemnity Company forthwith pay the sum of $20,000 to the state compensation fund, and to the attorney for said applicants the further sum of $2,500 as attorney's fees; that upon the payment of said sum the Hartford Accident & Indemnity Company "shall be released from all liability" and "that upon receipt by said state compensation fund of said sum of $20,000, the said sum shall, on the order of the Industrial Accident Commission, be distributed to the applicants herein and to such other persons whose claims are covered by said bond as shall assert their claim prior to the distribution of said sum of $20,000 on the following basis:

"Compensation, including that due under section 9 (a) of the Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act of 1917, for the earliest week shall first be paid and thereafter compensation shall be paid for each succeeding week, or portion of a week until the full sum of $20,000 shall have been paid.

"Said payments shall be made only to applicants whose awards have become final and in the event that, pending the distribution of said moneys petitions shall be filed, or shall be pending, to rehear or review any award. an amount sufficient to cover the amount of said award shall be held pending the decision on said rehearing or review, distribution of said retained sum to be made after such decision on the basis of payment above ordered, and in the meantime payments shall be made on any awards which shall have become final."

The Hartford Accident & Indemnity Company asked for a rehearing of this order which was denied. It then instituted this original proceeding in this court for a review of said order and an annulment of said award.

[1] It first contends that the Industrial Accident Commission has no jurisdiction to render an award against the surety on a self-insurer's bond. The jurisdiction of the Industrial Accident Commission is determined and fixed by section 21 of article 20 of the Constitution of the state and the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act (hereinafter referred to as the Workmen's Compensation Act). By the foregoing section of the Constitution, the Legislature is vested with plenary power to create and enforce a complete system of workmen's compensation. It is expressly provided therein that such a system includes "full provision for adequate insurance coverage against liability to pay or furnish compensation; full provision for regulating such insurance coverage [against liability] in all its aspects * * * [and] full provision for otherwise securing the payment of compensation." In carrying out this grant of power, the Legislature has enacted the Workmen's Compensation Act, and by section 29 thereof (as amended) has provided two ways or methods which may be followed by employers in securing the payment of compensation due under said act. One method requires the employer to insure and keep insured against such liability in one or more insurance carriers duly authorized to furnish compensation insurance in this state; the other method requires the employer to secure from the Industrial Accident Commission a certificate of consent to self-insure. This certificate is issued by the commission under certain conditions, one of which provides for the giving of a bond in the discretion of the commission and in an amount to be determined by the commission. This bond is placed and kept on deposit with the state treasurer. That section 29 of the Workmen's Compensation Act is within the power of the Legislature to enact under the terms of section 21 of article 20 of the Constitution, we have no doubt. The first method of securing payment of compensation under said act is the one in common use, and no question is raised as to the power of the Legislature to provide therefor. The second method of securing compensation was undoubtedly enacted under that declaration in said section of the Constitution which, after providing that a complete system of workmen's compensation includes "full provision for adequate insurance coverage against liability to pay or furnish compensation," also provides that it includes "full provision for otherwise securing the payment of compensation." That the provisions of the act regulating a self-insurer employer and providing for the giving of a bond, is simply one method of "securing the payment of compensation" and, therefore, within the grant of power to the Legislature to enact, we think it so clear as to require no further discussion.

[2] By section 55 of the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 868), the Industrial Accident Commission is given jurisdiction of "all proceedings for the recovery of compensation, or concerning any right or liability arising out of or incidental thereto." There may be other provisions of this section of the act which might be construed to give the commission jurisdiction over a proceeding instituted by an employee, or employees, to enforce payment against a surety on a self-insurer's bond. This portion of the section just quoted is sufficient for our present purpose. The proceeding instituted before the commission against the petitioner herein was one to recover compensation due the employees and certain dependents of killed employees of the self-insurer employer from the surety upon the bond given by the said self-insurer employer to secure the payment of said compensation, and comes clearly within the terms of said section 55 quoted above. There can be no question of the jurisdiction of the commission to entertain such a proceeding and to determine all issues arising therein and to render an award in accordance with the facts produced before it.

[3] Petitioner complains that the granting of relief against it in the proceeding before the Industrial Accident Commission deprived it of legal and equitable rights to which it would otherwise be entitled. These rights petitioner claims are given it under sections 2845 and 2846 of the Civil Code and section 1050 of the Code of Civil Procedure. If petitioner is entitled to any rights under these sections of the Code which it could not enforce before the commission, it might be relegated to the courts for the purpose of enforcing them. This result would not affect the jurisdiction of the commission if the Constitution and statutes have conferred jurisdiction upon the commission to determine the matter involved. However, if the commission is vested with jurisdiction over any given subject-matter, it has the power to hear and determine every issue raised by the parties in the controversy. Employers' Liability Assur. Corp. v. Indus. Acc. Com., 177 Cal. 771, 171 P. 935; General Acc., etc., Corp. v. Indus. Acc. Com., 196 Cal. 179, 190, 237 P. 33. In such cases the parties are not required to resort to the courts. General Acc. etc. Corp. v. Indus. Acc. Com., supra.

Petitioner states that the point just discussed is merely preliminary to the further contention that there is nothing in the bond which indicates an intention that the surety therein is to be deprived of the statutory rights given under said three Code sections. In this connection petitioner calls attention to the fact that there is nothing in the act that indicates that the bond of a self-insurer is to be other than the usual surety bond to which these Code sections would apply. It is true that the provisions in the act relative to the form of the bond and its contents are extremely meager. In providing for the form of bond to be used by self-insurers, the commission evidently followed as a guide the form of bond required of insurance carriers under the statutes of this state. Stats.

of 1917, p. 292, amended Stats. 1919, p. 611. It is contended that a bond in that form is inapplicable to the situation where a bond is required of a self-insurer employer. That it followed the form prescribed by statute of bonds required of insurance carriers is at least some evidence of its reasonableness and fairness. Petitioner has not pointed out to us any provision in the form of the bond which works an undue hardship upon the surety or upon any other person. Its only claim is that it is deprived of certain rights given to sureties by the three sections of the Code above mentioned. This claim we think we have adequately answered. We might also refer to the fact that petitioner freely and voluntarily executed the bond as a further showing that the terms of the bond did not appear unreasonable to it at the time of its execution. After voluntarily executing the bond and accepting premiums thereunder for a period of something like three years, petitioner is not in a very advantageous position to question the validity or binding effect of any of its provisions.

[4] A further objection is made to the main award for the failure of the commission to follow the terms of the bond in fixing the amount due thereon. The bond provides that the surety will pay the awards, in case the principal fails to do so within thirty days after they became final "to the State Compensation Insurance Fund, as trustee, for the beneficiaries thereof, at the present worth of such awards, commuted pursuant to the terms of Section 28 (d) of said [Workmen's Compensation] Act." The commission failed to make such commutation. It did find, however, that the total amount due or to become due on thirty-one of said awards which had then become final commuted in compliance with the terms of said section 28 (d) far exceeded the sum of $20,000. In fact, the commission found that the amount "Due Forthwith" (at the date of said award) was the sum of $22,637.98. It would have been a useless act on the part of the commission to have commuted the present worth of the awards, for it is apparent from the findings of the commission that the amount actually due at the time the award was made far exceeded the amount of the award. If there was an error on the part of the commission in failing to formally commute the present worth of the awards, the petitioner was not prejudiced by such error.

[5] Petitioner also complains of the method of distribution of the penal sum of the bond as provided in said award. The only persons entitled to participate in this distribution are those who have recovered or may recover awards before the commission for injuries, or as dependents of the employees who were killed under circumstances entitling them to compensation. The present respondents, with the exception of the Industrial Accident Commission, comprise all claimants for compensation whose claims therefor were pending before the commission at the time the proceeding now under review was finally determined. These claims with the possible exception of four had then all become final. As parties to said proceeding they are bound by the award and the method of its distribution as none of them has asked for any review thereof. Besides the award provides that each applicant upon receiving the pro rata amount due him of said $20,000 shall be required to give petitioner a full release of all claims against it. Petitioner is, therefore, fully protected against any and all claims of the respondents herein. Petitioner appears apprehensive that other claimants for compensation, in addition to the said respondents, might proceed against it on its said bond, and to the extent that it should be compelled to pay their claims, in event they or any of them should prevail, the petitioner would be required to make payments under said bond beyond the maximum penalty. It is hardly probable, in view of the limited time within which under the Workmen's Compensation Act claims for compensation may be initiated before the commission, that any further claims of that character will arise in the future. However, ample provision is made in the award of the commission for the protection and payment of all claims of applicants which may be filed pending distribution, by the requirement that an amount sufficient to cover the probable amount to become due thereon be retained for the purpose of meeting the payment of such claims. Furthermore, the payment by the surety of the full amount of the bond to the state compensation insurance fund to be disbursed under the direction of the Industrial Accident Commission would be a bar to any and all further claims against the surety.

[6] The award, as stated above, was for $20,000, the full penal sum of the bond and $2,500, attorney's fees, in addition. Petitioner has advanced a number of reasons why the award as to the attorney's fees should be annulled. It will only be necessary for us to consider one of these grounds as we regard it well taken and sufficient to compel the modification of the award by striking therefrom the allowance of attorney's fees contained therein. The bond provides that, "in no event shall the total liability of the surety exceed the penal amount herein stated in the sum of Twenty Thousand Dollars ($20.000.00)." It contains also the further provision that "the undersigned [principal and surety] are held and firmly bound for the payment of all legal costs, including reasonable attorney fees, incurred in all or any actions or proceedings taken to enforce payment of this bond, or payment of any award or judgment rendered against the undersigned surety, on account of the execution by it of this bond." Petitioner contends that this paragraph of the bond is to be read and construed with the provision of the bond which fixes the total liability of the surety at a sum not exceeding $20,000, and that, when these two provisions are read together, they provide for attorney's fees only in case the combined amounts of the award and the attorney's fees do not exceed the penal sum of the bond. This seems to be the construction which courts have placed upon bonds containing provisions like or similar to the terms of the bond in this case.

"Even where the bond stipulates that damages shall include attorney's fees, under the rule that a surety on a bond is not liable beyond the penalty named therein, the surety is not liable for attorney's fees in excess of the penalty named." 50 Cor. Jur., p. 92, § 149. In the case of Hartford Fire Ins. Co. v. Casey, 196 Mo. App. 291, 191 S. W. 1072, 1076, the court ruled as follows: "The general rule has always been that plaintiff cannot recover more than the penalty of the bond. Farrar v. Christy's Adm'rs, 24 Mo. 474; State ex rel. v. Woodward, 8 Mo. 353; State ex rel. v. Sandusky, 46 Mo. 381; Board of Education v. National Surety Co., 183 Mo. 166, 184, 82 S. W. 70; Showles v. Freeman, 81 Mo. 540. An attorney's fee is a part of the loss sustained by an obligee when compelled to sue on a bond. In other words, it partakes of the nature of the damages sustained, and the agreement to pay same makes it a part of such damages. But the bond does not provide for protection against damages beyond the amount of the penalty. As to such damages in excess of the penalty, the obligee must stand the loss himself or at least look elsewhere than to the surety. Consequently when the attorney's fee, made a part of the damages by a clause to that effect in the bond, forms a part of the excess above the face of the bond, then the obligee must stand the loss of that too, at least so far as the surety is concerned."

A similar ruling was made by the Court of Civil Appeals of Texas in the case of Hill Mercantile Co. et al. v. Rotan Grocery Co., 127 S. W. 1080, 1082. It was there said: "There is more plausibility in the contention that the contract of guaranty limits liability to $7,000. It is a well-settled rule of law that contracts of guaranty and suretyship are to be strictly construed, and all reasonable doubts resolved in favor of the guarantor or surety. It is distinctly stated in the first paragraph of the guaranty contract that the sum guaranteed is not to exceed $7,000, while in the last paragraph the guarantors agree to pay interest at the rate agreed upon between the Hill Mercantile Company and the Rotan Grocery Company, and to pay 10 per cent. attorney's fees if the debt is sued upon or placed in the hands of an attorney for collection. It is nowhere stated in the contract that the agreement to pay interest and attorney's fees was intended to create liability in addition to the $7,000 previously specified as the limit of liability. * * * Hence we conclude that the court below erred in rendering judgment against appellants J. A. Hill and R. N. Hill [two of the guarantors] in excess of $7,000, and the judgment will be reformed so as to limit their liability to $7,000, with interest thereon at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum from February 4, 1909, the date of the original judgment."

We are of the opinion that the above authorities announce the correct rule in fixing the liability of the surety on the bond here involved. There is nothing in this bond indicating that the liability to pay attorney's fees is to be in addition to the sum of $20,000 fixed by the bond as the total liability of the surety. It follows that the award in so far as it provides for an attorney's fee of $2,500 must be annulled.

There is nothing at all helpful for the respondents to be found in the case of Texas Employers' Ins. Ass'n v. Nunamaker et al. (Tex. Civ. App.) 278 S. W. 889, cited by respondents. In that case it was held in an action to enforce an award of the Industrial Accident Board that under the statutes of that state an allowance of attorney's fees in addition to the amount of the award was proper. While that action was against the surety on the bond of an employer, there is nothing in the reported decision which would indicate that the combined amount of the award and attorney's fees allowed exceeded the penal sum of the bond. We do not mean to hold in the instant case that in a proceeding against the surety on a self-insurer's bond to enforce an award of the commission against the employer, an award for attorney's fees could not be upheld in any case. It is only where the amount of the award and the attorney's fees combined exceed the penal sum of the bond that the award of attorney's fees to the extent that the combined award exceeds the amount of the bond is disallowed.

It is therefore ordered that the award of the Industrial Accident Commission against the petitioner is affirmed in all respects except as to that part thereof allowing attorney's fees of $2,500 in favor of the attorney for applicants, and that portion thereof allowing said attorney's fees is hereby annulled.

VAN HORN v. JUSTICE'S COURT OF SAN BERNARDINO TP., IN AND FOR SAN BERNARDINO COUNTY et al.

L. A. 13703.

Supreme Court of California.

Aug. 17, 1932.

1. Justices of the peace ⇐42.

Action on $500 note against defendant residing in San Bernardino county, outside San Bernardino township, in township having less than 30,000 population, should have been commenced in San Bernardino county superior court, not San Bernardino township justice's court (Const. art. 6, §§ 1, 5, as amended; art. 6, § 11, as amended, and § 11a, as added in 1928; Code Civ. Proc. § 106; § 112, as amended by St. 1929, p. 834; §§ 831h, 832, 835a, 900b; Pol. Code, § 4185a).

While general effect of St. 1929, p. 834, Code Civ. Proc. §§ 112, 831h, 835a, 900b, and Pol. Code, § 4185a, was to enlarge the jurisdiction of justices' courts in townships having a population of thirty thousand or more, so that they might hear and determine civil actions at law in which the demand or damages sought to be recovered do not exceed $1,000, it did not enlarge the territorial jurisdiction of a justice's court, which Code Civ. Proc. § 106 still limits to the boundaries of his township.

2. Justices of the peace ⇐42.

Statute held not to extend jurisdiction of justices' courts in townships of over 30,000 population to that enjoyed by municipal courts, but only to apply municipal court procedure to such justices' courts (Code Civ. Proc. § 831h).

3. Justices of the peace ⇐84(2).

Action on $500 note against defendant residing in township having less than 30,000 population was within exclusive jurisdiction of superior court, and defendant's general appearance in justice's court of township having over 30,000 population could not waive its lack of jurisdiction over subject-matter (Const. art. 6, §§ 1, 5, as amended; art. 6, § 11, as amended; and § 11a, as added in 1928; Code Civ. Proc. § 106; § 112, as amended by St. 1929, p. 834; §§ 831h, 832, 835a, 900b; Pol. Code, § 4185a).

In counties where a justice's court of larger jurisdiction exists and there is no municipal court if, under Code Civ. Proc. § 832, the action can be commenced in the justice's court, then that court has exclusive jurisdiction thereof; but if it cannot be commenced in the justice's court, and the amount of the demand exceeds $300, then the action must be commenced in the superior court.

CURTIS, J.

This proceeding was originally brought in the District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, where an opinion was rendered, written by Mr. Justice Marks, and concurred in by Mr. Presiding Justice Barnard and Mr. Justice Jennings. We adopt as our own the following portion of said opinion:

This is an original proceeding instituted in this court whereby petitioner seeks a writ of mandate compelling respondents to proceed with the trial of the case of Jay Van Horn v. H. R. Van Horn, instituted in the respondent court on September 25, 1930. Summons was served on May 14, 1931. An amended complaint was filed, to which the defendant made written answer, and the case was set for trial in the respondent court on February 26, 1932. On this day the respondent justice of the peace refused to proceed with the trial because of lack of jurisdiction.

From the amended complaint it appears that the action was brought to recover judgment upon a promissory note in the sum of $500, executed and made payable in the state of Texas. The note bears interest and provides for attorneys' fees in case it be placed in the hands of an attorney for collection. It is alleged that the entire amount of principal and interest is due and unpaid, and that the defendant is a resident of the county of San Bernardino, but not of the township of San Bernardino therein.

The answer denied all the allegations of the amended complaint except the execution of the promissory note; that its obligation was incurred and was to be performed in the state of Texas; that the defendant at all times has resided outside of the township of San Bernardino. These latter facts are expressly admitted.

San Bernardino township has a population in excess of thirty thousand. The sole question to be considered here is whether jurisdiction over the case of Van Horn v. Van Horn rested in the justice's court of San Bernardino township or in the superior court of the county, there being no municipal court in the city of San Bernardino, which is within the township of the same name.

The legislative enactments of 1929, giving an increased jurisdiction to justices' courts in townships having a population of thirty thousand or more, have presented many new and interesting questions and have been the prolific source of numerous decisions by the Supreme and Appellate Courts of the state since they went into effect, in August, 1929. We are cited to no case in which the problem here presented has been decided.

Section 1 of article 6 of the Constitution (1879) as originally adopted provided that the judicial powers of the state be vested in the state senate, sitting as a court of impeachment, the Supreme Court, the superior courts, justices of the peace, and such inferior courts as the Legislature might establish in any incorporated city, town, or city and county. This section was amended in 1904 to provide for the creation of District Courts of Appeal. It was again amended in 1911, omitting direct reference to justices of the peace, but continuing legislative authority to establish inferior township courts. In 1924 it was again amended to provide for the creation of municipal courts in cities and cities and counties. The provisions relating to inferior township courts were not changed.

Section 5 of article 6 of the Constitution of 1879 gave superior courts original jurisdiction in numerous civil cases which we are not concerned with here, and in all civil cases "in which the demand, exclusive of interest or the value of the property in controversy, amounts to three hundred dollars." It also gave the superior courts appellate jurisdiction "in such cases arising in Justices' and other inferior Courts in their respective counties as may be prescribed by law." The section was amended in 1911 by the omission of the italicized words from the sentence just quoted. It was again amended in 1924, which amendment does not concern us here. By an amendment adopted in 1928 it was provided that "the superior courts shall have original jurisdiction in all civil cases and proceedings except as in this article otherwise provided, and except also cases and proceedings in which jurisdiction is or shall be given by law to municipal or to justices' or other inferior courts."

Section 11 of article 6 of the Constitution originally provided as follows: "The Legislature shall determine the number of Justices of the Peace to be elected in townships, incorporated cities and towns, or cities and counties, and shall fix by law the powers, duties, and responsibilities of Justices of the Peace; provided, such powers shall not in any case trench upon the jurisdiction of the several Courts of record, except that said Justices shall have concurrent jurisdiction with the Superior Courts in cases of forcible entry and detainer, where the rental value does not exceed twenty-five dollars per month, and where the whole amount of damages claimed does not exceed two hundred dollars, and in cases to enforce and foreclose liens on personal property when neither the amount of the liens nor the value of the property amounts to three hundred dollars."

The amendment of this section in 1911 is not important to the question we are considering. The reference to "justices of the peace" was omitted in the amended section and "inferior courts" substituted therefor. Two amendments were adopted in 1924, one of which was repealed in 1928. The other provided for the creation of municipal courts and continued the power of the Legislature to determine the number "of the inferior courts in incorporated towns, and in townships or counties, or in incorporated cities or cities and counties, where there is no municipal court" with other powers in the Legislature not necessary for us to consider. In 1928 there was added to the Constitution section 11a of article 6, which provides as follows: "The legislature shall determine, according to population, the number and jurisdiction of each of the inferior courts in incorporated cities or towns wherein there is no municipal court, and in townships, counties or cities and counties, and the number of judges or justices thereof and their qualifications and compensation, and shall fix by law the powers, duties and responsibilities of each of such courts and of the judges or justices thereof; and may provide that the jurisdiction of such courts shall be exclusive."

It is apparent from the foregoing constitutional provisions that at all times material to this proceeding the jurisdiction of the superior court in civil actions for money ended when the amount involved in the litigation was less than the amount specified as the maximum amount that could be recovered in a justice's court. There was no constitutional line of demarkation separating the jurisdiction of the two courts, such matter being left entirely to legislative enactment. A law increasing the jurisdiction of the justices' court would automatically reduce the jurisdiction of the superior court by the exact extent that jurisdiction had been granted to the inferior court.

Under the authority granted to it in 1879 the Legislature in 1880 proceeded to provide for the establishment of justices' courts throughout the state. We need only concern ourselves with the legislation applicable to township justices' courts. Section 106 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as then adopted (Code Amdts. 1880, p. 34) and still in force, provided as follows: "The civil jurisdiction of justices' courts extends to the limits of the townships in which they are held; but mesne and final process of any justices court in a county may be issued to and served in any part of the county." Section 112 of the same Code, as adopted in 1880 (Code Amdts. 1880, p. 35), in so far as its provisions are involved here, limited the jurisdiction of justices' courts to an amount of not to exceed $300 sought to be recovered in actions on contracts. An important amendment to this section was enacted in 1929 (Stats. 1929, p. 834), which we will consider in connection with the legislation following the adoption of section 11a of article 6 of the Constitution. Section 113 of the Code of Civil Procedure (Code Amdts. 1880, p. 35) gave justices' and superior courts concurrent jurisdiction in certain actions of forcible entry and detainer and to foreclose liens on personal property. Section 114 of the same Code (Code Amdts. 1880, p. 36) contained a legislative declaration of some of the provisions of section 11 of article 6 of the Constitution as it was first adopted. These two latter sections were repealed in 1929 (Stats. 1929, p. 834). Section 832 of the Code of Civil Procedure, in effect at the time the case of Van Horn v. Van Horn was instituted, placed the venue in such an action (omitting here the consideration of the amount involved) "in the township or city in which the defendant resides."

It clearly appears, and has been held in numerous cases, that prior to the Code amendments of 1929, giving enlarged jurisdiction to justices' courts in townships having a population of thirty thousand or more, the plaintiff, Jay Van Horn, should have brought his action in the township of the residence of the defendant had the recovery he sought been less than $300, and in the superior court of the county of the residence of the defendant where he sought to recover a greater amount.

Following the adoption of section 11a of article 6 of the Constitution, the Legislature in 1929 passed several acts increasing the jurisdiction and changing the procedure in justices' courts in townships having a population of thirty thousand or more. No change which it is necessary to note was made in justices' courts in townships having a lesser population. Sections 112, 831h, 835a, 900b, Code Civ. Proc.; section 4185a, Pol. Code. The general effect of these amendments was to enlarge the jurisdiction of justices' courts in townships having a population of thirty thousand or more, so that they might hear and determine civil actions at law in which the demand or damages sought to be recovered do not exceed $1,000. Jurisdiction was also increased in other instances not necessary to detail here.

It was also provided that in these justices' courts actions be commenced and prosecuted in the same manner and under the same rules of pleading as were provided by law governing civil action and the enforcing of judgments in municipal courts of the state. The qualifications for justices of the peace in these courts was also fixed.

It should be observed that San Bernardino township has had a justices' court with a justice of the peace presiding therein since the adoption of the Codes. His jurisdiction over the subject-matter of actions has been changed by previous amendments of the Codes. His territorial jurisdiction has always been limited to the boundaries of his township by section 106 of the Code of Civil Procedure since its adoption in 1880. This section has not been amended.

[1] The case of Proctor v. Justice's Court, 209 Cal. 39, 285 P. 312, 313, contains a careful review of the legislation in California since 1850 affecting justices' courts. The conclusion is there reached that "section 112 of the Code of Civil Procedure relates to the kind of civil causes * * * of which the justices' courts may take cognizance" and that this section does "not purport to fix the territorial jurisdiction of these courts."

It has been very generally held that in actions based upon contract for recovery of a money judgment the action must be commenced in the township in which the defendant resides (Holbrook v. Superior Court, 106 Cal. 589, 39 P. 936), unless there is an agreement to perform elsewhere, or unless the defendant submits himself to the jurisdiction of the court. Section 106 of the Code of Civil Procedure still limits the territorial jurisdiction of a justices' court to the boundaries of his township, and we do not find that any of the amendments of 1929 have changed this rule. We conclude that the action of Van Horn v. Van Horn should have been commenced in the superior court of San Bernardino county, the recovery being sought for more than $300 and the defendant residing without the boundaries of San Bernardino township and within San Bernardino county in a township having less than thirty thousand population and he not having undertaken to perform within San Bernardino township.

[2] We do not believe that the provisions of section 831h of the Code of Civil Procedure were intended to extend the jurisdiction of justices' courts in the larger townships to that then enjoyed by municipal courts, but only to apply municipal court procedure to these justices' courts.

[3] We are in accord with the conclusion reached by the District Court of Appeal, as above stated, that the action of Van Horn v. Van Horn should have been commenced in the superior court of the county of San Bernardino. In other words, the superior court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter of said action. If so, its jurisdiction was exclusive, and the justice's court of San Bernardino township had no jurisdiction over the same. Shipp v. Superior Court, 209 Cal. 671, 289 P.

825. There can be no such thing as concurrent jurisdiction over the same subject-matter of an action in the superior court and in the justice's court, except in the few cases mentioned in the Constitution, and this is not one of them. As is said in a previous part of this opinion, where the jurisdiction of the justice's court ends, the jurisdiction of the superior court begins. There is no overlapping of jurisdiction, and no option is given to a litigant to select one or the other of these two courts in which to institute his action. The law has done this for him. The Constitution and statutes of this state, above cited, have definitely fixed and determined the respective jurisdictions of these two courts. In counties where a justice's court of larger jurisdiction exists and there is no municipal court in said county, if under section 832 of the Code of Civil Procedure the action can be commenced in said justice's court, then that court has exclusive jurisdiction thereof; but if it cannot be commenced in the justice's court and the amount of the demand exceeds $300, then the action must be commenced in the superior court. As the action filed in the justice's court was within the exclusive jurisdiction of the superior court, the appearance of the defendant therein did not confer jurisdiction of said action upon the justice's court. Shipp v. Superior Court, supra; Marin M. W. Dist. v. North Coast W. Co., 178 Cal. 324, 328, 173 P. 473, 474; 7 R. C. L. 1043. In Marin M. W. Dist. v. North Coast W. Co., supra, it is said: "It is the universal rule that jurisdiction of the subject-matter cannot be conferred upon a tribunal by consent, and it follows that the parties cannot make an effective waiver of a lack of such jurisdiction." The cases of Olcese v. Justice's Court, 156 Cal. 82, 103 P. 317; Vance v. Superior Court, 48 Cal. App. 327, 191 P. 945; and Gulick v. Justice's Court, 101 Cal. App. 619, 281 P. 1031, relied upon by petitioner, are not applicable here as they involve simply the waiver of jurisdiction of the person, while the jurisdiction which we are considering involves the jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action.

Petitioner relies with some assurance upon our decision in People v. Justice's Court, 212 Cal. 603, 299 P. 731, which was a proceeding in mandate to compel the respondent court to set aside its order quashing summons and to proceed with the trial of the action pending before it. That action had been brought in the justice's court of the township of Sacramento, which township had a population exceeding 30,000 inhabitants, under a statute directing that the same should be commenced "in a court of competent jurisdiction in the County of Sacramento." As the amount involved therein was over $300 and less than $1,000, it was brought in the justice's court of the township of Sacramento. No question was raised in the proceeding of People v. Justice's Court, supra, but that the action in the justice's court was brought in the proper court. The only point made was that the action having been brought in the justice's court, the summons therein could not be served out of the county in which the justice's court was situated. We held that section 831h of the Code of Civil Procedure applied in such a case, and authorized the service of summons as in actions pending in the superior courts. There is nothing in that decision inconsistent with the conclusion at which we have arrived in this action. We simply held that the order quashing the summons was unauthorized and directed the justice's court to proceed with the trial of the action.

The peremptory writ is denied.

AMERICAN AUTOMOBILE ASS'N et al. v. AMERICAN AUTOMOBILE OWNERS' ASS'N et al.

S. F. 13625.

Supreme Court of California.

Aug. 1, 1932.

Rehearing Denied Aug. 29, 1932.

1. Trade-marks and trade-names and unfair competition ⇐68(1).

Test of unfair competition by use of emblem similar to that of competitors is whether person exercising care, caution, and power of perception which public may be expected to exercise would mistake one emblem for the other.

2. Trade-marks and trade-names and unfair competition ⇐70(3).

Words "American Automobile," being in common use, are common property, which may be used by others than original appropriator in combination with other descriptive words, if not probably misleading persons possessing ordinary powers of perception.

3. Trade-marks and trade-names and unfair competition ⇐3(1).

Generic terms and words descriptive of place are not subject to exclusive appropriation.

4. Trade-marks and trade-names and unfair competition ⇐70(2).

Automobile associations cannot impinge on "AAA" symbol, previously adopted and used by American Automobile Association, especially if such letters do not correctly initial other associations' names.

5. Trade-marks and trade-names and unfair competition ⇐21.

Diamond-shaped labels, having been in use for many years, cannot be exclusively appropriated as trade-marks.

6. Trade-marks and trade-names and unfair competition ⇐67.

Law of unfair competition does not protect purchasers against salesmen's falsehoods nor perform functions of penal statutes.

7. Trade-marks and trade-names and unfair competition ⇐67.

Deception by resemblance of competitors' trade-marks in features to which original appropriator had no exclusive right is not actionable.

8. Trade-marks and trade-names and unfair competition ⇐70(2).

Whether one emblem resembles another must be determined by inspection of points of difference and resemblance as whole after placing them side by side.

9. Trade-marks and trade-names and unfair competition ⇐70(2).

Emblems of California State Automobile Association and American Automobile Owners' Association held so different as to preclude injunction against latter's use of emblem.

10. Appeal and error ⇐1024(2).

It is trial court's function to judge sufficiency and weight of evidence in injunction suit.

11. Trade-marks and trade-names and unfair competition ⇐69.

Bad or evil intent to design emblem similar to that of competitor does not render such act unlawful, where it would not deceive ordinarily careful persons.

12. Torts ⇐1.

In civil, as well as criminal, law, there must be joint operation of act and intent to constitute unlawful act.

13. Trade-marks and trade-names and unfair competition ⇐69.

Party's intent to draw custom from his competitor is not actionable, unless his acts are unlawful.

14. Appeal and error ⇐1010(1).

Supreme Court cannot substitute its judgment for that of trial court supported by substantial evidence.

PRESTON, J., dissenting.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Action by the American Automobile Association, a corporation, and another, against the American Automobile Owners' Association, a corporation, and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal.

Affirmed.

Rehearing denied; CURTIS and PRESTON, JJ., dissenting.

G. E. Sandford, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Hugh L. Smith and Chas. J. Wiseman, both of San Francisco, and Arthur V. Kaufman, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PER CURIAM.

Plaintiff corporations, American Automobile Association and California State Automobile Association, appeal from a judgment denying their application to enjoin defendant corporation from doing business under its corporate name, American Automobile Owners' Association, and from using and displaying its official emblem, on the ground that said name is so similar to the name of the American Automobile Association, and its emblem so closely resembles the emblem of the California State Automobile Association as to tend to deceive and mislead.

The California State Automobile Association was incorporated in this state in 1907 as a nonstock corporation, with its principal place of business in the city of San Francisco. Its objects, as stated in its articles of incorporation, are to promote improvement of the highways, encourage proper highway maintenance, accomplish proper marking of the highways, urge just and rational highway legislation, further all good roads projects, and protect the interests of its members. At the time of the trial said association had a membership of more than 68,000. In consideration of annual dues, it furnishes its members with towing service, either directly, by towing cars operated by it, or through privately owned garages, and also gives them emergency road service in changing tires and repairing minor mechanical defects. It obtains extensive road and touring information for the benefit of members; supplies them with maps; designates official hotels and garages, which are required to maintain a certain standard; assists members arrested for traffic violations; and otherwise renders services in line with its objects. Its activities in marking the highways of Northern California with road signs are well known. It maintains a separate insurance bureau, which issues certain types of automobile insurance, and it acts as a broker in placing public liability insurance for its members.

Under an arrangement of years' standing with the Automobile Club of Southern California, the appellant California State Automobile Association is not active in the thirteen southern counties of the state. It does not solicit members in said counties, nor does it accept members who reside in Southern California without first advising that they join the Automobile Club of Southern California. By agreement between the two organizations, members of the State Association are entitled to the services of the Automobile Club when in Southern California, and members of the southern club have reciprocal privileges when in Northern California.

The California State Automobile Association and similar associations in all but a few states are members of, or affiliated with, the appellant American Automobile Association, which was incorporated in Connecticut in 1910 as a nonstock corporation, and had existed prior to that time, since 1902, as an unincorporated association. The American Automobile Association is generally known as the "AAA," and local organizations affiliated with it as "AAA," or "Three A" clubs or associations. Members of the California State Automobile Association when traveling outside California are entitled to receive from the organization affiliated with the American Automobile Association in the territory where they are traveling such services as said affiliate association renders to its own members. The California Association in turn accords similar privileges to members of other state associations affiliated with the American Automobile Association when they travel in the territory of the California Association. The AAA in this phase of its organization is a centralizing agency through which automobile owners, by membership in a state club affiliated with the AAA, may secure the services rendered by automobile clubs throughout the country. The AAA promotes and facilitates the organization of local associations. Not more than one local organization in any given territory is permitted to affiliate with the AAA. A portion of the annual dues of each member of the state associations are remitted to the AAA, which maintains offices in New York, Washington, D. C., and Detroit. The AAA also carries on national activities to secure constructive automobile legislation and promote the maintenance, construction, and improvement of highways, and disseminates touring information. Individuals, as well as organizations, may join the AAA directly, but it does not solicit or accept members in the territory of a local association affiliated with it. The Automobile Club of Southern California is not a member of the AAA. The AAA does not maintain an office in Southern California, nor engage in business there. However, it accepts voluntary applications from persons residing in the southern territory and has a number of individual members there.

The respondent American Automobile Owners' Association was incorporated in this state in January, 1924, but did not commence doing business until August, 1926. Unlike the California State Automobile Association and the American Automobile Association, it is a stock corporation. It is in no way affiliated with either the State Association or the AAA. In actual operation the corporation furnishes similar services to those rendered by the California State Automobile Association and automobile associations generally. At the time of trial in November, 1927, its membership had grown to 17,000. It asserts that its activities are confined to the thirteen southern counties of the state. Its principal place of business is in the city of Los Angeles. It also maintains an office in San Diego.

Both the appellant California State Automobile Association and respondent American Automobile Owners' Association issue to their members a diamond-shaped enameled metal emblem for display on their automobiles. The official emblems of the respective associations are also prominently featured on their stationery and advertising matter, and on maps and road information distributed to members. The emblem of the parent organization, AAA, is wholly dissimilar to the other emblems. On the California State Automobile Association emblem the dark blue letters AAA are a distinctive type and are inclosed in two large interlocking blue circles resembling automobile tires, arranged so that the outer letters are encircled once and the middle letter is doubly encircled by said two tire-shaped circles. The blue letters stand out conspicuously on a field of orange yellow. The legend California State Automobile Association in small lettering, approximately a quarter of an inch high, appears on the half-inch blue border of the diamond. The AAA on the emblem signifies that the California State Automobile Association is affiliated with the American Automobile Association. This practice of making the letters AAA the central feature of the insignia is followed by the state associations throughout the country which are affiliated with the American Automobile Association.

The emblem of the American Automobile Owners' Association is also diamond shaped, with two corners of the diamond stubbed or truncated, and approximately of the size of the State Association emblem. The State Association emblem has the blue letters AAA enclosed in interlocking blue circles resembling automobile tires upon a yellow background, while the emblem of the American Automobile Owners' Association has the white letters AAOA on a red background. The two middle letters AO are of the same height, and are the largest of the group, the O being oblong in form. Said letters AO stand out conspicuously in said group. The AAOA emblem also has a blue border of the same width as the State Automobile Association emblem, and on the border of said AAOA emblem are stamped the words "American Automobile Owners Association." Upon the emblems of both the State Association and the American Automobile Owners' Association the smaller letters stating the name of the association are nickel-colored.

Previous to the adoption of its present emblem the American Automobile Owners' Association, from the time it commenced doing business in August, 1926, until November, 1926, distributed an emblem which differed in design from the present emblem only in that instead of the letters AAOA, it bore the letters AA, in line, but widely separated, with the word "owners" in lettering less than a quarter of an inch high written underneath, and the third A appearing below the word "owners." Viewed at a distance of twenty feet the word "owners" is not visible, and and the three A's appearing in triangular form are quite outstanding. The use of said emblem was discontinued in November, 1926, but the court in the present action nevertheless enjoined its use.

We may observe that although the officials of respondent AAOA testified, and the court found upon the evidence before it, that the AAOA did not extend its activities beyond the thirteen southern counties of California, there is no such limitation in its articles of incorporation. If the emblems are so similar as to fall under the ban of unfair competition, we do not think that it would be a defense to the suit for injunction to answer that the respondent AAOA had not at the time of trial, as found by the court, extended its activities into northern California. Upon argument before us it admitted that it had since established an office in San Francisco.

[1-4] The important question presented by the appeal must be determined by an application of the well-established test, which no doubt the trial court applied to the case, to wit: Would a person exercising that care, caution and power of perception which the public may be expected to exercise in the matter which it has in mind, mistake one of said emblems for the other? The only points of similarity are to be found in the size and diamond shape (waiving the difference which exists as to the fact that all of the points of the diamond design of plaintiff California State Automobile Association are pointed, and two of said points of the diamond design of respondent are truncated), and in the small blue border, and in the similarity as to metal color of the smaller lettering on the border. In all other respects they are different as to name, abbreviations, size and style of letters, design of motto, and color. Placed at any point within the distance of visual discernment they present an entirely different picture which could not deceive a person of normal discernment into the error of mistaking one for the other. No claim is made as to the right of monopoly by reason of copyright or trade-mark of the letters AAA, or as to the exclusive right of appellants to appropriate the words "American Automobile," for the reason that these words are in common use and are regarded by the law as common property, which may be used by others in combination with other descriptive words, provided they are not used in combination with such other words or symbols or designs as to render it probable that they would mislead persons possessing ordinary powers of perception. Generic terms and words descriptive of place are not subject to exclusive appropriation. No legal objection could be urged against the formation of an association to be known as the American Automobile Association of South America, or the American Automobile and Motor Association, as such. That neither could impinge upon the AAA symbol adopted and used by the American Automobile Association is clear for the sufficient reason that said three letters in combination had previously been adopted by the American Automobile Association as its symbol. The fact that said letters do not correctly initial the true name of either of said other associations would be an additional circumstance against a claim of right.

[5] No claim of exclusive appropriation of diamond-shaped labels can be sustained, because diamond-shaped designs have been in use for many years and are commonly used in magazine, periodical, label, and sticker forms of advertising.

Justice Brewer, in Lorillard v. Peper (C. C. A.) 86 F. 956, 960, in giving consideration to the rule which should guide courts in determining whether there exists in fact such a similiarity of names, letters, symbols, forms, colors, shapes, and sizes as would be likely to deceive a person of ordinary discernment, reduces the subject to the following formula: "The difference [labels] is such that the eye will take it in at a moment's glance. Summing it all up, while there are certain minor points of resemblance which have been forcibly urged upon our attention, * * * their labels,—taking the tout ensemble,—it appears to us clear that they are so essentially different that no one of ordinary intelligence, desiring to buy the one kind of tobacco, would be misled into buying a package of the other. * * * We cannot surrender our own judgment in this matter because others may be of a different opinion, or because it happens, in isolated instances, that some purchaser was so careless as not to detect the differences. It may well be that, where many sales were made, some individuals, not particularly attentive, may have purchased the defendant's supposing they were purchasing the plaintiff's package. Such things will happen in the ordinary course of business, no matter how great the differences; and the fact that they do happen, while it is not to be ignored, is not to outweigh the evidence which comes from a personal inspection of the packages and labels."

The question here presented is by no means a novel one in the judicature of our federal courts, or of the courts of this state and sister states. The law has many times been considered in its application to wide and diversified subjects of mental and manual production, manufacture, industry, business, and trade. The rule has been most frequently applied in controversies arising between publishers of magazines and periodicals, compounders of patent medicines and chewing gums, and candy manufacturers, where the claim of unfair competition has been made the issue. In Collegiate World Publishing Co. v. Du Pont (D. C.) 14 F.(2d) 158, 160, plaintiff was the publisher of a publication entitled "College Humor," and defendant subsequently began the publication of a magazine entitled "College Comics." Both publications occupied the same field. The general dress and size of the two publications were strikingly similar. This case has a special bearing on the instant case, inasmuch as it makes reference to a new enterprise entering the field of competition, and the confusion which, if created in the minds of inattentive or careless persons, could at best be but short lived, and would soon disappear, if it seriously existed. The instant case does not in all respects resemble cases dealing with chewing gums and prepared articles for consumption, which are often hurriedly purchased by the traveling public in small packages and consumed before the deception is discovered, but the transaction of the kind of business in which the respondent is engaged is attended with deliberate action and possible investigation, and above all it is a business in which a good name for square dealing with the public is absolutely essential to success and continuance in business. The relationship between its members and the association is necessarily one of trust and confidence. It is also a business in which fraud or deception are certain sooner or later of detection if either is practiced. No doubt the trial court in considering the rationale of the situation encountered difficulty in bringing itself to understand how a membership consisting of 17,000 persons, or any considerable portion of that number, if obtained by the practice of fraud or deception, could have been induced to retain membership therein after it became known to them that they had been tricked into becoming members of respondent organization. The depositions of the five witnesses offered to establish the claim of fraud will later receive attention.

The court in the case of Collegiate World Publishing Co. v. Du Pont, supra, in considering the question as to the likelihood of the name of one magazine being mistaken for the other, said:

"There was some confusion, but it was due to the carelessness or inattention of dealers and purchasers who did not know a new magazine had come out. Such confusion is to be expected at first, where a new magazine enters the field dealing with the same general subject-matter as a magazine already on the market. This confusion was negligible, and would soon disappear as the reading public came to know there were two magazines dealing with the humorous side of college life. The confusion that existed was due to the fact that plaintiff selected descriptive words for its name.

"Similarity in names of magazines dealing with the same subject is not unusual, but on the contrary is quite common, such as Popular Science, Popular Mechanics; Outdoor Life, Outdoor Recreation; Field and Stream, Forest and Stream; Boy's Life, Boy's Magazine; Ladies Home Journal, People's Home Journal; Radio Doings, Radio Digest, Radio World, Radio Age, Radio Progress, Radio News, Radio Broadcast; Motor, The Motor, Motor Transport, Motor Record, Motor World, Motor Age, Motor Life; etc."

To the above a long list of other comparative cases might be added in which similarity of association and corporate names was held not to be in violation of the unfair competition rule. We will cite relatively a few from outside jurisdictions, and three or four from this state. Practically every point made by appellants is covered in these cited cases and the law is applied to analogous situations. In Choynski v. Cohn, 39 Cal. 501, 2 Am. Rep. 476, it was held that the name Antiquarian Book Store did not vest its author with an exclusive right in said name to the extent that it could enjoin the use of the name Antiquarian Book & Variety Store by its later business rival. See, also, on this and other kindred points, Tasty Baking Co. v. Tasty Pound Cake Co. (D. C.) 32 F.(2d) 1009; Umpqua Broccoli Exchange v. Um-Qua Valley Broccoli Growers, 117 Or. 678, 245 P. 324; Viavi v. Vimedia Co. (C. C. A.) 245 F. 289; Parker Pen Co. v. Finstone (D. C.) 7 F.(2d) 753; Supreme Lodge of Pythias v. Improved Order Knights of Pythias, 113 Mich. 133, 71 N. W. 470, 38 L. R. A. 658; Elgin, etc., v. Elgin Creamery Co., 155 Ill. 127, 40 N. E. 616; Farmers' Loan & Trust Company v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Company of Kansas (Sup.) 1 N. Y. S. 44; Richmond Remedies Company v. Miles Medical Company (C. C. A.) 16 F.(2d) 598; Italian Swiss Colony v. Italian Vineyard Company, 158 Cal. 252, 110 P. 913, 32 L. R. A. (N. S.) 439.

In this state the question of unfair competition received critical attention in Dunston v. Los Angeles Van & Storage Company, 165 Cal. 89, 131 P. 115, 117, and Southern California Fish Company v. White Star Canning Company, 45 Cal. App. 426, 187 P. 981. In the Los Angeles Van & Storage Case, former Justice Henshaw gave consideration to the particular questions presented by the appeal in the instant case. Plaintiff Dunston established his business in 1896 and gave to it the name Los Angeles Van, Truck & Storage Company. In 1902 a certificate was issued to him by the secretary of state granting him the sole and exclusive right to use said name. In 1910, defendants, so the complaint alleged, organized a corporation for the purpose of conducting a similar business to that of plaintiff in the city of Los Angeles, and fraudulently appropriated a similar name, to wit, Los Angeles Van & Storage Company. Plaintiff alleged that the name of the company last named was in imitation of his company's name, and was selected for the purpose of deceiving, and had deceived, his patrons and the general public. In disposing adversely of plaintiff's claim that the trade-name was susceptible of exclusive use, citing section 991, Civil Code, the court says: "It is too apparent to need discussion that the name here employed by plaintiff has reference in its first words to the place of business; in the remaining words to a description of the business. Such names, titles or designations are not the subject of exclusive copyright or trade-mark." (Citing numerous cases.) The court then points out that as the judgment cannot be supported upon the theory of an invasion of an exclusive right to property in a trade-mark, the only hope for the judgment must rest upon the ground of unfair trade dealing. This principle, says the opinion, will protect the person first in the field to the extent of making competitors "use reasonable precautions to prevent deceit and fraud upon the public and upon the business first in the field." Continuing, the decision reads: "But, as has been intimated, relief in such cases really rests upon the deceit or fraud which the later comer into the business field is practicing upon the earlier comer and upon the public. Like all other kinds of fraud and deceit this is not presumed but must be pleaded and shown. Since plaintiff had no exclusive property right by way of trade-mark in the use of the name, it follows that the mere similarity of names does not establish the fraud. It must be such a misuse of the name by advertising and soliciting as amounts to fraud, and without this proof no relief may be granted, for, as is said by the Supreme Court of the United States in [Delaware & H.] Canal Co. v. Clark, 13 Wall. 311, 20 L. Ed. 581: 'True it may be that the use by a second producer, in describing truthfully his product, of a name or a combination of words already in use by another, may have the effect of causing the public to mistake as to the origin or ownership of the product; but if it is just as true in its application to his goods as it is to those of another who first applied it and who, therefore, claims an exclusive right to use it, there is no legal or moral wrong done. Purchasers may be mistaken, but they are not deceived by false representations, and equity will not enjoin against telling the truth.' The findings absolutely fail to show such fraud, imposition or deceit. Since the use by the defendants of the similar name which they have selected is not forbidden by law, the use of it even for conspicuous advertising, so long as the advertisements are true, is not a violation of any of plaintiff's rights. The fact that confusion to the business of the plaintiff has resulted from acts not in themselves illegitimate of itself affords no ground for relief."

The judgment for plaintiff was reversed. In the instant case, as in the case last above cited, the findings absolutely fail to show "fraud, imposition, or deceit." Southern California Fish Company v. White Star Canning Company, supra, is another illuminating case as to what constitutes unfair competition, and answers many of the objections made by appellants. It has to do with the labels and containers used in canning tuna fish products for the market. Without going into detail as to all the points of resemblance and difference as to cans, labels, and emblems used by the rival companies, which are specifically considered in the decision, it is sufficient to make reference to portions of the decision which have application to the principle of law involved in the instant case. It is coincident in the decision that the cans used by the contending fish packers, with their wrappers, bore considerable resemblance to each other, but all of said resemblances arose from features that were common to the trade or business, to which no one had an exclusive right. It is there said that the fact that any one is deceived by the size and general make-up of the can, or by the prevailing color scheme of the wrapper or labels, does not help plaintiff's case. All of those features were old, separately and in combination. Plaintiff must show deception arising from some feature of its own, not common to the public.

"Passing from the features that are common to the trade—size and shape of cans, color scheme of labels, etc.—we find that, with but one exception, presently to be noted, the label used by defendant is substantially unlike that used by plaintiff. The exception to which we refer is the figure or design of the fish. But the figure of the fish is a symbol that is indicative of the article sold. And the rule is that there can be no exclusive appropriation of a sign or symbol that represents or is descriptive of the article to which it is attached * * *, or which indicates the ingredients of the package, or the mode of composition. To give the right of exclusive appropriation, the sign or figure must be some arbitrary form or figure, not suggestive of the nature of the article to which it is affixed." Southern California Fish Company v. White Star Canning Company, 45 Cal. App. 426, 432, 187 P. 981, 984.

[6] The decisions of this court and courts of other jurisdictions make it plain that the law of unfair competition does not pretend to protect purchasers against falsehoods which salesmen may tell. It does not assume to perform the functions of penal statutes. The law is well stated in Southern California Fish Company v. White Star Canning Company, supra, as follows: " 'The law of unfair competition does not protect purchasers against falsehoods which the tradesman may tell; the falsehood must be told by the article itself in order to make the law of unfair competition applicable.' Hill Bread Co. v. Goodrich Baking Co. (N. J. Ch.) 89 A. 863. Each of the housewives whose testimony plaintiff relies on to show specific instances of actual deception admitted that, by using her eyes, she could readily detect the difference in the two packages. 'A resemblance which would deceive an expert or very cautious purchaser may still give a right of action, but a resemblance which would deceive only an indifferent or careless purchaser gives no right of action. The true rule lies between these extremes, condemning what would be reasonably calculated to deceive the common or usual purchaser of the given article when exercising ordinary care.' " See, also, Howe Scale Co. of 1886 v. Wyckoff, 198 U. S. 118 at page 140, 25 S. Ct. 609, 614, 49 L. Ed. 972.

[7] Many other cases might be cited to the effect that it is not enough to entitle a complainant to relief that some purchasers might be influenced to accept a competitor's product when his was desired because the competitor's product bore upon the container some figure or words in common with his own, if the differences in other respects are such as to make them readily distinguishable by an ordinarily observant purchaser; nor is it a ground of action that deception was due to resemblance in features as to which the complainant had no exclusive right. Wunderlich v. Cash (C. C. A.) 33 F.(2d) 118.

[8, 9] Of course, the only rule by which resemblances or differences can be detected is by physical comparison. Placing the objects of disputed similarity side by side is the method adopted by all courts, that not only the size, shapes, and forms may be brought into juxtaposition, but also that the color effect will be brought into the picture. There can be no other fair method of arriving at the truth. This is the approved test and the only way by which similitudes and differences may be compared. Whether one emblem resembles another is to be determined by an inspection of the points of difference and resemblance, as a whole, and not merely of points of resemblance. Richmond Remedies Co. v. Dr. Miles Medical Co. (C. C. A.) 16 F. (2d) 598; Postum Cereal Co. v. American, etc., Co. (C. C. A.) 119 F. 848; Viavi Co. v. Vimedia Co. (C. C. A.) 245 F. 289; Southern California Fish Co. v. White Star Canning Co., 45 Cal. App. 426, 187 P. 981. When so examined, the emblems of the contending competitors differ in so many conspicuous and essential features—in name, coloring, number and formation of letters, symbol—that it does not seem possible the one should be mistaken for the other by persons of ordinary intelligence, exercising ordinary care in the concerns of business. The form of the diamond is not absolutely identical. Of course, that is not susceptible of exclusive appropriation. But even should mistakes infrequently occur, the error would be with the person who fails to use his powers of perception in distinguishing differences where they actually exist. The similarity between numerous types of automobiles themselves is more striking than is the similarity between the emblems in the present case.

The court found, in line with the pleadings, that the plaintiff California State Automobile Association had a membership of approximately 68,000 members, and respondent had a membership of approximately 18,000 members at the time of trial, to wit, November, 1927, totaling a membership of 86,000 persons. This number is far from comprising the total number of persons owning or operating automobiles in this state. Appellants, in an effort to prove specific instances of deception claimed to have been practiced by agents employed by respondent in its business, introduced the depositions of four persons taken in their behalf, which are specifically set out in the briefs, from which it is claimed that respondent's representations and emblems influenced them to join respondent association. In one case the transaction was with a housewife. She testified that she joined the respondent association when her intentions were to join the California State Automobile Association, and she believed she was joining it. She claims that she was misled by the three A's. As near as she recollected it, the agent said, as she understood him, that he represented the American Automobile Association. She admitted her membership card made no reference to the California State Automobile Association. Her testimony is clearly so uncertain as to have justified the trial court in holding that her action could not be charged to deception on the part of respondent association. A second deponent averred that he glanced at the application before he signed it, and saw the Three A emblem; that he didn't observe the word "owners" on the emblem; that the salesman told him that he could only get service from a garage having the official Three A sign; that the salesman told him to go to appellant's office on K street in Sacramento for information and maps; that the Three A was all that was talked about. This witness, when asked if he made an examination of the emblem which the person displayed to him, answered: "No, sir, because I know that is the 'Three A's,' and I don't have to examine." He did not read over a paper which he signed. A third deponent said that a salesman displayed the emblem AAOA, herein described, to him and he joined thinking it was "Three A's." He was told he could get service anywhere in the country. A fourth deponent said that the letters AAA on the respondent's emblem indicated to him that it was appellant's emblem. He testified that said salesman represented that his organization was the one that placed the road signs on the highways. The deponent admitted that he was not shown an emblem of the California State Automobile Association, and while he signed a paper which said "make all checks payable to the American Automobile Owners Association," he did not observe the word "owners" on the literature or otherwise.

The deposition of the fifth deponent was practically along the lines of the four herein reviewed. In commenting on this class of evidence in Moebius v. Louis Dejonge Co. (D. C.) 215 F. 443, 447, the court made the following observation:

"Complainant has introduced testimony as to misrepresentations of salesmen of defendants and confusion and mistakes by purchasers of these two articles. The salesmen are not identified, and, where only sporadic incidents are ascertained, a merchant is not chargeable with an occasional remark of an unidentified occasional salesman.

"Little aid is furnished by the testimony of witnesses as to confusion when that testimony is taken by deposition. In open court the judge can form his opinion of the point of view and mental attitude of the person who gives testimony of this character. There is no reason to doubt that the illustrations given by the witnesses in the case at bar are truthfully stated, and, of course, in doubtful cases actual instances of confusion may be helpful in arriving at a correct decision; but, generally speaking, the court must, if possible diagnose the subjective symptoms of the purchasing public from the appearance of the articles themselves, unless a course of conduct is proved which shows the employment of methods and means indicating unfair competition."

[10] It is the trial court's function to judge of the sufficiency of the evidence in the case and give it such weight as it finds it entitled to receive.

The appeal is taken from that portion of the judgment rendered in favor of the defendants and against plaintiffs which adjudges that: "It is further ordered, adjudged and decreed that said plaintiffs nor is either of them entitled to any other, further or additional relief whatsoever as against said defendants or either or any of them as prayed for in said complaint, and that said defendants are entitled to recover judgment against said plaintiffs for their costs of suit taxed in the sum of ——— Dollars." The prayer of the complaint asks for an order of injunction restraining the use of said emblems and insignia by respondents, and for an order restraining respondents "from doing business under or using or displaying the title and corporate name 'American Automobile Owners Association,' or any title or name similar to the respective titles and names of plaintiffs; from distributing to any person any printed or written matter, or erecting any signs containing or bearing said emblems, or corporate title similar to those of plaintiffs; from representing that defendant corporation is in any way connected with or affiliated with either of plaintiffs; from representing that members of defendant corporation will receive any services whatsoever from either of plaintiffs, and for costs and such further relief as may be equitable and just."

No money judgment was sought by the pleading and no attempt was made to prove money damages.

The court conceded that the California State Automobile Association and its parent corporation had performed a great and valuable service to the traveling public in the ways herein described, but found that their fears as to the deception that would ensue to the public if respondent were permitted to use the emblems and other means of publicity which it had adopted, were unfounded and unsupported by the evidence. The court found squarely upon the issue of fact presented by the pleading, "that said defendants have adopted said emblems and title for the purpose of so practicing deceit and fraud upon the public and prospective members are thereby deceived, deluded," etc., by said emblem, and similar allegations, and its finding was in each instance that said allegations were untrue. It also found, upon evidence fully developed, that respondent corporation was not at the time of, or prior to the filing of the complaint herein, in competition with the plaintiffs in the territory in which it solicited and did business, to wit, Central and Northern California, but that it confined its field of activity and business transactions to the thirteen counties named in the findings. This finding has become obsolete, inasmuch as respondent stated in the hearing before this court that it had since established an office in the city of San Francisco. This being so, the appeal presents the sole question of unfair competition, which issue was really the controlling one passed on by the trial court, for our consideration.

[11-13] Appellants have argued that the evidence in the record would justify or compel a finding that the respondents have been prompted by a bad or evil intent to design their emblems in the manner described. The court has found that they would not deceive an ordinarily careful person, in the manner and form of the law. If that is so, the act is not unlawful. An uncompleted intent is not actionable. In civil law as well as in criminal law there must be a joint operation of act and intent to constitute an unlawful act. If the act is not unlawful, the intent would not make it so. Every one who enters the field of competition desires and plans to draw custom from his competitors. Unless his acts are unlawful, his avarice is not actionable.

[14] We do not understand that there is any contention on the part of appellants that respondents have ever used the combination of letters AAOA as a separate symbol or emblem. The initial letters have always been a part of the emblems which are before this court as exhibits. In no case are the four letters AAOA inclosed in circles resembling automobile tires, as is the case with the California State Automobile Association, and there can be no contention that the American Automobile Association's emblem in any respect resembles the respondent's emblem in form, or color, or shape, or size. The question presented is one of fact. This court is not permitted to substitute its judgment for that of the trial court where, as here, there is substantial evidence to support the trial court's judgment.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

Action by Karoline J. Neilsen against Nicolai Neilsen and wife. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendants appeal.

SHENK, J.

The plaintiff is the mother of the defendant Nicolai Neilsen. The defendants are husband and wife. In 1920 the plaintiff, then of the age of seventy-five, was the owner of two parcels of real estate in El Dorado county. One was known as the home place and the other as the mountain property. The defendants were then living with the plaintiff on the home place. On April 1, 1920, an agreement was entered into between mother and son, with full knowledge of the son's wife, whereby the title to both properties was conveyed to the son. The consideration of the conveyance was to be the payment to the plaintiff by her son of $6,000 in money; providing a home and support for the plaintiff for the rest of her life; and conducting to conclusion certain litigation in which the plaintiff was involved. The son thereupon placed a mortgage on the home place and from the proceeds of the loan paid the plaintiff $2,000. He also executed to her an unsecured note for $4,000 payable in six years. Thereafter he borrowed $2,600, giving as security a mortgage on the mountain property. In February, 1929, he sold the mountain property for $10,000 to one Kyburz, receiving therefor the sum of $4,000 in cash and a note for $6,000 secured by a mortgage on the property sold. On July 1, 1929, the plaintiff left the home place and has not returned to live with the defendants. This action was commenced about two weeks later to have it declared, pursuant to subdivision 4 of section 1572 and section 2224 of the Civil Code, that the defendants hold the title to the home place as trustees for the plaintiff; and that the defendants hold the $6,000 Kyburz note and mortgage also as trustees for the plaintiff. An injunction to prevent the defendants from disposing of the Kyburz note or further incumbering the home place was also sought.

[1] The court found that a confidential relationship existed between the plaintiff and the defendant son at the time the aforesaid agreement was entered into; that the treatment of the plaintiff by her son was of such a nature as to compel the plaintiff to leave the home place, and that the agreement was entered into by the defendant son without any intention of performing the same. In view of the conflict in the evidence, which was substantial, the findings on these matters may not be disturbed.

By its judgment the court awarded to the plaintiff the sum of $4,000, which was the amount of the unsecured note given by the son to his mother; impressed a trust in favor of the plaintiff on the home place until the money judgment was satisfied; decreed that the $6,000 Kyburz note should be the property of the plaintiff; and directed its assignment to the plaintiff. In its conclusions of law the court stated that, inasmuch as Kyburz had been prevented by the issuance of the injunctive order when the action was commenced from paying the principal or interest on the $6,000 note when the same became due, the principal should not bear interest after that time until the entry of judgment. This latter conclusion was not, however, carried into the judgment.

[2] In support of the appeal from the judgment it is contended that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings of the court. This point, on the record, must be determined adversely to the contention. The statute of limitations is also urged. The determination of this point depended primarily on when the plaintiff first suspected the fraudulent intent on the part of her son. While the evidence is meager on this point, we think there is sufficient to justify the court in finding, under all the circumstances that the plaintiff was not chargeable with notice of the alleged fraud until after the mountain property was sold in February, 1929. This action was commenced thereafter within seasonable time.

[3-5] The defendants complain of the provisions in the conclusions of law relieving Kyburz from paying principal or interest on his mortgage note from the time the injunction order was served on him until the entry of judgment. There are two answers to this contention. In the first place, this order, as above noted, was not carried into the judgment, and cannot be deemed a part thereof; and, secondly, the defendants were in nowise prejudiced by reason thereof, assuming that it was properly made, for the reason that it operated only against the interests of the plaintiff, and she has not taken an appeal therefrom. For the guidance of the parties in the adjustment of the interest on that obligation, we incline to the view and hold that the service of the injunctive order on Kyburz did not have the effect of relieving him of the payment of interest accumulating on the note during the period mentioned. Kyburz is not a party to this action, and the result of the service upon him of the order of injunction was merely to abate the payment of principal and interest to the defendants during the time the injunctive order was in effect and to save him from default on account of nonpayment thereof during the pendency of this action.

The judgment is affirmed.

SHENK, J.

This is an appeal by the defendants from an interlocutory judgment in an action in partition and also from an order made after the entry of the interlocutory judgment refusing to set aside the order confirming the report of the referee.

The plaintiff is the owner of seven-ninths of the real property in question. The defendants Bru are the owners of one-ninth and the defendants Schlaffer are the owners of one-ninth. The complaint is in due form. It alleges, among other things, that the premises are so situated that partition in kind cannot be made without great prejudice to the owners thereof, and prays that, if the court so find, the premises be sold and the proceeds be distributed in due proportion. The defendants answered, denying for lack of information and belief that the property cannot be partitioned in kind without great prejudice to the owners. At the trial all parties were present or represented. The plaintiff introduced evidence in support of the controverted allegation of the complaint. The defendants offered no evidence on the issue at that time, but it was stipulated that the court appoint a sole referee to ascertain and report to the court whether the property could or could not be partitioned without great prejudice to the owners. The referee was appointed and reported to the court that after due notice and in the presence of counsel for all parties he personally inspected and examined the premises and found that partition could not be had without great prejudice to the owners. Thereafter the plaintiff's counsel duly served and filed a notice of motion for an order of court confirming the report of the referee. The motion was noticed for 2 o'clock p. m. on March 14, 1930, in the appropriate department of the Superior Court in Oakland. At the appointed time, the plaintiff appeared with counsel, introduced evidence in support of the referee's report and moved that the report be confirmed. The motion was granted, and on March 21, 1930, the court signed and filed its interlocutory decree ordering the property to be sold and appointing the same referee to conduct the sale. Thereafter defendants' counsel moved the court to set aside the order confirming the report on the ground that the order was taken through defendants' inadvertence, surprise, and excusable neglect as detailed in the affidavit of the defendant Bru confirmed by the affidavit of his counsel. The affidavit of the defendant Bru averred that he and his counsel left their offices in San Francisco in time, so they estimated, to arrive at the Alameda county courthouse at 2 o'clock p. m. on March 14; that because of a delay in traffic they were unable to board the 1:20 p. m. ferryboat, and were compelled to take the 1:40 p. m. boat, which caused them to arrive at the courthouse eighteen minutes after the matter set for 2 o'clock had been heard and determined; that the defendant was prepared to offer testimony to the effect that the property could be partitioned in kind without great prejudice to the owners; and that the market for real estate in the locality was then in such condition that the property could not be sold without great loss to the parties. The motion was denied, and gross abuse of discretion is charged against the trial court in denying the same.

The defendants rely on Fulweiler v. Hog's Back Con. Mining Co., 83 Cal. 126, 23 P. 65, in support of their position. A reading of the opinion in that case at once discloses that the defendants here have fallen far short of the diligence exercised by the defaulting party in that case. When the defendants here found themselves in the predicament disclosed by their affidavits, it would appear to have been an easy matter to have communicated by telephone or telegraph to the court or the clerk thereof the facts causing their delay and requesting that the matter be continued for sufficient time to permit them to be present. No such showing was made. Considering all of the facts appearing in the record, and assuming that the trial court might well have relieved the defendants from their default, we are not prepared to say that the trial court was guilty of such an abuse of discretion as would justify a reversal.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

MAYOCK v. KERR, Registrar of Voters.

S. F. 14743.

Supreme Court of California.

Aug. 4, 1932.

Statutes ⇐35½.

Registrar of voters held justified by self-executing constitutional provision in rejecting initiative petitions without signers' precinct numbers, regardless of statutory provisions (Const. art. 4, § 1; Pol. Code, § 1083a, as amended by St. 1931, p. 805, § 1).

In Bank.

Application by Welburn Mayock for a writ of mandate to compel W. M. Kerr, as Registrar of Voters of the County of Los Angeles, to accept for filing and certification certain sections of an initiative petition without the signers' precinct numbers thereon.

Alternative writ discharged and prayer for peremptory writ denied.

Leslie H. Kranz, Harry A. Goldman, Hugh E. Macbeth, Welburn Mayock, and Rosalind Goodrich Bates, all of Los Angeles, Reeves Aylmore, of Santa Ana, and H. Ross Hubbard, M. Mitchell Bourquin, Leo R. Friedman, and Thomas M. Foley, all of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Everett W. Mattoon, Co. Counsel, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

Petitioner seeks by writ of mandate to compel the respondent as registrar of voters of Los Angeles county to accept for filing and certification certain sections of a petition seeking to place upon the ballot at the next general election an initiative measure relating to the foreclosure of mortgages and trust deeds. The respondent refuses to accept the petition or to certify the names thereon for the reason that there does not appear on the petition the precinct numbers of the respective signers thereof. It is the contention of petitioner that the duty of affixing the precinct numbers rests upon the registrar of voters and not upon the signers or proponents of the petition. Respondent contends that the duty to affix such precinct numbers does not rest upon him, and that he cannot be compelled to certify any names unless such precinct numbers appear on the petition. It should be noted that the respondent has offered to the proponents of the petition a reasonable time within which to place the precinct numbers thereon.

We are of the opinion that the respondent has properly refused to examine the petition and to certify the names thereon, when such precinct numbers do not appear on the face of the petition. The Constitution expressly provides in reference to referendum and initiative petitions (article 4, § 1) that "each signer shall add to his signature his place of residence, giving the street and number if such exist. His election precinct shall also appear on the paper after his name. * * * This section is self-executing, but legislation may be enacted to facilitate its operation, but in no way limiting or restricting either the provisions of this section or the powers herein reserved." Thus the Constitution itself provides that the precinct numbers must appear on the petition, and this must necessarily mean that such precinct numbers must appear on the petition at the time the petition is presented to the registrar of voters. Inasmuch as the Constitution plainly requires this information to appear on the petition, it is needless to speculate as to why the framers of the Constitution saw fit to insert this limitation on the exercise of the right. The provision was probably inserted as a mechanical aid to the registrar of voters in investigating, identifying, and verifying the persons and signatures of the purported signers. See Osborn v. Board of Supervisors, 27 Cal. App. 85, 148 P. 970; Ley v. Dominguez, 212 Cal. 587, 299 P. 713.

It should be noted that the construction or constitutionality of section 1083a of the Political Code, as amended in 1931 (St. 1931, p. 805, § 1), is not involved in this proceeding. That section provides, in part, "Such signer shall at the time so signing such petition or paper affix thereto the precinct, also the date of such signing." In the instant case the respondent does not contend that the signers of the petition must insert the precinct numbers, but simply contends that such precinct numbers must appear on the petitions before he can be compelled to certify the names. Respondent expressly concedes that if such precinct numbers are inserted by the proponents or the signers he will proceed with the examination of the petitions. We are of the opinion that regardless of the provisions of section 1083a of the Political Code, since the constitutional provision above quoted is self-executing, the registrar was justified in refusing to accept the petitions until the precinct numbers appear thereon.

Petitioner relies on the case of Ley v. Dominguez, supra, involving a provision of the city charter of the city of Los Angeles. In that case it was held that the omission of the precinct numbers did not justify the city clerk in refusing to accept certain petitions. That case is not controlling here for several reasons. All that was involved in that case was a city charter provision. The constitutional provision above quoted was not involved. Moreover, in that case the proponents offered to supply the precinct numbers, but the city clerk declined to permit them to do so. In the instant case the proponents have refused to affix the precinct numbers to the petitions.

Petitioner also refers to and relies upon the minute order of this court of July 8, 1932, in the case of Burke v. Backs, L. A. No. 13783, which involved the same point involved in the instant case, and in that case a peremptory writ of mandate was issued directing the proper officer of Orange county to file the petitions. However, as the minute order discloses, the respondent in that case failed to make an appearance and in no way contested the petition. Under those circumstances the court issued the writ based upon the prima facie showing of petitioner. Upon a proper presentation in the instant case, however, we are of the opinion the writ should not issue.

The alternative writ is discharged and the prayer for a peremptory writ is denied.

Court to obtain jurisdiction over action for divorce, must get jurisdiction over res, the marriage status.

4. Divorce ⇐326.

Where record of foreign divorce decree discloses that foreign law was complied with, presumption of validity arises and decree will be recognized unless successfully attacked on jurisdictional grounds.

5. Divorce ⇐327.

Foreign divorce decree may be collaterally impeached by extrinsic evidence showing that foreign court lacked jurisdiction.

6. Divorce ⇐327.

Where husband interposed Pennsylvania divorce decree as defense to wife's action for divorce, plaintiff, on collateral attack, may show that husband's foreign residence was not bona fide.

Husband, by way of affirmative defense to wife's action for divorce, alleged that he secured a divorce from the plaintiff while he was a bona fide resident of the state of Pennsylvania. Record of proceedings in Pennsylvania divorce action disclosed that service on the defendant in that action was secured by means of publication of summons, and that defendant therein did not appear and was not personally served. Defendant therein at all times since marriage of parties was and is a resident of and domiciled in California.

7. Divorce ⇐329.

Foreign divorce decree interposed by husband as defense to wife's action will not be recognized, as matter of comity, if husband obtained decree on false testimony, constituting fraud.

Under the foregoing rule, if one spouse wrongfully lives separate and apart from the other nonoffending spouse, the latter spouse has not subjected his interest in marriage status to the jurisdiction of the foreign court where the offending spouse may be domiciled, and a decree rendered there on constructive service will not be entitled as matter of comity to recognition in California.

8. Divorce ⇐326.

Foreign decree of divorce, interposed by husband as defense to wife's action for divorce, will be recognized, as matter of comity, where husband was innocent of any wrongdoing.

Under the foregoing rule, if one spouse puts it in power of the other, due to his wrongful conduct, to rightfully live separate and apart, and to acquire a new and separate domicile, the wrongdoer must be deemed to have consented to have his interest in the marriage status determined in the state where the nonoffending spouse is domiciled.

9. Judgment ⇐815.

Foreign decree, regular on face, is presumably valid, and burden to prove contrary is on party attacking it.

10. Judgment ⇐818(1).

Foreign decree is always subject to collateral attack on ground petitioning party did not have bona fide domicile in foreign state.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; John J. Allen, Judge.

Action by Theresa Louise Delanoy against Frederick William Delanoy and another. Judgment in favor of the defendants, and the plaintiff appeals.

Reversed.

W. L. Albert, of Oakland, for appellant.

Calkins, Hagar, Hall & Linforth, of Oakland, for respondents.

PER CURIAM.

Plaintiff brought this action against the defendant Frederick William Delanoy for divorce on the grounds of desertion and extreme cruelty. The mother of the above-named defendant was joined as a party defendant because of her claim to certain real property, alleged by plaintiff to be community property. So far as pertinent here the complaint alleges that plaintiff and defendant Frederick Delanoy were married in San Francisco June 30, 1906; that the parties separated March 1, 1926; that there are two children of the marriage; and that defendant husband has the control and possession of certain property alleged to be community property. Plaintiff prays for a divorce, for all the community property, and for alimony.

The defendant Frederick Delanoy answered the complaint and denied all the material allegations thereof, except that he admitted marrying plaintiff in 1906. However, defendant denies that the parties are still husband and wife, alleging by way of affirmative defense that in 1927 while he was a bona fide resident of the state of Pennsylvania he secured a divorce from this plaintiff.

When the case came up for trial, by motion properly made, plaintiff requested an allowance for attorney fees. Defendant opposed this motion on the ground that the parties had been validly divorced in 1927 by the Pennsylvania decree. In support of this contention the defendant offered and there was received in evidence the transcript of the proceedings in the Pennsylvania divorce action. For the purposes of this appeal we will assume that the record is in proper form and shows a compliance with the Pennsylvania statutes. The record shows that service over the plaintiff herein was secured by means of publication of summons. It is admitted that plaintiff herein did not appear in the Pennsylvania action and was not personally served. The trial court in this action permitted the plaintiff to show that the last place the parties lived together as husband and wife was California, and that at all times since the marriage in 1906 the plaintiff herein was and is a resident of and domiciled in California. The trial court then ruled that the plaintiff would be limited in her proof to evidence as to whether or not the residence of defendant herein in Pennsylvania was bona fide. The plaintiff thereupon testified that the husband left the state of California in June, 1924; that she talked to him on the day he left; that he told her he was going to Pennsylvania on business and that he would return in about six months; that he took one of the children with him; that he did not return; that he did not write to her after he left, nor did he ever request her to come to Pennsylvania; that after his departure he sent no money to her; that her husband at no time notified her that he was not coming back to California. The trial court was of the opinion that this evidence was not sufficient to show that the residence of defendant herein in Pennsylvania was not bona fide. The plaintiff herein then offered to prove all of the allegations of her complaint in reference to the charges of desertion and cruelty. The trial court ruled that until it was shown that the Pennsylvania decree was not regularly obtained, the plaintiff would be foreclosed from offering any evidence as to the allegations of her complaint. The effect of the trial court's ruling was to limit plaintiff in her attack upon the Pennsylvania decree to a showing either that the husband's residence in Pennsylvania was not bona fide or that the statutes of that state were not complied with.

[1] Appellant contends that the Pennsylvania decree not having been rendered by a state having personal jurisdiction of her, and Pennsylvania not being the state where the parties last lived together as husband and wife, the divorce decree of that state is not entitled to full faith and credit under the United States Constitution. This is undoubtedly the law. Haddock v. Haddock, 201 U. S. 562, 26 S. Ct. 525, 50 L. Ed. 867, 5 Ann. Cas. 1; Thompson v. Thompson, 226 U. S. 551, 33 S. Ct. 129, 57 L. Ed. 347; Bruguiere v. Bruguiere, 172 Cal. 199, 155 P. 988, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 122. Appellant next contends that such decree not being entitled to full faith and credit, it should not be recognized as a matter of comity, for if recognized it will affect the status of one of our own citizens who had no opportunity to be heard in that action. Respondent husband admits that the Pennsylvania decree is not entitled to full faith and credit, but contends that as a matter of comity such decree should be recognized by this state. The question thus presented is whether or not California will, as a matter of comity, recognize the validity of a foreign decree of divorce rendered against a California citizen on constructive service, and, if so, how far this state will permit a collateral attack on such a decree.

The proper determination of this question requires a brief reference to the development of the law applicable to jurisdiction in divorce actions.

[2, 3] It is universally conceded that a divorce proceeding, in so far as it affects the status of the parties, is an action in rem. 19 Cor. Jur. 22, § 24; 3 Freeman on Judgments (5th Ed.) 3152. It is usually said that the "marriage status" is the res. Both parties to the marriage, and the state of the residence of each party to the marriage, has an interest in the marriage status. In order that any court may obtain jurisdiction over an action for divorce that court must in some way get jurisdiction over the res (the marriage status). The early cases assumed that such jurisdiction was obtained when the petitioning party was properly domiciled in the jurisdiction. Ditson v. Ditson, 4 R. I. 87, is the leading case so holding; see, also, Andrews v. Andrews, 188 U. S. 14, 23 S. Ct. 237, 47 L. Ed. 366. Until 1905 the overwhelming weight of authority was to the effect that, if the petitioning party was domiciled in good faith in any state, that state could render a divorce decree on constructive service valid not only in the state of its rendition, but which would be recognized everywhere. In Atherton v. Atherton, 181 U. S. 155, 21 S. Ct. 544, 45 L. Ed. 794, the United States Supreme Court apparently recognized that doctrine. In that case the parties were living together and domiciled in Kentucky. That state was the last state where the parties lived together as husband and wife. The wife left the husband and came to and became domiciled in

New York. She brought an action for divorce in New York, her husband defending on the ground that he had secured a divorce in Kentucky on constructive service. New York refused to recognize the validity of the Kentucky decree, on the ground that Kentucky could not in such an action affect the status of a citizen of New York. The United States Supreme Court reversed the New York decisions (82 Hun, 179, 31 N. Y. S. 977; Id. 155 N. Y. 129, 49 N. E. 933, 40 L. R. A. 291, 63 Am. St. Rep. 650) and held that the Kentucky decree was entitled to full faith and credit even though the wife was not served with process and did not appear in the Kentucky action, and even though at the time the decree was rendered the wife was a resident of and domiciled in New York. In so holding, however, the court pointed out that the reason the Kentucky decree was entitled to full faith and credit was because Kentucky had jurisdiction over the marriage status by virtue of the fact that that state was the matrimonial domicile, i. e., the last place the parties lived together as husband and wife. Then in 1905, the United States Supreme Court decided the Haddock Case, supra. Here the parties were married and domiciled in the state of New York. The husband, without cause, abandoned his wife and went to and acquired a domicile in Connecticut. Thereafter the husband secured in Connecticut a divorce on constructive service. Several years later the wife sued for divorce in New York, and secured personal service on the husband. The husband set up as a defense the Connecticut decree. New York refused to recognize it. The Supreme Court of the United States held that although the Connecticut decree was probably good in that state, it was without binding force in New York, and was not entitled to full faith and credit. The court pointed out that the matrimonial domicile of the parties was New York, and that in such a case Connecticut had no jurisdiction over the marriage status so as to affect the status of a New York resident. New York could recognize the Connecticut decree, but it could not be compelled to do so under the full faith and credit clause. The result of this decision has been to create a hopeless conflict of authority as to the status of a foreign divorce rendered against a nondomiciled defendant on constructive service. Some courts refuse to recognize foreign decrees so rendered as against their own residents. It should be noted that Pennsylvania, the state rendering the decree involved in the instant case, is a state which refuses to grant any efficacy to a foreign decree secured on constructive service against one of its own citizens, at least where Pennsylvania is the matrimonial domicile. Colvin v. Reed, 55 Pa. 375; Duncan v. Duncan, 265 Pa. 464, 109 A. 220. Other states recognize such decrees to their full extent, permitting them to be attacked solely on jurisdictional grounds. Among this latter group of states there is hopeless conflict of authority as to what constitutes a jurisdictional defect which can be collaterally attacked in a sister state. See 39 A. L. R. 603 and 42 A. L. R. 1405, notes where the cases are exhaustively collected and commented upon.

[4, 5] The policy of the courts of this state seems never to have been exactly defined. It is well settled in this state that, when a foreign divorce decree is relied upon, and the record shows that the foreign law has been complied with, a presumption of validity arises, and, in the absence of a successful attack on the ground the foreign court had no jurisdiction, the foreign decree will be recognized here. However, it is equally well settled that it is always competent to collaterally impeach a decree of divorce rendered in another state by extrinsic evidence showing that the court pronouncing it did not have jurisdiction either of the parties or the subject matter. Thus the decree may always be attacked on the ground that the foreign court had no jurisdiction because the petitioning party was not a bona fide resident, or that the law of the sister state was not complied with. Bruguiere v. Bruguiere, supra; Estate of James, 99 Cal. 374, 33 P. 1122, 37 Am. St. Rep. 60; Estate of Pusey, 180 Cal. 368, 181 P. 648; Estate of Pusey, 177 Cal. 367, 170 P. 846; Estate of Hancock 156 Cal. 804, 106 P. 58, 134 Am. St. Rep. 177; Broder v. Broder (Cal. App.) 10 P.(2d) 182; Anthony v. Tarpley, 45 Cal. App. 72, 187 P. 779; Steinbroner v. Steinbroner, 30 Cal. App. 673, 159 P. 235; In re Culp, 2 Cal. App. 70, 83 P. 89. The courts of this state have not determined whether the foreign decree may be attacked on other grounds. Respondent relies on Estate of James, supra, contending that that case determined that foreign decrees, except as above stated, will be recognized in this state. In that case two persons, Sarah James and Leonora James, claimed to be the widow of the deceased. The evidence showed that the deceased married Sarah in 1859 in New York, which state was the last matrimonial domicile of the parties. The husband, the decedent, left New York and came to Missouri. In 1874 he obtained a divorce in the last-named state on constructive service against Sarah, who was still domiciled in New York. The husband then moved to California and in 1883 married Leonora. Leonora and the decedent lived together in this state until 1887 when the husband died. Both Leonora and Sarah claimed to be the surviving widow. At page 375 of 99 Cal., 33 P. 1122, 1123, the court stated:

"It will be seen from the foregoing statement that the decision of this case must turn upon the question of the validity of the decree of divorce which the deceased obtained in the state of Missouri [and as to what effect shall be given to it in this state].

"While there is some conflict in the decisions upon this point, we entertain no doubt that a decree of divorce which has been regularly obtained in one state, by a citizen thereof, against a nonresident defendant, constructively served with process in the action, and without other notice, and which is valid and effectual in the state in which such decree is rendered, is equally valid in a sister state. [Citing cases.]

"We do not understand the appellant to question this proposition. * * *"

We do not think that this case is authority for the proposition that foreign decrees will be recognized in this state as a matter of comity if valid where rendered, at least in so far as it affects the status of one of our own citizens.

In the first place this decision was rendered in 1893, long before the Haddock Case was decided. The theory of the decision seems to be that the Missouri decree was entitled to recognition under the full faith and credit clause. That theory is of course incorrect.

In the second place the Missouri decree did not affect the status of a California citizen. When the Missouri decree was rendered the wife was a citizen of New York. It is readily conceivable that California might recognize a foreign divorce decree when such decree only affects the status of foreign citizens, but might refuse to recognize such foreign decree when it affects the status of a California citizen. California has no particular interest in the status of foreign citizens. This distinction is well recognized. 19 Cor. Jur., p. 373, § 841.

In the third place the last sentence above quoted clearly indicates that the appellant therein conceded the very point involved in the instant case.

The only other California case necessary to discuss is Bruguiere v. Bruguiere, supra. In this case the parties were domiciled in California. The husband went to Nevada and secured a divorce on constructive service. Both the parties remarried on the faith of the decree. The first wife then got the second marriage annulled, and brought the present action against the first husband for separate maintenance. The court was of the opinion that the husband's residence in Nevada was not bona fide, but as an alternative ground of the decision stated at page 202 of 172 Cal., 155 P. 988, 989:

"The decision in Haddock v. Haddock * * * declares that a husband who without cause, abandons his wife and takes up his residence in another state than that of their residence, thereby changes the matrimonial domicile to the state of his new residence so that a divorce granted in that state on his complaint and upon constructive service only, may be valid in that state, as an adjudication of the res, the res being the marriage relation, but that he does not thereby carry the entire relation to that state so as to make the adjudication binding upon all the states as a judgment in rem, and that, notwithstanding the divorce in Connecticut, the courts of New York could proceed to adjudge another divorce. * * * Upon the principles thus established, it seems clear that the decree obtained by the husband in Nevada is not binding upon the courts of California, even if his residence there was bona fide. * * *

"The invalidity of the Nevada decree is not due to any vice apparent upon the record, but to the policy of the state of California which refuses faith and credit to such a decree."

[6] In the instant case the trial judge properly permitted the plaintiff to introduce evidence tending to show that the residence of her husband in Pennsylvania was not bona fide. For the purposes of this appeal we will assume that the proffered evidence was insufficient, and we will therefore assume that the residence of defendant husband in Pennsylvania was bona fide. The question next presented is whether or not appellant should have been permitted to prove the allegations of her complaint to the effect that the defendant deserted her, and that he was the one that was guilty of cruelty. In other words, although Pennsylvania found in a noncontested action where the wife was not present and had no opportunity to refute the charges, that she was guilty of cruelty, and inferentially found that the husband was the innocent party, can the wife in this state collaterally attack that finding and show that she was the innocent party, and that the husband by means of false testimony secured the divorce in that state? If the wife was in fact the innocent party, would it not constitute a fraud as against her, and a fraudulent evasion of the laws of this state, if this state as a matter of comity should recognize the foreign decree when such decree affects the status of a resident of this state, and such decree was secured on false testimony as to who was the wrongdoer? We think that the Bruguiere Case, above cited, indicates that such evidence should be admitted.

[7-9] So far as the courts of this state are concerned this state has sole and exclusive jurisdiction over the status of those domiciled within its borders. Assuming that the wife can prove the allegations of her complaint, as she offered to do, and can show that she was deserted by her husband, and that he was the one that was guilty of cruelty, and that she was innocent of wrongdoing, if, under such circumstances, this state enforces as against her the Pennsylvania decree, this state will be recognizing a foreign decree secured without the presence of one of its own citizens, affecting the status of one of its own citizens, when such decree was obtained on false testimony. This state would be thus placing its sanction on a fraud committed on the Pennsylvania court. On the other hand, if the evidence shows that the husband left California and went to Pennsylvania due to his wife's fault, and that she was the wrongdoer and that he was innocent of wrongdoing, then we think the true rule to be that this state should, as a matter of comity, recognize the Pennsylvania decree. We think this rule will result in no hardship. The foreign decree, regular on its face, is entitled to a presumption of validity. The burden is on the party attacking it. But if the spouse domiciled in this state can show that the foreign decree was obtained on false testimony amounting to a fraud on the foreign court, the decree will not be recognized. Moreover, we think that, if such proof be made, it can properly be considered as showing a jurisdictional defect in the foreign decree, at least as far as the courts of this state are concerned. As already pointed out, the res involved in a divorce proceeding is the marriage status, in which both parties and the state have an interest. Under the rule above enunciated, in order that a state other than the state of the matrimonial domicile can grant a divorce against a nondomiciled spouse on constructive service which this state will recognize, the foreign state must in some way get jurisdiction over the interest of the nondomiciled spouse in the marriage status. If one spouse puts it in the power of the other, due to his wrongful conduct, to rightfully live separate and apart, and to acquire a new and separate domicile, the wrongdoer must be deemed to have consented (by such wrongful conduct) to having his interest in the marriage status determined in the state where the nonoffending spouse is domiciled. On the other hand, if one spouse wrongfully lives separate and apart from the other nonoffending spouse, the latter spouse has not subjected his interest in the marriage status to the jurisdiction where the offending spouse may be domiciled, and a decree rendered there on constructive service will not be entitled as a matter of comity to recognition here. It therefore follows that evidence as to who is the wrongdoer goes to the jurisdiction of the foreign court.

[10] It is true that under the test above outlined, whether this state will recognize a foreign divorce decree rendered on constructive service against one of its own citizens is made to depend upon the fact of who is the innocent party. But it is also true that it is universally recognized that a foreign decree may always be collaterally attacked on the ground that the petitioning party did not in fact have a bona fide domicile in the foreign state. Both the question of residence and the question of who was the wrongdoer, in our opinion, go to the jurisdiction of the foreign court.

The rule adopted in this opinion is the rule that has been adopted in some of the most recent and best reasoned cases. In Dean v. Dean, 241 N. Y. 240, at page 245, 149 N. E. 844, 846, 42 A. L. R. 1398, Judge Cardozo states the rule as follows: "The wife, domiciled in Canada, and there abandoned by her husband, became by her marriage a party to a relation which the courts of Pennsylvania have attempted to destroy. They have done this, though there has been no submission to the jurisdiction by her, upon the basis of a domicile which the erring husband has wrongfully set up apart from her. We think the judgments of this court leave no escape from the conclusion that, according to the standards of justice prevalent among us, injustice would be done if that attempt were to prevail."

See, also, Wagoner v. Wagoner, 287 Mo. 567, 229 S. W. 1064; Montmorency v. Montmorency (Tex. Civ. App.) 139 S. W. 1168, at page 1171; 39 Harvard Law Review, 417. It should also be mentioned that the test adopted in this opinion is the one adopted by the American Law Institute in the Restatement of the Law of Conflict of Laws (1930), § 119.

There is a strong public as well as private interest in the marriage relationship. As a matter of policy and justice it can hardly be gainsaid that California should not place its sanction on a foreign divorce decree which adversely affects the status of one of its own citizens, and which, incidentally, if recognized in the instant case, will cut off the wife's right to alimony and support, if the spouse domiciled here can show that she was innocent of wrongdoing and that the Pennsylvania decree was secured on false testimony. If one spouse may pick out a state far removed from the matrimonial domicile and acquire a residence there, and then get a divorce on constructive service on testimony which is false, and, if this court should hold that such decree must be recognized in this state so as to terminate the marriage relationship of a spouse domiciled here, when the resident spouse was innocent of wrongdoing, this court would be aiding and abetting the fraud practiced on the foreign court and on the resident here. This we are not inclined to do.

It is, therefore, our opinion that it was error for the trial court to prevent appellant from proving, if she could, that the respondent husband deserted her, and that he was the one guilty of cruelty. For that reason the judgment appealed from must be reversed. This conclusion makes it unnecessary to consider the other contentions advanced by appellant for the reason that all property rights of the parties may be determined on the retrial.

The judgment appealed from is reversed.

WASTE, C. J.

Plaintiff appeals from an adverse judgment entered in this action to foreclose a chattel mortgage. Defendant Coffin failed to appear in the action, and her default was duly entered.

It appears from the evidence that one Max Rosenberg advanced to plaintiff and her husband the necessary money with which to purchase the lease and furnishings of a certain hotel. After conducting the establishment for a time, plaintiff sold the lease and furnishings to defendant Julia A. Coffin for $2,800, the purchaser paying $1,200 in cash and giving her note and chattel mortgage on the furnishings for the $1,600 balance, which balance at the time of the trial had been reduced to $1,400. The note and mortgage bear date July 12, 1927, and because of Rosenberg's financial backing in the undertaking plaintiff had them run in his favor. On July 12, 1929, the note was indorsed over to the plaintiff. Such transfer of the indebtedness carried the security with it as an incident thereto. Section 2936, Civ. Code; Adler v. Sargent, 109 Cal. 42, 48, 41 P. 799. At the time of its execution and delivery the mortgage failed to comply with the provisions of section 2957 of the Civil Code, in that it was not then accompanied by the usual "good faith" affidavit nor was it then recorded. Subsequently, and about July 6, 1928, Mrs. Coffin, the purchaser and plaintiff's mortgagor, sold the lease and furnishings to the defendant Burns for $1,600, the latter paying $400 in cash and executing and delivering her note and chattel mortgage to Mrs. Coffin to secure the balance. The bill of sale running from Mrs. Coffin to the defendant Burns was duly recorded on July 6, 1928. It was after this that plaintiff's mortgage was made to comply with section 2957, supra, and thereupon recorded. It necessarily follows, therefore, that defendant's bill of sale, though subsequent in point of time, takes priority over and is not subject to plaintiff's chattel mortgage, unless it appears that defendant had actual knowledge of the existence of plaintiff's mortgage at the time she purchased the lease and furnishings from plaintiff's mortgagor. It is well settled that an unrecorded chattel mortgage, or one failing to comply with the terms of section 2957, supra, is "nevertheless valid between the parties * * * and persons who, before parting with value, have actual notice thereof." Sec. 2973, Civ. Code; Wolpert v. Gripton (Cal. Sup.) 2 P. (2d) 767.

[1] Upon the issue of knowledge, the trial court found that defendant "had no knowledge or information or notice, actual or constructive, of the existence of [plaintiff's] mortgage when she purchased said personal property * * * nor had she any notice, knowledge or information actual or constructive of the claim of plaintiff to said mortgage or property." If there is any evidence in the record to sustain this finding, the judgment for defendant must, of course, be affirmed.

[2] We have examined the record and conclude that the quoted finding is not only unsupported by, but is contrary to, the evidence. The defendant when on the stand denied that the seller, plaintiff's mortgagor, had told her of the existence of a chattel mortgage on the furnishings pending the negotiations for defendant's purchase thereof. She did make the significant statement, however, that "she [the seller] explained that [the existence of plaintiff's chattel mortgage] to Mr. Zimmerman." Zimmerman was the defendant's attorney and representative in the transaction leading up to and resulting in defendant's purchase of the mortgaged property. Defendant also testified that she had heard "rumors" of the existence of plaintiff's chattel mortgage "when I was talking of buying the place," that she thereupon had her attorney investigate the matter, and that she subsequently bought the furnishings "on the strength" of his report that he was unable to find such a mortgage of record.

⇐For other cases see same topic and KEY NUMBER in all Key Number Digests and Indexes

The defendant's attorney, when called to the stand, testified that his client (the defendant) and Mrs. Carson (the real estate broker who handled the deal) met at his office to discuss the purchase of the lease and hotel furnishings; that "there was mention made of an indebtedness existing, previous indebtedness, * * * from Mrs. Coffin [the seller] to Mrs. Treat [plaintiff], or to Mr. Rosenberg [plaintiff's financial backer], as the case might have been. * * * They talked about the chattel mortgage, but I was never able to have the chattel mortgage produced to me." He also testified that, when his client was about to consummate the deal, he telephoned the plaintiff relative to the chattel mortgage, and that plaintiff said, "Mr. Rosenberg has that mortgage, you better see him"; that he thereupon communicated with Rosenberg, who was unable to find it among his papers; that he (the witness) thereupon searched the records and found no mortgage on file; that he so advised his client (the defendant), "and she decided to go ahead with the transaction"; that the deal was then closed, and plaintiff thereupon informed that defendant could not find her mortgage of record, and would not therefore "recognize it."

The plaintiff called Mrs. Carson, the real estate broker, in rebuttal, and she testified that the defendant came to her office in response to an advertisement; that she explained the transaction to the defendant, and told her and her attorney of the existence of a chattel mortgage on the furnishings; that it was learned that the instrument was in the office of one Mathews; that defendant's attorney sent her (the witness) to Mathews' office to ascertain if he had possession of the instrument; that she visited Mathews, who, upon interrogation as to the existence of plaintiff's mortgage, held out a paper and said, "Why, this is the mortgage, but I can't show it to you, you have no right to see it"; that she reported to the defendant's attorney of her visit to Mathews' office; that she told him Mathews had possession of the mortgage; that, in drawing up the papers closing the deal by which defendant purchased the mortgaged chattels, defendant's attorney first drafted a set of papers recognizing the existence of plaintiff's mortgage, but substituted therefor a second set which made no mention of plaintiff's mortgage.

The foregoing rebuttal testimony was not denied or contradicted by the defendant or her attorney, the latter, upon being recalled to the stand, merely stating that the real estate broker may have mentioned Mathews to him, he did not recall; that he did not go to see Mathews.

In reviewing the evidence on the issue of defendant's knowledge of the existence of plaintiff's chattel mortgage, we have confined ourselves solely to the defendant's evidence and so much of plaintiff's evidence as stands uncontradicted. The trial court's finding in favor of defendant necessitates such a course. However, we are satisfied that the foregoing evidence conclusively establishes that the defendant and her attorney had actual knowledge of the existence and the amount of plaintiff's chattel mortgage prior to the consummation of the transaction by which the defendant undertook to and did purchase the mortgaged property. This being so, the judgment for the defendant must be reversed. It is immaterial that defendant's efforts to locate the written evidence of such mortgage, of which she had actual knowledge, proved unavailing. The important and determinative feature of the case is that defendant, before undertaking to purchase the hotel furnishings and before advancing any money on the purchase price, was informed or had knowledge of the existence of a lien thereon in favor of the plaintiff.

Judgment reversed.

Supreme Court of California.

Aug. 11, 1932.

Rehearing Denied Sept. 8, 1932.

1. Municipal corporations ⇐864(1).

Installment contracts requiring payments over period of years out of city's ordinary revenue, where each installment is not in payment of consideration furnished that year, and total installments, coupled with other expenditures, exceed yearly income, violate Constitution limiting indebtedness, unless approved by voters (Const. art. 11, § 18, amended in 1926).

2. Municipal corporations ⇐864(4).

Constitutional limitation on municipal indebtedness is not violated by obligation payable only out of special fund, if indebtedness cannot deplete municipality's resources (Const. art. 11, § 18, as amended in 1926).

3. Municipal corporations ⇐864(4).

Municipal obligation payable from special fund constitutes "indebtedness" within constitutional limitation when municipality is obligated directly or indirectly to feed special fund from general revenues (Const. art. 11, § 18, amended in 1926).

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Indebted; Indebtedness," see Words and Phrases.]

4. Municipal corporations ⊜864(4).

Municipality incurs "indebtedness" within constitutional limitation when it may suffer loss if special fund from which indebtedness is payable is insufficient (Const. art. 11, § 18, amended in 1926).

5. Municipal corporations ⊜864(4).

Contract for city pumping plant payable from special fund, created not only from income earned by property purchased, but from entire water system, from which interest and principal of water system bonds constituting general obligation of city were payable, held to create general "indebtedness" within constitutional limitation (Const. art. 11, § 18, amended in 1926).

6. Municipal corporations ⊜864(4).

Installment contract for pumping plant providing for forfeiture of payments made from city's general fund and also payments made from special fund created by income of water system on default in subsequent installments violated constitutional provision limiting indebtedness (Const. art. 11, § 18, amended in 1926).

PER CURIAM.

This action was instituted in the court below by plaintiffs as taxpayers and residents of the city of Santa Cruz. Plaintiffs prayed for a decree directing the delivery into court, for the purpose of cancellation, of a certain contract between the city and Fairbanks, Morse & Company, a corporation; for an injunction preventing the city from making any further payments under the contract, and preventing the defendant city officials from auditing, allowing, or approving any demand or claim based thereon; and for a decree requiring the defendants to repay to the city the sum of $30,000 already paid under the contract. Subsequently the plaintiffs filed an amendment to the complaint, which amendment merely set out with more particularity the transaction which is the basis of this suit. Defendants demurred generally and specially, which demurrers were sustained without leave to amend. Plaintiffs subsequently moved for leave to amend, but this motion was denied on the ground that the complaint as amended could not be further amended so as to state a cause of action. Judgment was thereupon rendered in favor of defendants, and from this judgment plaintiffs have prosecuted this appeal.

Appellants' main contention is that the contract in question violates article 11, section 18, of the state Constitution. In this contention they are assisted by several amici curiæ. So far as pertinent here, article 11, section 18, provides: "No county, city, town, township, board of education, or school district, shall incur any indebtedness or liability in any manner or for any purpose exceeding in any year the income and revenue provided for such year, without the assent of two-thirds of the qualified electors thereof, voting at an election to be held for that purpose."

It is alleged by the plaintiffs that the contract here involved creates an indebtedness or liability in excess of that allowed by the above provision, and that the incurring of such indebtedness or liability was not authorized by a vote of the electors of Santa Cruz. It is admitted by respondents that no such election was had.

The contract in question is pleaded as an exhibit to the complaint, and provides that the respondent Fairbanks, Morse & Company agrees to install a pumping plant for the city at a total cost of $152,960. The complaint alleges that at the time this contract was entered into the city already owned and operated a water system plant supplying water to the inhabitants of the city; that this water distributing system was acquired by the sale of bonds; that the amount of the bonded indebtedness of the city incurred for the purpose of acquiring and maintaining this water system now outstanding is $555,000; that said outstanding indebtedness constitutes a general obligation of the city. It appears from the complaint that in March, 1928, the city council of Santa Cruz by resolution indorsed a plan to acquire a pumping plant to be operated in connection with the existing distributing system. On April 30, 1928, pursuant to a resolution of the council, the city clerk advertised for bids for the pumping plant, said plant to be constructed in accordance with the plans and specifications furnished by the city. This notice provided that the terms of purchase and the time and amount of payments were left to the bidders. It appears that the California Filter Company submitted the lowest bid, but such bid was not accepted for the reason that it called for cash. Respondent Fairbanks, Morse & Co. submitted the bid which was subsequently accepted by the council, and made the basis of the contract involved in this action. By the terms of this contract, as already stated, Fairbanks, Morse & Co. agreed to install the pumping plant at a total cost of $152,960, "less an allowance of nine thousand dollars ($9000) for the equipment specified" by the city in its notice of bids, "in the event that the municipality can legally transfer or sell said equipment to the company." It was provided that $30,000 in cash was to be paid upon commencement of work, and the balance to be paid in sixty equal monthly installments, commencing September 1, 1928, all the installments to be payable on the presentation of claims at maturity of each respective installment. The contract stated that "it is agreed that the obligation to pay the installments hereunder is not a general obligation of the said municipality payable from taxes or its general funds but only a special obligation payable from the Water Development Fund. * * * The municipality covenants to operate the said [water] department in an efficient and economic manner, and to maintain rates for the product or service of said department which will produce sufficient revenue for the payments called for by this contract so far as it may be permitted to do so by law. The municipality agrees to operate said plant as a municipal plant until all installments to become due under this contract have been fully discharged, and until such time shall not dispose of said plant in any manner so as to deprive the company of its title to or interest in machinery or materials without providing for the payments to the company of all installments when due or to become due under this contract."

The contract also provides that the title and ownership of the machinery and materials installed shall remain in the company, and shall retain their character as personal property, until all installments have been paid. It is then provided that, "in the event of a breach of any of the terms and provisions herein contained on the part of said municipality * * * the company shall have and by said municipality is expressly given the right, privilege and option to immediately repossess the machinery, materials and structures herein referred to, in which event the company shall keep and retain any and all installments paid hereunder as and for rental thereof." The city expressly agrees to insure and pay the taxes on the machinery and equipment during the period of the contract.

The contract above outlined was accepted by the city council on May 14, 1928. On the same day the council determined by resolution that the installation of the pumping plant was an emergency measure, for the reason that the existing plant was inadequate. Later the city desired to change the location of the pumping plant. Fairbanks, Morse & Co. agreed to the change providing that the city at its own expense would agree to bear certain expenses connected with the change. This the city agreed to do.

On May 21, 1928, Fairbanks, Morse & Co. presented its claim for $30,000 as and for the cash down payment provided for in the contract. This claim was approved and paid the same day. On May 28, 1928, plaintiffs demanded that the money be repaid, and demanded that the city immediately sue to recover the same. The defendants refused to comply with this request. The original complaint alleges that this sum of $30,000 was paid "out of the public funds of said city of Santa Cruz."

Plaintiffs also pleaded the provisions of Ordinance No. 1287 of the city passed by the council and approved by popular vote in 1923. This ordinance provides that "the rents, income, and receipts from the water system of the said city shall be used solely and exclusively for the operation, maintenance, construction, improvement, extension, enlargement and upkeep thereof and for the payment and liquidation of the principal and interest of any bonded indebtedness now existing, or which may be hereafter created for the operation, maintenance, construction, improvement, extension, enlargement or upkeep of said water system."

On information and belief plaintiffs allege that the necessary and requisite expenditures of the city for the fiscal year from July 1, 1927, to July 1, 1928, inclusive of the total obligation of this contract, exceed the income and revenues of said city of Santa Cruz for said fiscal year. This is conceded to be a fact by respondents.

Essentially the transaction above outlined presents a situation where the city agrees to purchase certain machinery on the conditional sales plan, title to remain in the seller until paid for, and agrees to pay for the same, part in cash and the balance in installments over a period of years, out of a special fund, which fund is created not only by the profits from the property purchased, but contains also the profits earned by the entire water plant of the city. Can a city, when the total amount of such a purchase exceeds its income, enter into such a contract without submitting the same to a vote of the people? Appellants urge that such a contract violates the constitutional provision above quoted.

[1] Appellants take the position that, when the agreement with Fairbanks, Morse & Co. was entered into on May 14, 1928, an immediate liability for the full amount of the contract price—$152,960—came into existence, and that such liability was a general obligation of the city. There can be no doubt that immediately upon entering into the contract a liability arose for the full purchase price. The law is well settled in this state that installment contracts of any kind, where the installment payments are to be made over a period of years and are to be paid out of the ordinary revenue and income of a city, where each installment is not in payment of the consideration furnished that year, and the total amount of said installments, when coupled with the other expenditures, exceeds the yearly income, are violative of the constitutional provision in question unless approved by a popular vote. This is so whether the contract be denominated a mortgage, lease, or conditional sale. Chester v. Carmichael, 187 Cal. 287, 201 P. 925; In re City and County of San Francisco, 195 Cal. 426, 233 P. 965; Mahoney v. San Francisco, 201 Cal. 248, 257 P. 49. It is true that under the doctrine enunciated in McBean v. City of Fresno, 112 Cal. 159, 44 P. 358, 31 L. R. A. 794, 53 Am. St. Rep. 191; Smilie v. Fresno County, 112 Cal. 311, 44 P. 556; Doland v. Clark, 143 Cal. 176, 76 P. 958; California Pacific Title & Trust Co. v. Boyle, 209 Cal. 398, 287 P. 968, contracts for the furnishing of property in the future have been upheld, but only where no liability or indebtedness came into existence until the consideration was actually furnished. In other words, such contracts are valid where each year's installment is within the city's income, and where each year's payment is for the consideration actually furnished that year. This exception to the general rule is well stated in McBean v. Fresno, supra, at page 167 of 112 Cal., 44 P. 358, 361: "We base our views upon the conviction that at the time of entering into the contract, no debt or liability is created for the aggregate amount of the installments to be paid under the contract, but that the sole debt or liability created is that which arises from year to year in separate amounts as the work is performed." This exception can have no application to the case at bar, for the reason that the liability of the city for the entire contract price came into existence at the time the contract was entered into, and the installments were not to be paid each year for the work to be performed in that year. Keeping in mind at all times the allegation of the complaint that the total expenditures required by this contract, if added to the other expenditures of the city for 1927–1928, will exceed the yearly income, it is apparent that the debt or liability created by this contract, constituting, as it does, an immediate liability of the city, violates the constitutional provision, unless that provision does not apply to this type of contract because of the fact that all payments are to be made from the water fund, and are not to constitute a general obligation of the city.

[2] It is the contention of respondents that since by the terms of this contract the indebtedness or liability is made payable solely out of a specified fund created entirely from the income of the water system, and is not a general obligation of the city, the constitutional provision has not been violated. This so-called "special fund" doctrine finds ample support in the decisions of other jurisdictions where constitutional debt limit provisions similar to the one here involved exist. It seems to be the majority rule in other jurisdictions that a limitation upon municipal indebtedness is not violated by an obligation which is payable out of a special fund, if the municipality is not liable to pay the same out of its general funds should the special fund prove to be insufficient, and the transaction by which the indebtedness is incurred cannot in any event deplete the resources of the municipality. 19 R. C. L. 985, § 281; 6 McQuillan, Mun. Corp. (2d Ed.) 45, § 2387. See, also, Fox v. Bicknell, 193 Ind. 537, 141 N. E. 222; Bowling Green v. Kirby, 220 Ky. 839, 295 S. W. 1004; Kelly v. Minneapolis, 63 Minn. 125, 65 N. W. 115, 30 L. R. A. 281; Bell v. City of Fayette, 325 Mo. 75, 28 S.W.(2d) 356; Kasch v. Miller, 104 Ohio St. 281, 135 N. E. 813; McClain v. Regents of University, 124 Or. 629, 265 P. 412; Barnes v. Lehi City, 74 Utah 321, 279 P. 878; State v. Clausen, 134 Wash. 196, 235 P. 364; Franklin Trust Co. v. Loveland, Colo. (C. C. A.) 3 F.(2d) 114. In Feil v. Cœur d'Alene, 23 Idaho, 32, 129 P. 643, 43 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1095, and Miller v. City of Buhl, 48 Idaho 668, 284 P. 843, 72 A. L. R. 682, the Supreme Court of Idaho refused to follow this "special fund" doctrine.

The recent decisions of this court would seem to leave no room for doubt that the "special fund" doctrine has been adopted in this state. In Shelton v. City of Los Angeles, 206 Cal. 544, 275 P. 421, a taxpayer sought to enjoin the city of Los Angeles and the board of water and power commissioners from proceeding with the issuance of certain short-term notes on the ground that the issuance of the notes would violate the constitutional provision here involved. This court held that the constitutional provision was not violated because the notes were not a general obligation of the city, directly or indirectly, but were payable solely and entirely from a special fund. The position taken in the Shelton case has been recently affirmed in the case of In re California Toll Bridge

Authority, 212 Cal. 298, 298 P. 485. In that case not only was the Shelton Case directly affirmed, but at page 302 of 212 Cal., 298 P. 485, 486, the court stated: "The overwhelming weight of judicial opinion in this country is to the effect that bonds, or other forms of obligation issued by states, cities, counties, political subdivisions, or public agencies by legislative sanction and authority, if such particular bonds or obligations are secured by and payable only from the revenues to be realized from a particular utility or property, acquired with the proceeds of the bonds or obligations, do not constitute debts of the particular state, political subdivision, or public agency issuing them, within the definition of 'debts' as used in the constitutional provisions of the states having limitations as to the incurring of indebtedness."

[3, 4] It therefore follows that, if the contract here involved comes within the limits of the "special fund" doctrine, it does not violate the debt limit provision of the state Constitution. In order to determine this question, it is necessary to determine the exact limits and extent of that doctrine. On this phase of the question the decisions of the courts of this state offer no assistance, but in other states this phase of the problem has been frequently considered. An examination of the cases from other jurisdictions establishes the fact that there are at least two well-settled limitations or exceptions to the "special fund" doctrine. Thus it is well established that an indebtedness or liability is incurred when by the terms of the transaction a municipality is obligated directly or indirectly to feed the special fund from general or other revenues in addition to those arising solely from the specific improvement contemplated. It also seems to be well settled, as a second limitation to the doctrine, that a municipality incurs an indebtedness or liability when by the terms of the transaction the municipality may suffer a loss if the special fund is insufficient to pay the obligation incurred.

[5] Appellants and amici curiæ urge that the contract here involved comes within either or both of these exceptions or limitations. With this contention we are inclined to agree. It is to be noted that the complaint alleges that before this contract was entered into the City of Santa Cruz owned its waterworks system, acquired with money raised from the sale of its own bonds. For a history of the method by which this waterworks system was acquired see City of Santa Cruz v. Wykes (C. C. A.) 202 F. 357; Waite v. Santa Cruz, 184 U. S. 302, 22 S. Ct. 327, 46 L. Ed. 552. The complaint alleges that part of the bonds by which the waterworks system was acquired are still outstanding, and that such bonds constitute a general obligation of the city. All moneys collected from the operation of the waterworks system are placed in the water development fund. By the terms of Ordinance No. 1287, above quoted, such fund is to be used solely and exclusively for the "operation, maintenance, construction, improvement, extension, enlargement and upkeep" of the water system, and for the payment of "any bonded indebtedness now existing or which may be hereafter created for the operation, maintenance, construction," etc., of said water system. It is the fund created from the revenue of the entire water system from which the payments on the contract are to be made. In other words, it is not only the income earned by the property purchased that constitutes the special fund from which the payments are to be made, but the income from the entire water system constitutes such special fund. It is obvious that, although the contract provides the payments to Fairbanks, Morse & Co. shall solely be made from this fund, and shall not constitute a general obligation of the city, indirectly such contract does create a general indebtedness or liability of the city. It seems too clear to require further elaboration that, if the water fund be depleted by the payments made to Fairbanks, Morse & Co. for the pumping plant, the fund created for the payment of interest and principal on the bonds will be depleted, and that, since such bonds are a general obligation of the city, the taxpayers must at all times be ready to feed the special fund if the income is not sufficient to pay both the interest and principal on the bonds and the payments to Fairbanks, Morse & Company. It follows, of course, that, when this contract was executed, the taxpayers became indirectly liable to pay the amount thereof. We do not believe that the "special fund" doctrine was ever intended to be applied to a situation where the municipality, directly or indirectly, is or may be compelled to feed the special fund from other revenues in addition to those arising from the special improvement contemplated. Such a subterfuge, if sanctioned would go far to effectually wipe out the purpose and intent of the constitutional provision.

A case very similar to the instant case, likewise involving a Fairbanks, Morse & Co. contract, has been recently decided by the Circuit Court of Appeals, Eighth Circuit—City of Campbell, Mo., v. Arkansas-Missouri Power Co., 55 F.(2d) 560. In that case the action was brought to enjoin the city and Fairbanks, Morse & Co. from carrying out the provisions of a contract for the purchase of certain machinery to be used by the city as a part of its municipal light plant. It appears that at the time the contract was entered into the city, by means of a bond issue approved by the people, already had constructed a distributing system and a power house. The contract with Fairbanks, Morse & Co. was for the purchase of certain machinery for the power plant. The total purchase price of $62,366.40 was to be paid in seventy-two monthly installments, each installment being evidenced by an order providing that said payment was to be made solely out of the light and power fund, and such obligation was not to be a general obligation of the city, "but is a special obligation payable only out of the net revenues of the Light & Power Plant." By the terms of the contract net revenue was defined as the balance of the gross receipts of the power plant after the payment of the legitimate and necessary expenses of the operation of the plant, plus interest on the bond issue, were deducted. It is to be noted that the legal and factual situation presented by the above contract is almost identical with those presented in the instant case. In fact, the contract above outlined presents a situation much stronger in favor of upholding the contract than does the case at bar, for the reason that the specific fund from which the payments were to be made was defined as the fund remaining in the light and power fund after interest on the bonds was deducted, a provision not found in the contract here under consideration. The court held that the contract violated the debt limitation clause in the Missouri Constitution. In so holding the court stated at page 563 of 55 F.(2d): "There is, however, further reason for holding that this contract resulted in creating a debt. The machinery sold to the city, as has been pointed out, does not constitute the entire plant which generates and distributes the electric current and produces the revenue for such service. It required in addition to this machinery the equipment and the power house owned by the city. The purchase price, under the provisions of this contract, is not to come alone from the earnings of the property sold. Under such circumstances, the obligation to pay the income of the property other than that purchased is not different from an obligation to pay with any other funds. Bell v. City of Fayette, 325 Mo. 75, 28 S.W.(2d) 356, 360; Schnell v. City of Rock Island, 232 Ill. 89, 83 N. E. 462, 14 L. R. A. (N. S.) 874; Feil v. City of Cœur d'Alene, 23 Idaho, 32, 129 P. 643, 43 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1095; City of Ottumwa, Iowa, v. City Water Supply Co. (C. C. A.) 119 F. 315, 59 L. R. A. 604; Hesse v. City of Watertown (S. D.) 232 N. W. 53; State v. McMillan, 12 N. D. 280, 96 N. W. 310; Wilder v. Murphy, 56 N. D. 436, 218 N. W. 156.

"The contract in question requires the use of the earnings of the entire property. In Bell v. City of Fayette, supra, the court said: 'It will be noted that the distinction is whether any other property of the city is liable for the payments or whether the purchase price of such improvement is to be paid for wholly out of the earnings of the improvement.'

"Notwithstanding the skillful attempt to evade the constitutional inhibition against the creation of indebtedness, we think it clear that the subterfuge resorted to does not have that effect, and that the lower court properly held that the contract was void."

The reasoning of the Supreme Court of Illinois in the case of Schnell v. City of Rock Island, 232 Ill. 89, 83 N. E. 462, 14 L. R. A. (N. S.) 874, is also applicable here. In that case at page 464 of 83 N. E. the court stated: "In this case the entire proceeds of the existing waterworks system were pledged to secure payment of the certificates, and they created an indebtedness against the city. The case is not like that of Village of East Moline v. Pope, 224 Ill. 386, 79 N. E. 587, where the scheme was to erect and establish a new system of waterworks. It was there said, in accordance with the principles of City of Joliet v. Alexander, 194 Ill. 457, 62 N. E. 861, that if nothing but the income from the waterworks had been pledged, or could be reached, the bonds would not create a debt, and in that case relief was granted because of the provision for a special tax.' A city may acquire a system of waterworks by pledging the income until it shall pay for the system, and no indebtedness is created. The same rule might apply to some definite extension of waterworks where the income of the extension could be separated and applied to payment, but an obligation to pay with the income of property already owned by a city is not different from an obligation to pay with any other funds, so far as the question whether the transaction amounts to a debt is concerned."

The logic of these cases, and of the cases cited by the Federal Circuit Court, seems unescapable. The contract here involved is not payable solely from the income of the improvement contemplated, but is payable from the revenues of the entire water system. Part of those revenues can, and in fact must, be applied to the payment of the interest and principal on the bonds which is a general obligation of the city.

The respondents attempt to distinguish the cases above cited on the ground that in the above cases it does not appear that there was a city ordinance similar to Ordinance No. 1287 of the city of Santa Cruz requiring that all the revenue of the water plant must go into the water development fund which can only be used for the maintenance, upkeep, construction, and repair of the water plant. The argument proves too much. By the very terms of the ordinance relied upon, as above quoted, the revenue from the water plant is likewise to be used to pay the interest and principal on the bonds, which are general obligations of the city. If this fund is depleted, the obligation to feed the fund will fall upon the taxpayer. Respondents state: "The money in the special fund cannot be placed in the general fund, nor used for charges to be met from tax-raised funds." Such a contention is directly in the face of the terms of the ordinance relied on by respondents, because that ordinance specifically states that the money in the water fund shall be used to pay a general obligation of the city; namely, the interest and principal on the bonds.

[6] For still another reason we are of the opinion that the contract here involved must be held violative of the constitutional provision. It will be remembered that the contract provides for an immediate cash payment of $30,000, which was paid according to the allegations of the complaint "out of the public funds of said city of Santa Cruz." This positive allegation may have been weakened by the amendment to the complaint, although we do not think that this is so, but certainly there was nothing in the contract which required the city to make this payment from the water fund. The city also agreed to pay the taxes and insurance on the property, and to pay certain expenses caused by the change in the location of the pumping plant, all apparently out of the general funds. It is true that, when these payments were made, and probably when the future payments are made for each item, such payments themselves will not constitute a violation of the constitutional provision. This is so because it is admitted that the $30,000 payment was made from funds on hand during the year 1927–1928, and such payment, when added to the other expenditures of the city for 1927–28, did not exceed the revenue for that year. The payments for taxes and insurance can probably be made out of the revenue of the year in which they are made. But by the provisions of the contract all these payments, as well as the installment payments made from the special fund, will be forfeited to Fairbanks, Morse & Co. if the payments called for by the conditional sales contract are not made when due. In other words, the effect of a default under the contract would be to take from the taxpayers money paid by them from their general funds. It seems clear that, after a large cash payment has been made out of the general funds, if the special fund is not sufficient to pay the installments, and a failure will result in the losing of the cash payment as well as the installments, as a practical matter the installments will have to be paid from the general fund in order to protect the investment already made. It was in reference to such a practical argument that this court stated in the case of In re City and County of San Francisco, supra, at page 438 of 195 Cal., 233 P. 965, 969: "It also quite clearly appears that the so-called option on the part of the municipality to purchase the said property becomes in effect an increasing compulsion upon it to consummate such purchase, since not to do so would result in the irrevocable loss to the municipality, not only of the primary and succeeding annual payments, which it is bound to make under this agreement, but also of the entire usufruct of the property during the period of its occupation, and also of the property itself." So in the case at bar failure to make the installment payments would result in the loss of not only the installment payments, but also in the loss of the $30,000 and other sums not made payable from the special fund. The practical compulsion to protect the investment by making the payments from the general fund if the special fund prove insufficient constitutes, in our opinion, a violation of the constitutional provision in fact. It is no answer to say that the $30,000 was paid and the other payments for taxes, insurance, etc., will be made from the special fund. The contract does not so provide.

We are not unmindful of the arguments of expediency and necessity advanced by respondents, but we are of the opinion that such arguments are not sufficient to uphold this contract. The constitutional provision involved is based on sound public policy. Arguments of convenience, of policy, or of present necessity, should not be allowed by loose construction to weaken the force or limit the extent of the debt limit provisions.

Inasmuch as we are of the opinion that the contract involved violates the constitutional provision, we do not find it necessary to discuss the many other points raised and discussed by the litigants.

For the reasons heretofore stated, the judgment appealed from is reversed.

A. PALADINI v. DURCHMAN.

Sac. 4558.

Supreme Court of California.

Aug. 9, 1932.

Rehearing Denied Sept. 8, 1932.

1. Shipping ⇐30½.

Evidence established that "bill of sale" of boat was mere chattel mortgage (Civ. Code, § 2924).

The fact that plaintiff was given momentary possession of the boat on completion of the terms of the agreement, and that it was thereafter registered in plaintiff's name as owner, did not alter the character of transaction as between the parties as being a chattel mortgage, since it was given as security for repayment of money expended by plaintiff in purchasing and installing engine in boat and otherwise equipping it, and contract therefore could not operate as transfer of title to the property.

2. Shipping ⇐30½.

That instrument may not comply with legal requirements for execution of chattel mortgage is immaterial as between parties thereto (Civ. Code, § 2973).

3. Shipping ⇐32.

Oral understanding that chattel mortgagee might take possession of boat if mortgagor breached agreement held not "authorization" required by statute to entitle mortgagee to take possession on mortgagor's breach (Civ. Code, § 2927).

Such oral agreement did not furnish authorization required by statute because such understanding was necessarily incidental to, and inseparably connected with, that portion of agreement which attempted to cut off debtor's equity of redemption, and was therefore void in toto.

WASTE, C. J.

Defendant appeals from the judgment entered in an action brought by plaintiff to recover the possession or the value of a certain boat. The complaint contains the usual allegation of plaintiff's ownership and right to immediate possession and defendant's wrongful withholding thereof. Defendant in his answer denied all of the allegations of the complaint.

In 1926 the defendant was the owner of the hull of the fishing boat involved herein. It was defendant's desire to procure an engine and other equipment to outfit the boat for fishing purposes. With this in view he entered into negotiations with the plaintiff, with the result that it installed in the boat an engine and such other equipment as from time to time was required to efficiently operate the same for fishing purposes. In consideration therefor defendant executed and delivered to plaintiff a "bill of sale" purporting to transfer to it all of his right, title, and interest in and to the boat. The boat was thereupon registered in plaintiff's name. Contemporaneous with the execution of the written instrument, and as part of the same transaction, it was orally agreed between the parties that defendant might purchase the boat, engine, and equipment from plaintiff for $3,100. In furtherance thereof it was also orally agreed that defendant should deliver all fish caught by him to plaintiff, two-thirds of the value of which was to be returned to defendant, and the remaining one-third credited against the amount owing by him to plaintiff for current expenses (gasoline, bait, etc., furnished by plaintiff), and the balance, if any, to be applied as payment on the boat account. Plaintiff reserved the right to repossess itself of the boat in the event of defendant's failure to comply with the terms of his oral agreement to deliver to it all fish caught by him.

Alleging that defendant had repeatedly breached his agreement by failing to deliver his entire catch of fish to it, plaintiff brought this action to recover possession of the boat or its value. The court below found for plaintiff, and entered judgment accordingly. There is ample evidence in the record to sustain the finding that defendant had breached his agreement to deliver all fish caught by him to plaintiff. However, the evidence is insufficient to support the finding that plaintiff is the owner of the boat and therefore entitled to the exclusive immediate possession thereof.

[1] We are satisfied that the purported "bill of sale" legally constitutes nothing more than a chattel mortgage given as security for the repayment of the money expended by plaintiff in purchasing and installing an engine and otherwise equipping and supplying defendant's boat for fishing expeditions. The testimony of plaintiff's manager amply supports our conclusion in this particular. He testified in part:

"Mr. Beamer: Q. At the time that you drew up this bill of sale for Mr. Durchman, it was your intention at the time that that should be security for this engine? A. That that bill of sale was to be security for the payment of the engine? * * *

"Q. The bill of sale from Mr. Durchman to you was intended to be security for the payment of the engine? A. For the whole bill; there was more than the engine at that time. There was $3100 at that time that the bill of sale was made out.

"Q. Then the bill of sale at the time it was made out was intended as security for the payment of that money? A. It was.

"Q. In other words it would take the place of the usual mortgage? A. No, we didn't figure it would take the place of a mortgage.

"Q. You figured that the only interest that the Paladini Fish Company had in that boat was what Mr. Durchman owed you? A. Yes. We fiured that the money that we had in the boat we had that security for it.

"Q. And if Mr. Durchman went down the next day you would give him the bill of sale back? A. Yes."

[2] Clearly such a contract, even though plaintiff refused to take an agreement which was a mortgage in form, could not operate as a transfer of title to the property. Civ. Code, § 2924; Fraser v. Sheldon, 164 Cal. 165, 172, 173, 128 P. 33; Bonestell v. Western Auto-Motive Finance Corp., 69 Cal. App. 719, 723, 232 P. 734; Forrest v. Burt, 67 Cal. App. 564, 569, 227 P. 949; Blodgett v. Rheinschild, 56 Cal. App. 728, 736, 206 P. 674. Fraser v. Sheldon, supra, is substantially on all fours with the present case. The fact that plaintiff was given momentary possession of the boat upon completion of the terms of the agreement, and that it was thereafter registered in plaintiff's name as owner, does not alter the character of the transaction as between the parties. The evidence discloses that the bill of sale or transfer was primarily intended to serve as security for plaintiff's disbursements on defendant's behalf. This being so, we must regard it as a chattel mortgage. The fact that an instrument may not comply with the legal requirements for the execution of a chattel mortgage is immaterial as between the parties thereto. Section 2973, Civ. Code; Wolpert v. Gripton (Cal. Sup.) 2 P.(2d) 767.

[3] The legal title to the boat, therefore, remained in the defendant, and the plaintiff has merely a lien for the amount owing to it. It necessarily follows that plaintiff is not entitled to possession unless authorized by the express terms of the mortgage. Section 2927, Civ. Code. The oral understanding of the parties that the plaintiff might take possession of the boat in the event of defendant's breach of agreement to deliver his entire catch of fish to plaintiff cannot furnish such authorization, for such provision or understanding was necessarily incidental to, and inseparably connected with, that portion of the agreement "which attempts to cut off the debtor's equity of redemption, and must therefore be held void in toto." Bonestell v. Western Auto-Motive Finance Corp., supra, 69 Cal. App. 723–726, 232 P. 734, 736; Blodgett v. Rheinschild, supra.

It follows from what has been said that the judgment must be reversed. We therefore find it unnecessary to discuss many other points urged in the briefs of the parties.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to the trial court to take any further evidence and permit such further or amended pleadings as may be necessary to enable it to render judgment in accordance with the conclusions reached herein.

VOWINCKEL v. N. CLARK & SONS.

S. F. 14331.

Supreme Court of California.

Aug. 3, 1932.

Rehearing Denied Sept. 2, 1932.

1. Nuisance ⇐33.

Evidence sustained finding that defendant's operation of factory for manufacturing sewer pipes, tile, pottery, and stoneware caused great and irreparable damages to adjoining owner.

2. Appeal and error ⇐931(1).

Appellate court must presume that trial court gave due consideration to all contentions brought to its attention.

3. Nuisance ⇐35.

Court will not enjoin conduct of defendant's entire business not nuisance per se, if less measure of restriction will afford plaintiff relief to which entitled.

4. Nuisance ⇐25(2).

Injunction against nuisance will not be denied solely on ground that injury suffered by defendant will be greater, if injunction be granted, than injury to plaintiff if injunction be refused.

5. Nuisance ⇐33.

Evidence held to justify injunction abating operation of four out of eighteen kilns operated for manufacturing sewer pipes, tile, pottery, and stoneware.

Defendant contended that all infringements on plaintiff's rights could be eliminated by erection of a fireproof sound-absorbing wall inclosing the four kilns ordered to be abated as well as the other kilns, and an offer to construct such a wall, with sliding doors to permit loading, was made on defendant's motion for a new trial, and testimony of engineers and samples of materials proposed to be used were produced on the hearing of the motion. Trial court's refusal of such motion and offer did not constitute prejudicial error, in view of the showing that, though fire hazard and flares might be thereby reduced, nuisance arising from great vibration and noise could not be eliminated because of location and character of property with respect to plaintiff's dwelling.

6. Nuisance ⇐33.

Evidence supported finding that factory as operated constituted fire hazard to adjoining owner's dwelling and other buildings.

7. Nuisance ⇐25(1).

That defendant legally operated factory with municipality's consent, in district zoned for industry, and was first in field, were no defenses to adjoining owner's action to enjoin nuisance (Civ. Code, § 3479).

⇐For other cases see same topic and KEY NUMBER in all Key Number Digests and Indexes

8. Nuisance ⇐25(1).

That other sources of possible discomfort to plaintiff existed in neighborhood was no defense to action to enjoin nuisance.

Facts disclosed that, in addition to defendant's factory for manufacturing sewer pipes, tile, pottery, and stoneware on premises adjoining plaintiff, plaintiff also had for his neighbors an airport on the north and a busy railroad right of way on the south.

9. Nuisance ⇐7.

Adoption of most approved appliances and methods of production will not justify continuance of nuisance.

10. Limitation of actions ⇐55(6).

Operation of factory in manner constituting nuisance, being of continuing character, statute of limitations was inapplicable to action for injunctive relief.

Record showed that at no time did the plaintiff consent to defendant's acts, but that, on the contrary, his course of conduct was a continuous objection to defendant's operations.

PER CURIAM.

This is an appeal from a judgment for the plaintiff in an action to enjoin the defendant's operation of its factory as a nuisance and for damages.

For more than forty years prior to the trial of this action the defendant has conducted a business of manufacturing sewer pipe, tile, pottery, and stoneware on its property consisting of about 11 acres fronting on the north side of Pacific avenue in the city of Alameda. It is conceded that the property of the defendant at all times herein was zoned as industrial and was within what was considered a partly industrial and partly residential section of the city of Alameda. About seventeen and a half years after the commencement of the defendant's operations, the plaintiff purchased the improved residence property consisting of about 6 acres adjoining the defendant's property on the west. On the plaintiff's land there were a family dwelling and some other buildings to which plaintiff added by a virtual reconstruction thereof involving an investment of from $50,000 to $60,000. The plaintiff is a practicing physician and at all times since its purchase, with the exceptions hereinafter noted, with his assistants and household, has occupied said property as a residence.

In November, 1906, when portions of the factory had been reconstructed after the earthquake of April, 1906, the plaintiff brought an action to enjoin the operation of the factory. The result of that action was an injunctive order that the defendant cease operating its kilns and furnaces unless it raise its main chimney to a height of at least 150 feet. The defendant since said time has maintained said chimney at the height so required.

In 1915 the plaintiff joined the German Red Cross Service as a physician and surgeon and returned to his home in 1922. In 1917 the main building of the defendant's factory was destroyed by fire. After that time it was rebuilt and has increased and expanded from eight kilns and furnaces, inclosed within the brick building which burned in 1917, to eighteen kilns and furnaces constructed in the open except for a corrugated iron roof built over them. A battery of nine of these kilns is placed along and about 20 feet from the fence dividing the plaintiff's and the defendant's properties, and with the opening of the furnaces facing outward. The four most southerly of this battery of kilns are placed practically opposite to and southerly from the plaintiff's dwelling. Since 1917, two other fires have occurred on the defendant's premises, at least one of which caused damage to the fence and trees between the properties, and burned the grass in the rear of the plaintiff's lot. The factory is operated day and night and on Sundays and holidays.

The complaint alleged injuries to and continued discomfort and interference with the peaceable enjoyment of the plaintiff's property by reason of the discharge of large quantities of noxious soot, smoke, and malodorous and injurious gaseous substances; vibrations and noise caused by the operations of the kilns and furnaces and of freight cars on the railroad switch in front of the westerly battery of kilns; light disturbances or flares at night caused by the successive combustions in the oil-burning furnaces along the dividing fence; and danger by reason of the fire hazard alleged to exist. The plaintiff sought an injunction to restrain the conduct of the defendant's business in such wise as to interfere with the peaceable enjoyment of his property, and damages in the sum of $20,000. During the course of the trial and pursuant to a stipulation of the parties the trial court viewed the premises, and the plant of the defendant while it was in operation, in the absence of the parties and their counsel.

The court found untrue the allegations of the complaint relating to the emission of filthy and noxious smoke, soot and gas, the maintenance of the railway switch, and the injuries resulting to the plaintiff thereby. The court found, however, that the manner of operation of the kilns and furnaces and the combustion of the fuel therein causes great vibration and noise disturbing to the peace and quiet of the plaintiff and his household, and together with the flares resulting therefrom, prevent the plaintiff from the comfortable use and enjoyment of his property and are offensive to the senses of persons living upon the property of the plaintiff; and that one of the plaintiff's buildings, formerly occupied by help, has become uninhabitable by reason of such vibration and noise and the flares of light from the furnaces. The findings also recite that the operation of said kilns and furnaces is the source of an extraordinary fire hazard found to exist. It was also found that damage to the plaintiff was incapable of ascertainment and that full relief would be accorded to the plaintiff by the issuance of an injunction to the extent hereinafter stated; that any former action between the parties did not constitute an estoppel against the plaintiff inasmuch as the nuisance was continuing in its nature; that the plaintiff was not guilty of laches in bringing the action, nor was the cause of action barred by the statute of limitations.

The judgment decreed that the defendant be enjoined from operating the four southerly kilns and furnaces on the westerly side of its property, and from operating the remaining kilns and furnaces on the westerly side of its property and northerly of said four southerly furnaces unless and until it shall erect between said northerly furnaces and the property of the plaintiff a substantial fireproof wall or fence at least 15 feet in height.

Except as to the one particular hereinafter mentioned, the defendant does not contend that the factory as operated does not constitute a nuisance to the plaintiff, but its contention that the findings are unsupported by the evidence is based upon the presence in the record of the following undisputed facts: That the defendant had operated its pottery and tile factory seventeen and one-half years before the plaintiff had purchased and established his home on the adjoining property; that the factory was then in full operation, which the plaintiff knew, and that the plaintiff must also have known or be presumed to have known that the business of the defendant would increase and that its operations would necessarily expand and its facilities enlarge; that the site selected for the factory is and always has been an industrial section on the outskirts of Alameda on marshy and filled ground; that it has operated by permission of the municipal authorities for nearly a half century; that on recently filled land immediately north of the plaintiff's and the defendant's properties has been established the San Francisco Airdrome, where airships are continuously causing noise during the day and night; that 20 acres of land adjoining the defendant's property have been acquired by the Belt Railroad of Alameda upon which to pursue its railroad activities; that immediately adjoining the plaintiff's property on the west is a commercial vegetable garden; and that a short distance to the west are 1,000 acres of tide land recently deeded by the city of Alameda to the United States to be used as an army base, and adjoining these tide lands on the west is the Alameda Airport; that one of the main lines of the Southern Pacific Company for the carriage of both passengers and freight, operating trains every half hour during the day and frequently during the night up to 12 o'clock, passes in front of the plaintiff's property on Pacific avenue; and that the plaintiff keeps on his own property fifteen to twenty police dogs, and at times has kept thereon sheep, rabbits, geese, and other animals and fowl.

The defendant urges that it operates its business in the most careful and prudent manner; that its kilns and furnaces are of the most modern type of construction; that the defendant's properties represent an investment of $400,000 to $500,000 as compared to the $50,000 or $60,000 invested by the plaintiff; that the defendant employs constantly about 230 to 240 men with an annual pay roll of about $270,000; that the four kilns ordered abated represent an investment of about $30,000; and that a cessation of operations as to those kilns will result in laying off thirty or forty employees.

[1, 2] The defendant contends that the court gave no consideration to the great damage that will be sustained by the defendant if its kilns are abated as compared with the slight injury that may be sustained by the plaintiff by their operation. Leaving for later discussion the question whether that contention may properly be made in this case, and bearing in mind that the court did not wholly abate the defendant's conduct of its factory, it is significant that the trial court did not find that the injury to the plaintiff was trivial or slight, but on the contrary found that it was great and irreparable. We do not discover the state of the record to be such as to warrant a holding that that finding is not supported by the evidence. All of the matters argued by the defendant as grounds for its contention were brought to the attention of the trial court, and it must be presumed that the court gave them due consideration in arriving at its conclusion.

We know of no precedent, and the defendant cites none, for holding that the character of injury involved here is not the result of an invasion of a distinct private right and such as to make applicable the doctrines stated in Hulbert v. California, etc., Cement Co., 161 Cal. 239, 118 P. 928, 38 L. R. A. (N. S.) 436; Judson v. L. A. Suburban Gas Co., 157 Cal. 168, 106 P. 581, 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 183, 21 Ann. Cas. 1247; Fendley v. City of Anaheim, 110 Cal. App. 731, 294 P. 769; Williams v. Blue Bird Laundry Co., 85 Cal. App. 388, 259 P. 484, and McIntosh v. Brimmer, 68 Cal. App. 770, 230 P. 203. We are mindful of the fact that the opinion of Melvin J., in the case of Hulbert v. California, etc., Cement Co., supra, was not concurred in by a majority of the court, and that the case involved a petition for a writ of supersedeas to stay the force of the prohibitive injunction pending the appeal on the merits. Nevertheless, the views therein expressed on the so-called doctrine of comparative injuries or "balance of hardship" were adopted by this court in the later case of People v. Selby Smelting & Lead Co., 163 Cal. 84, 94, 124 P. 692, 1135, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 1267, which involved the merits of the judgment.

[3] In the present case the court appears to have given due consideration to the situation of the defendant. This is apparent from the fact that it refused to abate entirely the defendant's operations and granted the relief sought to the extent necessary to preserve the rights of both parties. In other words the court in the exercise of its equity powers, has compared consequences and has considered the injuries resulting to each party, on the one hand if the injunction be wholly denied, and on the other if it be granted. The court, from the evidence presented, gave heed to the rule that in a proper case it will not enjoin the conduct of the defendant's entire business, where such business is not a nuisance per se, if a less measure of restriction will afford to the plaintiff the relief to which he may be entitled. McMenomy v. Baud, 87 Cal. 134, 26 P. 795; Tuebner v. Cal. St. R. R. Co., 66 Cal. 171, 4 P. 1162; Williams v. Blue Bird Laundry, 85 Cal. App. 388, 259 P. 484; McIntosh v. Brimmer, 68 Cal. App. 770, 230 P. 203.

[4] The defendant nevertheless, seeks to invoke the foregoing rule as a basis for the reversal of that part of the injunction which abates four of its kilns. Unless under the rule and the record presented we are led to the conclusion that the plaintiff could be afforded all the relief to which he was entitled by a modification of the injunction in this respect, we must say that the contention is answered by the doctrine of the cases of American Smelting & Refining Co. v. Godfrey (C. C. A.) 158 F. 225, 14 Ann. Cas. 8, and Sullivan v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Co., 208 Pa. 540, 57 A. 1065, 66 L. R. A. 712, adopted and followed in our decisions. Hulbert v. California Cement Co., supra; People v. Selby Smelting & Lead Co., 163 Cal. 84, 94, 124 P. 692, 1135, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 1267; Judson v. L. A. Suburban Gas Co., 157 Cal. 168, 106 P. 581, 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 183, 21 Ann. Cas. 1247; Peterson v. City of Santa Rosa, 119 Cal. 387, 51 P. 557. Extensive quotations from those cases appear in Hulbert v. California, etc., Cement Co., supra, at pages 247–249 and 252, 253 of 161 Cal., 118 P. 928. The doctrine as disclosed by those cases may be stated to be that, where a right of the plaintiff has been invaded by the maintenance of a nuisance, and the plaintiff has suffered injury therefrom, an injunction which results in the abatement of the defendant's operations will not be denied solely on the ground that the injury suffered by the defendant will be greater, if the injunction be granted, than the injury suffered by the plaintiff if the injunction be refused.

[5, 6] The defendant contends that all of the infringements upon the plaintiff's rights can be eliminated by the erection of a fireproof sound-absorbing wall inclosing also the four kilns ordered abated. An offer to construct such a wall, with sliding doors to permit loading, was made upon the defendant's motion for a new trial; and testimony of engineers and samples of materials proposed to be used were produced on the hearing of the motion. The trial court, however, declined the offer and denied the motion for a new trial. This ruling is claimed to be prejudicial error and we are urged to reverse or modify the judgment on the ground that the proposed wall will give to the plaintiff all the relief to which he is entitled. But we are not persuaded that the court abused its discretion in denying the motion. The court itself viewed the premises, and although it may have been shown that the wall might tend to reduce the fire hazard and flares, nevertheless the denial of the motion is persuasive that the court remained unconvinced that either the vibrations or noise would be diminished or eliminated. The character of the property abated, and its location with respect to the plaintiff's dwelling, together with the finding that its operation causes great vibration and noise disturbing to the plaintiff and his household, is conclusive against the showing attempted to be made by the defendant. The record shows that the trial court was justified in abating a portion of the defendant's factory on the ground that to control only the manner of its conduct would be inadequate relief to the plaintiff from the nuisance thereby maintained. The contention is also made that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding that the factory of the defendant as presently operated constitutes a fire hazard. This contention cannot be seriously entertained in view of the fact that in the period beginning in 1917 three serious fires have occurred on the defendant's premises.

[7] The fact that the operations are conducted with the consent of the municipality, or that the defendant was doing a legal act, or that its operations are conducted in a district zoned for industry, or that the defendant was first in the field, may not avail the defendant. This conclusion, based on the equitable maxim sic utere tuo ut alienum non laedas, in Tuebner v. California St. R. R. Co., 66 Cal. 171, 173, 4 P. 1162, 1164, is stated thus: "A person may not use his own property, even in and about a business in itself lawful, if it be used in such a manner as to seriously interfere with another in the enjoyment of his right in the use of his property." Civ. Code, § 3479; Judson v. L. A. Suburban Gas Co., 157 Cal. 168, 106 P. 581, 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 183, 21 Ann. Cas. 1247; Fendley v. City of Anaheim, 110 Cal. App. 731, 294 P. 769; Williams v. Blue Bird Laundry Co., 85 Cal. App. 388, 259 P. 484.

[8, 9] That the plaintiff has also for his neighbors an airport on the north and a busy railroad right of way on the south may not control. "The fact that other sources of possible discomfort to plaintiff existed in the neighborhood of his property is no defense to an action of this kind. * * * Nor will the adoption of the most approved appliances and methods of production justify the continuance of that which, in spite of them, remains a nuisance." Judson v. L. A. Suburban Gas Co., supra, pages 171, 173 of 157 Cal., 106 P. 581, 582; Snow v. Marian Realty Co., 212 Cal. 622, 299 P. 720; Fendley v. City of Anaheim, supra, page 737 of 110 Cal. App., 294 P. 769.

[10] No doubt may be entertained of the continuing character of the nuisance maintained by the defendant's operations, so as to make inapplicable the statute of limitations. The defendant's contention in this regard may be disposed of without discussion by reference to the decisions in the cases of Kafka v. Bozio, 191 Cal. 746, 218 P. 753, 29 A. L. R. 833; Strong v. Sullivan, 180 Cal. 831, 181 P. 59, 4 A. L. R. 343; Collins v. Sargent, 89 Cal. App. 107, 115, 116, 264 P. 776; Williams v. Blue Bird Laundry Co., 85 Cal. App. 388, 395, 259 P. 484. The record shows that at no time did the plaintiff consent to the defendant's acts, but that on the other hand his course of conduct was a continuous objection to the defendant's operations.

A petition for a writ of supersedeas to stay the effect of the injunction pending appeal was filed herein and was ordered submitted with the appeal on the merits. In view of the disposition of said appeal, a discussion of the questions involved on the petition for the writ of supersedeas becomes unnecessary.

The judgment is affirmed.

In action for rescission of contract to purchase interest in oil and gas lease, implied finding that plaintiff acted promptly after discovering fraud held supported by evidence.

Evidence disclosed that contract to purchase interest in oil and gas lease was made on July 14, 1923; that plaintiff gave notice of rescission on October 10, 1923, and demanded the return of the money paid; that within a few days after plaintiff had entered into the contract she demanded a return of her money; that defendant told her that he did not have the money at the time, but would procure it for her, thereby mutually rescinding agreement; and that plaintiff waited until October 1st for defendant to fulfill his promise, and, he not having done so, she thereafter gave formal notice of rescission.

TYLER, Justice pro tem.

Action for rescission of a contract. The facts show that on the 14th day of July, 1923, plaintiff and defendant entered into an agreement whereby defendant agreed to sell and plaintiff agreed to buy an interest in a certain oil and gas lease. The complaint charged that defendant made false and fraudulent representations concerning the acreage of the land covered by the lease, and its location with reference to certain producing wells. The trial court found, upon sufficient evidence, that all of the representations made by defendant were false and untrue and were so made for the purpose of inducing plaintiff to enter into the agreement. The court further found that on October 10, 1923, plaintiff gave notice of rescission and demanded the return of the money she had paid. Judgment was accordingly rendered against defendant for the sum of $4,640, principal and interest, and from this judgment defendant appeals.

[1-4] The first point urged for a reversal is that the evidence is insufficient to show or justify the court in deciding in effect that plaintiff rescinded promptly upon the discovery of the alleged fraud, for the reason that the evidence shows without conflict that plaintiff discovered such alleged fraud at least seventy-two days prior to the time of serving her notice of rescission. There is no merit in this contention. It appeared in evidence that within a few days after plaintiff had entered into the contract she became suspicious of defendant's good faith and demanded a return of her money. Defendant informed her that he did not have it at that time, but would procure it for her. The agreement having been mutually rescinded, plaintiff waited until October 1st for defendant to fulfill his promise. He not having done so, she then gave defendant formal notice of rescission. Under such circumstances we cannot say that the evidence is insufficient to justify the implied finding that plaintiff acted promptly. Where a party protests promptly on discovering that he has been defrauded in making a contract, and enters into negotiations for a peaceable settlement, which fail, a complaint filed within a reasonable time after such failure is not barred by laches. Cooper v. Huntington, 178 Cal. 160, 172 P. 591; Bechtold v. Coney, 42 Cal. App. 563, 183 P. 841; Menefee v. Oxnam, 42 Cal. App. 81, 183 P. 379; 2 Black on Rescission and Cancellation, § 544. There is no hard and fixed rule as to the lapse of time or circumstances which will justify the application of the doctrine of laches. Kleinclaus v. Dutard, 147 Cal. 245, 81 P. 516. The question of whether or not a party defrauded has rescinded promptly depends upon all of the facts and circumstances of the particular case, and this question is one primarily for the trial court to determine. If its conclusion finds reasonable support in the evidence, reviewing courts will not interfere therewith. Suhr v. Lauterbach, 164 Cal. 591, 130 P. 2; Powell v. Oak Ridge Orchards Co., 84 Cal. App. 714, 258 P. 636; Smith v. Riverside Groves, etc., Co., 19 Cal. App. 165, 167, 124 P. 870. Here there is no showing of any abuse of the discretionary power reposed in the trial court.

[5] Appellant urges the further contention that the judgment is contrary to law, for the reason that the trial court failed to make a finding upon the issue raised as to whether or not plaintiff acted promptly in exercising her right to a rescission. A finding that plaintiff rescinded promptly upon becoming aware of defendant's fraud is necessarily implied from the findings and decision of the lower court. Where a finding omitted must be inferred from a consideration of the findings actually made, the appellate court will recognize the necessary inference and consider the finding in question as having in effect been made, and this is so with respect to laches. Scott v. Symons, 191 Cal. 441, 216 P. 604; Stevinson v. San Joaquin, etc., Co., 162 Cal. 141, 121 P. 398; Suhr v. Lauterbach, supra. In the Symons Case, it is held that the trial court, having given judgment in favor of plaintiff, in effect found against unnecessary delays in instituting the action.

[6] The evidence is ample to support the implied finding that plaintiff rescinded promptly. If there was an express finding on the subject, it would have to have been, under the evidence, adverse to the appellant. Under these circumstances its omission will not constitute error sufficient to authorize a reversal. Reed v. Johnson, 127 Cal. 538, 541, 59 P. 986.

Civ. 8511.

It must appear that petitioners in proceeding for limitation of liability surrendered vessel or deposited value in court, or that limitation of liability was established in federal court before injunction restraining other proceedings could become effective (28 USCA § 379; 46 USCA § 183 et seq.).

Original proceeding in mandate by A. Paladini, Incorporated, against the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco and another.

Peremptory writ issued.

Redman, Alexander & Bacon, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Ford & Johnson and Fletcher A. Cutler, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

NOURSE, P. J.

This is an original proceeding in mandate to require the respondent to dismiss an action because of the failure of the plaintiff in that action to bring the cause to trial within five years after the defendants' answer was filed.

On March 4, 1924, one Andrew Flink commenced an action against the petitioner herein and one Achille Paladini (now deceased) for injuries incurred while working upon a tugboat owned and operated by this petitioner. On October 8, 1926, the defendant corporation filed its answer. No further proceedings were had until February 4, 1932, when this defendant moved for a dismissal of the cause on the ground heretofore stated.

On March 8, 1926, Flink commenced a separate action in the superior court against all the stockholders of the Paladini Corporation to recover for the same injuries. On March 4, 1927, those stockholders filed in the United States District Court a petition for limitation of their liability, if any, arising out of the voyage on which plaintiff's injuries were sustained. On April 1, 1927, the District Court issued a monition citing all claimants against the vessel to appear on or before the first Tuesday of July, 1927, to make proof of their claims and to show cause why their claims should not be limited and apportioned as provided by title 46, § 183 et seq., of the United States Code (46 USCA § 183 et seq.).

[1] On this proceeding respondents have incorporated a copy of this monition. No other papers and no record of the proceedings in the federal court are before us. We cannot, therefore, take judicial notice of those proceedings [City of Los Angeles v. Abbott (Cal. Sup.) 12 P.(2d) 19], but are limited in our examination to the contents of the order of April 1, 1927. This paper, which under the federal practice is termed a monition, is nothing more than what in our state practice we term an order to show cause. It cites the claimants to appear and make proof of their claims and to show cause why these claims should not be limited to the value of the vessel, etc. It was issued on the petition of named individuals who were stockholders of the Paladini Company and did not cover any claim against the corporation as such. It does not contain any injunctive clause and, hence, does not in terms purport to restrain the prosecution of the action against the corporation.

[2, 3] Bearing in mind that, under the rule of City of Los Angeles v. Abbott, supra, we cannot examine the record in the proceeding before the federal court, we are forced to these conclusions from the record which is before us; that it does not appear either that the petitioners in that proceeding surrendered the vessel or deposited the value in court, or that the limitation of their liability was established in that court; that either one of these contingencies must arise before the "statutory injunction" restraining other proceedings can become effective (Metropolitan Redwood Lumber Co. v. Doe, 223 U. S. 365, 372, 32 S. Ct. 275, 56 L. Ed. 473, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 1221); that the presence of either one of these contingencies is necessary to escape the provisions of section 379, tit. 28, U. S. Code, 28 USCA § 379 (R. S. § 720), which prohibits an injunction from a federal court staying proceedings in a state court (Metropolitan Redwood Lumber Co. v. Doe, supra); that if the limitation proceedings did purport to restrain the action in the state court against the petitioners named therein, it had no effect upon the action against the corporation.

[4, 5] Thus, upon the record before us, it appears that the plaintiff was not restrained either by an express or by a statutory injunction from proceeding against the corporation and hence his delay for more than five years after answer filed to bring his cause to trial compels a dismissal of the cause under the express provisions of section 583, Code of Civil Procedure. That the provisions of this section are mandatory must be conceded. Larkin v. Superior Court, 171 Cal. 719, 721, 722, 154 P. 841, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 670; Cruse v. Superior Court, 102 Cal. 1. Mechanics' liens ⇐288(2).

Whether notice of nonresponsibility has been posted within ten days after owner has notice of commencement of construction work is fact question for court (Code Civ. Proc. § 1192).

2. Mechanics' liens ⇐281(2).

Finding that digging of test hole and hauling of lumber on premises constituted "commencement of work" within statute sufficient to sustain landowner's subsequent posting of notice of nonresponsibility held authorized (Code Civ. Proc. § 1192).

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Commencement of Work," see Words and Phrases.]

3. Appeal and error ⇐1010(1).

Appellate court could not interfere with trial court's finding sustained by evidence.

4. Mechanics' liens ⇐161(1).

Constitution gives direct lien on property for value of labor or material expended thereon (Const. art. 20, § 15).

5. Mechanics' liens ⇐191.

Where landowner duly posts notice of nonresponsibility, lien claimants are not thereby deprived of liens on building erected by lessee, but lien claims exist separately from land (Const. art. 20, § 15; Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1183, 1192).

6. Mechanics' liens ⇐233.

Unlawful detainer action wherein landowners had lease declared forfeited did not destroy mechanics' liens on building only (Const. art. 20, § 15; Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1183, 1192).

This was particularly true since the lease itself provided that lessee could erect a building and that any improvements erected could not be removed by lessee, and thus lessors by their own voluntary act made the building a part of their land, and therefore took the building burdened with the mechanics' liens which did not depend on leasehold interest of lessee.

7. Mechanics' liens ⇐230.

Federal court receiver's application to be relieved from forfeiture of lease, and denial thereof, held not binding on mechanics' lienors of building (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1179, 1183; Const. art. 20, § 15).

That federal court receiver applied under Code Civ. Proc. § 1179, to be relieved from effect of forfeiture of the lease, and denial of such application by court, was not binding on mechanics' lienors, even though application was made in creditor's action authorized by federal court, and was made on behalf of receiver and all creditors of lessee, liens sought to be foreclosed not being dependent on unlawful detainer action brought by lessor wherein forfeiture of lease was obtained, but being liens on building itself, not dependent on existence of lease.

8. Mechanics' liens ⇐233.

Lien claimants who furnished labor and material for construction of building erected by lessee had equities in their favor, as respects landowner's contention that forfeiture of lease freed property from liens.

BURROUGHS, Justice pro tem.

Four actions were brought to foreclose mechanics' liens. They were consolidated and became the above-entitled action.

The appeals are by the plaintiffs from so much of the judgment entered August 16, 1928, as fails to give them liens upon the interest of the defendant Los Angeles Athletic Club, a corporation, hereinafter referred to as the Athletic Club; and the interest of the defendant Title Insurance & Trust Company, hereinafter referred to as the Trust Company, in and to the land upon which the building in controversy is situated. The appeals are also from that portion of the said judgment which fails to give the plaintiffs any judgment against the Athletic Club or the Trust Company. The plaintiffs also appeal from the order of the court made on September 27, 1928, amending the conclusions of law and the judgment entered on August 16, 1928, and on October 6, 1928, entering different conclusions, and judgment, whereby the plaintiffs are deprived of liens given by the judgment of August 16, 1928, upon the building erected on the land above referred to, and they also appeal from that portion of the last-named judgment which fails to grant plaintiffs any relief against either the Athletic Club or Trust Company, and also that portion which vacates and sets aside the judgment of August 16, 1928.

The uncontradicted facts of the case found by the court are as follows: On November 1, 1924, the Athletic Club and Trust Company were the owners and reputed owners of a certain tract of land situated in the city of Los Angeles. On that day they leased said property to the defendant J. M. Danziger for the term of twenty-five years at the annual rental of $25,000. Thereafter Danziger and wife assigned said lease to the defendant Olympic Auditorium, Inc., a Delaware corporation, hereinafter referred to as the Auditorium Company, and the latter also assumed all of the obligations of said lease. Said lease, assignment, and covenant of assumption were in writing, and were duly recorded in the office of the county recorder. By the terms of the lease, the lessee was authorized to construct an auditorium building on the leased premises at the sole cost and expense of the lessee. It was further provided in said lease that mechanics and other persons performing work on said building, or furnishing material therefor, were thereby given notice that any liens filed by them upon said premises should not in any manner affect the rights of the lessors in said building, and that the lessee should have no right to remove any improvements constructed upon the leased premises. On January 9, 1925, the Athletic Club and Trust Company, as owners, posted upon said premises a notice of nonresponsibility in the form required by section 1192 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and on said day recorded a copy thereof in the office of the county recorder of Los Angeles county, as required by said section; that said notice remained posted and the recorded copy thereof remained of record during the entire period of construction of the auditorium building. At the time the notice was posted as aforesaid, there had been delivered upon the premises six hundred board feet of lumber which was used to build a temporary platform in connection with ceremonies of ground breaking held on January 10, 1925. Also there was dug, before the said notice was posted, a test hole not over six feet by ten feet by six feet deep, for the purpose of testing the character and weight-bearing qualities of the soil, which information was necessary in preparing the plans and specifications for the building. The test hole was thereafter used as a part of the excavation for the building. On the same day, and shortly after the posting of said notice, the Auditorium Company also caused a large steam shovel to be moved onto the premises, near the test hole. The shovel was operated the next day, January 10, 1925, as a part of the ground breaking ceremonies, and actually dug in on January 12, 1925. Thereafter, from day to day, work progressed on said building until its completion on or about September 10, 1925. Within due time after the completion of the building, these plaintiffs, not having been paid, filed their liens, and in due time commenced these actions to foreclose them. Thereafter the Auditorium Company defaulted in the payment of rent, and on August 17, 1926, the Athletic Club and Trust Company commenced an action in unlawful detainer against the Auditorium Company, to recover possession of said premises. On August 24, 1926, one James R. Masten was appointed a receiver by the District Court of the United States for said Auditorium Company, and he made application to the Superior Court for relief from the judgment of forfeiture of said lease, as provided by section 1179 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The court made an order granting the relief prayed for, but, plaintiffs failing to comply with the terms of the order, the judgment of forfeiture has now become final. Thereafter the Athletic Club and Trust Company entered into possession of the Olympic Auditorium building and premises, and have ever since remained in possession.

The plaintiffs did not apply to the court in the last-named action for relief from the judgment therein, nor were any of them parties to said action. At all times during the pendency of the unlawful detainer action, the actions of these plaintiffs on the mechanics' liens were all pending in the Superior Court.

Upon these findings, the trial court adjudged that the relief to which the plaintiffs were entitled was the sale of the Olympic Auditorium building, unless within a specified time respondents paid the amount of their lien claims to plaintiffs. The court also concluded that, as to plaintiffs, the lease had never been forfeited. After the entry of the judgment aforesaid, the Athletic Club and Trust Company made a motion to vacate the judgment and to amend the conclusions of law to the effect that plaintiffs were entitled to a lien upon the building and to enter its judgment denying said lien. Upon a hearing of the motion, the court granted the same, and on October 6, 1928, judgment was entered accordingly.

[1-3] Appellants contend that the court erred in adjudging that the land upon which the building was erected was not subject to the plaintiffs' lien, because the Athletic Club and Trust Company, the owners of the land, had protected their title thereto against the liens by giving proper notice of nonresponsibility to lien claimants, as provided in section 1192 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Appellants claim that the notice was posted before the commencement of work on the building, and was therefore ineffective for any purpose. Section 1192, supra, among other things, provides that the land upon which a building is erected by persons other than the owner or persons claiming an estate therein is subject to mechanics' and other designated liens, unless the owner or person having or claiming an estate therein shall, within ten days after he shall have obtained knowledge that construction of a building is in progress on his land, among other requirements, give notice that he will not be responsible for the same, by posting a notice in writing to that effect in some conspicuous place on the land. The facts upon which the court based its findings of proper posting by the owners are above set forth and are undisputed, and are sufficient to sustain the judgment that the construction was actually begun before the notice was posted. It was a matter for the trial court to determine. In Simons Brick Co. v. Hetzel, 72 Cal. App. 1, 236 P. 357, 358, the holder of an unrecorded mortgage testified that, when he went upon the premises for the purpose of ascertaining if any construction was being done, or if there was any evidence of a building being erected, there were no tools or materials of any description on the premises nor any evidence of a building being constructed. But it developed from other evidence that a trench about sixty feet long and four feet deep had been excavated along the front of the lot, and it was held by the court that this alone was sufficient to put the holder of the mortgage on notice of a building being under construction on the premises, and the mortgage, although recorded before any other work was done, was held to be subsequent to lien claimants under the Mechanics' Lien Law (Code Civ. Proc. § 1183 et seq.). The court said on page 5 of the opinion in 72 Cal. App., 236 P. 357, 358: "As to just what is meant by the term 'commencement of work' and as to the amount and character of work necessary to be done upon a building in order to say that work has been begun thereon, we think the true rule is stated in Phillips on Mechanics' Liens (3d Ed.) p. 387, where it is said: 'What this law means is some work and labor on the ground, the effects of which are apparent—easily seen by everybody; such as beginning to dig the foundation, or work of like description, which every one can readily see and recognize as the commencement of a building.'" We think this rule should be applied in the case at bar. The object of such a notice is to bring home to those who are expending labor or materials upon a building the fact that the owner of the land will not be responsible for such labor or materials. The notice must be posted on the ground within ten days after the owner has notice of the commencement of construction. Whether this has been done or not is, under Simons Brick Co. v. Hetzel, supra, a question of fact for the court to determine from the evidence before it. Here the court has found in effect that the digging of the test hole of considerable size, afterwards used as a part of the excavation and the hauling of lumber on the premises, was a commencement of the work, sufficient to sustain the posting of the notice in accordance with the requirements of section 1192 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and it was within the province of the trial court to so decide, and we are not allowed to interfere with such finding. Hickman v. Freiermuth, 21 Cal. App. 629, 132 P. 772.

The judgment of August 16, 1928, gave plaintiffs a lien upon the building itself down to the surface of the ground, and directed that, unless the owners paid the several amounts found due by the judgment within ninety days from the date thereof, the building would be sold to satisfy the lien claims. This portion of the judgment was set aside by the motion above referred to and the conclusions of law so altered as to deny a lien upon the building. And, on October 6, 1928, the judgment entered deprived plaintiffs of their liens upon the building. It is contended that this was error. As we read the record, the above action of the court was based upon the fact that, by the judgment in the unlawful detainer action, evicting the Auditorium Company from the premises and nullifying the lease, the plaintiffs were deprived of their lien upon the building. It is further contended by respondents that, the plaintiff not being entitled to a lien upon the land, it necessarily follows that the building, being a part of the real estate, was also relieved of the liens.

[4, 5] The Constitution of the state of California (article 20, § 15) is the basis of the Mechanics' Lien Law, and is as follows: "Mechanics, materialmen, artisans, and laborers of every class shall have a lien upon the property upon which they have bestowed labor or furnished material, for the value of such labor done and material furnished; and the legislature shall provide, by law, for the speedy and efficient enforcement of such liens." The language of the foregoing provision of our Constitution is clear and positive, and gives a direct lien on the property upon which the classes named therein have bestowed labor or furnished material to the extent of the value thereof. In carrying out the above constitutional mandate, the Legislature has provided by section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure that mechanics and materialmen shall have a lien upon the property on which they have bestowed labor and material, thus following the constitutional provision. The Legislature has distinguished between the ownership of the improvements made on the land and the land itself, in so far as the mechanics' and materialmen's liens are concerned. This is manifest by the enactment of section 1192 of the Code of Civil Procedure wherein it is provided that the landowner may protect his interest in the land from the lien by giving the notice of nonresponsibility as provided for in that section.

Mazzera v. Ramsey, 72 Cal. App. 601, at page 609, 238 P. 101, 103, quotes with approval from People v. Moxley, 17 Cal. App. 466, 468, 120 P. 43, as follows: "The lien of a mechanic or materialman is a constitutional right and attaches to the structure as the material is furnished or labor performed. The statutory procedure enacted for the enforcement of such right has reference only to the remedy." See, also, Siegel v. Hechler, 181 Cal. 187, 183 P. 664.

In Western Electric Co., Inc., v. Colley, 79 Cal. App. 770, 778, 251 P. 331, 335, it is said: "Lien claimants are given a lien 'upon the property upon which they have bestowed labor or furnished materials,' as well as upon the land upon which any building, improvement, well, or structure is constructed, or so much as may be required for the convenient use and occupation thereof, to be determined by the court on rendering judgment, if at the commencement of the work or the furnishing of materials the land belonged to the person causing the improvement to be undertaken; if he owned less than a fee, only his interest is subject to the lien, except as the owner of the fee may have failed to give notice of nonliability, as provided in section 1192 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Under these statutory provisions, the lien on the building, or other structure, is the primary thing, and the lien in the land is merely an incident to it. No lien can be acquired on the land, if none is acquired on the building, but a lien may exist on the building without attaching to the land. Hence it is not essential to the existence of a mechanic's lien on a building that the person causing its erection should have owned or had any interest in the real property on which it is located. This distinction between land and superstructure, the lien attaching primarily to the latter, and to the former only as it was embraced in a common ownership with the building, has existed in California from the very earliest times."

Humboldt Lumber Mill Company v. Crisp, 146 Cal. 686, 688, 81 P. 30, 31, 106 Am. St. Rep. 75, 2 Ann. Cas. 811, is a case where it was sought to enforce mechanics' liens against the land. The structure being built thereon was burned before completion or any lien had been filed. Under this state of facts the court held there was no right of lien; and, in commenting upon the distinction between the lien on the land and the lien on the building, says: "A further reason why the lien should not apply to the land in this case is found in a consideration and comparison of sections 1183 and 1185 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The first of these sections gives a lien 'upon the property upon which they have bestowed labor or furnished materials.' The second section cited says that certain land 'is also subject to the lien.' In these provisions we see an intention of the Legislature to make the lien on the building the principal thing, and the lien upon the land on which it is situated an incident of the completion of the building, and that when the building is destroyed before completion there can be no lien against the land on which it was being erected."

Linck v. Meikeljohn, 2 Cal. App. 506, 508, 84 P. 309, is in point. The building against which a materialman's lien was enforced was erected by a trespasser who had no interest in the title to the land upon which it was erected. The owner of the land raised one of the questions here presented that the building had become and was a part of the realty and therefore not subject to the lien. In answer to this claim, the court says: "It is true that where a building is constructed in a permanent manner upon land it becomes a part thereof, but if it is constructed with a lien thereon it becomes a part of such land subject to such lien. It would be grossly inequitable to say that one who may elect to treat a structure as a trespass and remove it, may elect to retain it, with knowledge that it is burdened with a lien, and yet hold it free from such burden."

Harmon Lumber Co. v. Brown, 165 Cal.

193, 200, 131 P. 368, 370, says: "But the primary thing is the lien upon the building. The lien upon the land is incident thereto." 17 California Jurisprudence, § 15, p. 28, is authority for the rule that the lien upon the building upon which labor or material has been furnished is the primary thing and the lien on the land an incident to it, and that this rule has existed in California from the earliest times.

[6] Having reached the conclusion that the lien upon the building exists separately from the land, the unlawful detainer action by which the respondents herein had the lease declared forfeited as to the Auditorium Company, and thus obtained possession of the property, becomes immaterial. However, the lease itself provides that the lessee may erect a building, and, further, that any improvements erected could not be removed by the lessee. Thus respondents have by their own voluntary act made the building a part of their land, and therefore have taken the same, burdened with the liens of plaintiffs, and which liens do not depend upon the leasehold interest of the Auditorium Company.

Should the lien laws be so interpreted as to destroy the liens because the leasehold interest has ceased to exist, such interpretation would render such laws unconstitutional. Section 15, art. 20, Cal. Const.

[7] It is claimed by the respondents that the action of the receiver appointed by the federal court, in applying under the provisions of section 1179 of the Code of Civil Procedure to be relieved from the effect of the forfeiture of the lease and the denial of the application by the court, is binding upon appellants in this action because such application was made in a creditor's action authorized by the federal court, and was made "on behalf of himself and all other creditors of said Olympic Auditorium, Inc." However, the liens here sought to be foreclosed are not in any manner dependent upon the unlawful detainer action, but are liens upon the building itself, and, as heretofore said, do not depend upon the existence of the lease. Section 15, art. 20, Const. Cal.; section 1183, Code Civ. Proc.

[8] It is also contended by the appellants that the equities of the case are in their favor, and, as this is an action in equity, they should have been awarded a judgment of foreclosure of their liens. To this respondents answer that equity follows the law.

There can be no doubt that the equities are with the plaintiffs. They have put into the building, in labor and material, many thousands of dollars for which they have not been paid, and the building has cost the respondents nothing whatever. To turn it over to the defendants freed from the liens of plaintiffs would be grossly inequitable. While equity follows the law, we do not believe that it is necessary to give a strained construction to the law so that this costly structure may be given to the defendants without any return to the men who created it.

As said in Stimson Mill Co. v. Nolan, 5 Cal. App. 754, 760, 91 P. 262, 265, in speaking of mechanic's liens: "The right to declare such lien is based upon the theory that the materialman and laborer produce the thing upon which the lien is declared." In Jones v. Great Southern Fireproof Hotel Co. (C. C. A.) 86 F. 370, 385, it is said by the court, in relation to statutes creating similar rights of lien: "But the validity of such statutes need not be rested upon mere authority. They find sanction in the dictates of natural justice, and most often administer an equity which has recognition under every system of law. That principle is that every one who, by his labor or materials, has contributed to the preservation or enhancement of the property of another, thereby acquires a right to compensation." Similar expressions are found in many cases and are applicable to the facts of this case.

The conclusions of law drawn from the findings that the appellants were entitled to a lien upon the building down to the surface of the ground were correct, and the judgment of August 16, 1928, was the proper judgment. The conclusions of law that the plaintiffs were not entitled to a lien on said building and the judgment of October 6, 1928, based on such conclusions are erroneous.

It is therefore ordered that as to these appellants the order of the trial court of September 27, 1928, and the judgment entered October 6, 1928, be, and each one of them is hereby, reversed. It is further ordered that this cause be, and it is hereby, remanded, with directions to the trial court to enter its conclusions of law granting appellants a lien upon the Auditorium building down to the surface of the ground, and to enter its judgment in accordance with the findings of fact and, the conclusions of law thus amended, granting the lien as aforesaid.

1. Criminal law ⇐730(4).

District attorney's reference in interrogating jurors to how previous jury stood held not prejudicial, in view of court's action.

Facts were that district attorney, during interrogation of jurors, asked jurors if they would be influenced by fact that upon former trial of defendants jury had voted 8 to 4 for conviction, but, upon objection made, court warned jurors that they had no evidence as to how previous jury stood, that they should disregard all remarks of counsel in that matter, and that, if they were unable to do so, or if they had any other information on the subject, they should so inform him and be discharged.

NOURSE, P. J.

The defendants were tried with a jury upon an information charging robbery. A verdict for the people resulted, and the defendants have appealed from the judgment and from the order denying their motion for a new trial.

At about 10 o'clock on the evening of November 11, 1931, the defendants, in company with Raymond Hill, entered a bootlegging "joint" in the city and county of San Francisco, and, after engaging in the showing of card tricks with one Romagnolo, who was in charge of the place, Sutter and Trott each drew a pistol and forced Romagnolo to deliver the contents of the cash register—about $40—and an equal amount of money was taken from the person of Romagnolo. The three then locked Romagnolo and his helper in a rear room and left the premises. Within the hour they were captured by the police while they stood at a street corner a few blocks from the scene of the holdup. At the time of his arrest Trott held in his hand the gun used by him in the holdup and Romagnolo's purse was found in his pocket. Each of the three had some of the money on his person, and the other gun, two masks, and the remainder of the money taken was found in a search of defendants' room. These articles were shown to defendants at the police station, and both admitted their part in the robbery.

[1] On this appeal, three points are raised which we will consider in order. It is urged that the district attorney's interrogation of the jurors was prejudicial misconduct when he asked if they would be influenced by the fact that upon a former trial of these defendants the jury had voted eight to four for conviction. Objections having been made to this line of inquiry, the trial court read from the decision in People v. Carmichael, 198 Cal. 534, 547, 246 P. 62, and, with extreme care, warned the jurors that they had no evidence as to how the previous jury stood; that they should disregard all remarks of counsel in that matter; that, if they were unable to do so, or if they had any other information on the subject, they should so inform him and be discharged. Under these circumstances we cannot say that the rights of the defendants were prejudiced by this occurrence.

[2] The second point is that the evidence does not support the verdict. The argument is that, as the complaining witness was a "bootlegger" and had been convicted and served a term for violation of the federal Prohibition Act, he should be denied credence as a witness. This was, of course, a matter for the trial court and jury to determine. It is also argued that we should hold that the evidence of the previous good reputation of the defendants supported the presumption of their innocence and thus overcame the direct evidence of their guilt. Such evidence merely created some conflict and, on this appeal, we are concerned simply with the question whether there is substantial competent evidence to support the verdict. A mere reference to the statement of facts compels an affirmative answer.

[3] Criticism is made of the portion of the instruction in the terms of subdivision 3, section 2061, Code of Civil Procedure, advising that a witness who willfully testifies falsely as to one fact is to be distrusted in other parts of his testimony. It is not suggested how this instruction could have been prejudicial to the defendants, and, as a large part of the brief is devoted to the testimony of the complaining witness and to the argument that we should not believe any of his testimony because of inconsistencies in immaterial portions of it, we conclude that this instruction was not prejudicial to either defendant.

[4] We find no error in the ruling denying a new trial. The affidavits presented endeavored to show that new evidence had been discovered subsequent to the second trial, but they also disclosed that such evidence might easily have been discovered in time for that trial.

Judgment and order as to both defendants are affirmed.

YORK, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Percy Hight, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Thomas McGirl, deceased. From an order to distribute a maintenance fund, created by a codicil to decedent's will, to Nellie H. Barbe in trust for Mrs. Leora Branch, with direction to pay the latter a stated sum monthly, P. M. Barbe, the executor, appeals.

Reversed, with instructions.

CONREY, P. J.

Upon the 29th day of September, 1930, Thomas McGirl, a resident of the county of Los Angeles, died, leaving an estate, the larger part of which was located in Montana and a small part at Long Beach in Los Angeles county, Cal. The will of decedent, together with two codicils, was duly admitted to probate, and on November 30, 1930, letters testamentary were issued to the executor, P. M. Barbe, who proceeded with the administration of the estate.

In the first codicil to the will the testator made provision for the benefit of one Leora Branch as follows: "As Mrs. Leora Branch has been a good help in taking care of me, I hereby give devise and bequeath to my niece, Nellie H. Barbe, in trust, the sum of Five Thousand Dollars ($5,000.00), the interest upon said sum to be paid to the said Leora Branch in equal monthly installments of Twenty-five Dollars ($25.00) per month during the natural life of said Mrs. Leora Branch, provided the said Mrs. Leora Branch remains with me to the time of my death, and at her death, then said principal sum of Five Thousand Dollars ($5,000.00) to become the property of my said niece, Nellie H. Barbe, to be hers absolutely and forever.

"In the event Mrs. Leora Branch does not remain with me until my death, then in that event, I hereby give, devise and bequeath the said sum of Five Thousand Dollars ($5,000.00) to my niece, Nellie H. Barbe, to be hers absolutely and forever."

On March 3, 1931, Mrs. Branch filed in the matter of said estate a petition based upon said provisions of the codicil, and asking for the payment to petitioner of the sum of $25 per month. An order to show cause was issued, notice given, and answer filed by the executor, and the issues presented were tried by the court. Thereafter the court made an order wherein it was recited that, by virtue of the terms of said codicil, the decedent intended to and did create a maintenance trust for the petitioner, Leora Branch, payable as of and from the date of the death of Thomas McGirl; and Mrs. Branch did remain with the decedent as intended by the provisions of said codicil, and was actually being supported by him at the time of his death. Thereupon it was ordered that the executor make distribution to Nellie H. Barbe, in trust during the lifetime of Leora Branch, with directions to said trustee to pay the sum of $25 a month from and after the death of Thomas McGirl to Leora Branch. Provision was made for the filing of bonds, apparently to conform with the provisions of sections 1658 to 1662 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The executor has appealed from the judgment.

[1] In the briefs there has been some suggestion that the proceedings in the court below might be considered as an action for declaratory relief brought under the provisions of section 1060 et seq. of the Code of Civil Procedure. We are of the opinion that the parties and the court below correctly proceeded upon the theory that the proceeding was one belonging within the scope of proceedings in course of administration, and was not an action for declaratory relief.

[2-5] It is contended by appellant that the court erred in finding that Mrs. Branch remained with decedent until the time of his death as intended by the codicil; and in finding that the provisions of the codicil established a maintenance trust; and in decreeing that the allowance was payable at and from the death of the testator; and in ordering the executor to make distribution to Nellie H. Barbe in trust; and in directing the trustee to pay to Mrs. Branch the sum of $25 a month from and after the death of McGirl. There are other points listed, but those above specified will be sufficient for this decision.

We are satisfied that the codicil was properly construed as one establishing a maintenance trust, and also that the evidence was sufficient to warrant the court in determining that the petitioner did remain with the decedent to the time of his death under circumstances which sufficiently complied with that provision of the codicil. It was appropriate that the income provided to be paid out of the trust fund should be payable beginning with the time of the death of the testator. In re Mackay's Estate, 107 Cal. 303, 40 P. 558, 559. The cited case is also authority for the rule that, as beneficiary of the trust, the petitioner had the right in the probate court to move the court to make distribution of the fund to the trustee. "This distribution the court could grant, at any time the circumstances of the estate would warrant it, without awaiting final distribution of the general estate."

[6, 7] But, while we think that, so far as the questions above noted are concerned, a correct decision was made, it will for other reasons be necessary to reverse the order and remand the case for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion. The first reason is that there is not in the record any evidence to support a finding or implied finding that the executor had in possession funds with which to comply with the order and pay over the trust fund to the trustee. To meet this point it has been suggested that the court might take judicial knowledge of the steps which had been taken in the process of administration, and that it must be presumed here that the court, in the form of such judicial knowledge, had before it the necessary evidence. But no attempt has been made to show to this court that in fact there was any such evidence contained in the record of the proceedings in course of the administration of the estate. We assume, therefore, that, if we were to agree with the suggestion thus made, and if accordingly we should send for the files showing the said probate proceedings, we would not find that there was in the record any evidence that the necessary funds were in the hands of the executor. Such intimations as we can find in the record indicate the probability that there were not such funds; although it may be that on completion of the ancillary proceedings of the estate in Montana a large sum of money will come into the hands of this executor. The second reason why the order as made cannot be sustained lies in the fact that it is a flat order for the payment of the sum of $25 a month instead of being, as it should be, an order for the payment of money at that rate, but not exceeding the actual net income received, or which under proper management should be received, as interest on said trust fund. It may well be that the interest on said $5,000, either with or without any deduction of taxes or other necessary expenditures, would be less than $25 per month.

The order is reversed, with instructions to the lower court to proceed in accordance with this decision.

HOUSER, J.

Although not entirely disclosed by the official record herein, but to some extent dependent upon undisputed statements set forth in the briefs of the respective parties hereto, it satisfactorily appears that the pertinent facts which relate to this appeal are as follows: At a time when, in accordance with the provisions of a lease, defendant Spaulding was in possession of a part of certain real property, plaintiff became the purchaser of the whole of the property at a sale which was authorized by the provisions of a trust deed. Thereupon, under the provisions of section 1161a of the Code of Civil Procedure, plaintiff served on the defendants "a three day notice to quit" possession of the property, etc.; and, on the failure and refusal of the defendants to yield to plaintiff the possession of the property, plaintiff commenced an action against defendants in "unlawful detainer" for possession of the premises. Four days after the answer to the complaint of all the defendants in the action had been filed, "a stipulation consenting to the entry of a judgment against all of the defendants was filed, and seven days later a judgment pursuant to said stipulation was entered against all of the defendants." By such stipulation, which was dated January 10, 1930, and which was signed by the attorneys who then represented the respective parties to the action, it was agreed that plaintiff was the owner of and entitled to possession of the property in question; "that possession of said premises is to be delivered up to the plaintiff on or before the 9th day of March, 1930; that if the premises are not so delivered up, the plaintiff shall have a writ of possession issued on the 10th day of March, 1930, or as soon thereafter as the plaintiff may elect; that each of the parties hereto are to pay their own costs incurred herein; that the plaintiff is not entitled to the damages prayed for in his complaint" (treble damages). On March 7, 1930, or (according to the terms of said stipulation) two days before the rightful possession of defendants of said property would have expired, defendant Spaulding presented to the trial court his notice of motion to vacate the judgment which, in accordance with the stipulation of the parties to the action, theretofore had been entered therein. In substance, the grounds of the motion were that, "without the knowledge or consent of petitioner (Spaulding), * * * and contrary to his wishes and contrary to the interest of said petitioner," his then attorney in the action signed the stipulation by virtue of which the judgment was entered against said defendant. In response to said motion, the attorney for plaintiff filed his affidavit wherein he deposed: "That the interest of W. A. Spaulding (appellant) is the same as that of the other defendants herein; that immediately after the stipulation was executed said W. A. Spaulding was in the office of this affiant, and also called on him at his place of residence. * * * That said W. A. Spaulding, after said judgment was docketed and entered, appeared at your affiant's office, in the company of Arthur C. Webb, his now attorney. * * *"

The trial court denied the motion; whereupon defendant Spaulding appealed, not only from said order by which said motion was denied, but as well from the judgment.

[1] It is first urged by appellant that, because the complaint in the action failed to "set forth the facts upon which plaintiff seeks to recover," and also failed to "set forth the circumstances of force or violence which may have accompanied the alleged * * * unlawful detainer" (section 1166, Code Civ. Proc.), the complaint failed to state a cause of action.

In connection therewith, an examination of the complaint discloses the fact that it contained an allegation that "the plaintiff was well entitled to the possession" of the property involved in the action. In the case of City Investment Co. v. Pringle, 69 Cal. App. 416, 422, 231 P. 355, 357, wherein a similar allegation was made by the plaintiff and a similar point was raised on appeal from the judgment, in reaching a conclusion that the position assumed by the appellant in that regard was not well taken, in part the court said: "Technically, this is a conclusion of law and not an allegation of fact, and even though we were to concede that the special demurrer directed to this defect in the complaint should have been sustained, it would not warrant a reversal of the judgment in this case."

Placing reliance in such authority, it follows that the point suggested by appellant cannot be sustained.

[2] It is next contended by appellant that, without express authority from him so to do, his attorney had no power to stipulate that a judgment might be entered against said defendant. However, the conduct of defendant subsequent to the entry of the judgment renders it unnecessary that this court should consider the specific question thus submitted by appellant. From the record herein the date at which said defendant acquired knowledge or notice of the fact that the judgment had been entered against him is not disclosed. But (as appears from the affidavit of the attorney for plaintiff) the fact that the then attorney who represented said defendant was fully aware of all the facts which related to the entry of the judgment, "that immediately after the stipulation was executed said W. A. Spaulding (defendant) was in the office of this affiant (attorney for plaintiff), and also called on him at his place of residence, * * * that said W. A. Spaulding, after said judgment was docketed and entered, appeared at your affiant's office, in the company of Arthur C. Webb, his now attorney," coupled with the most significant fact that defendant remained in possession of the property up to a time which, according to the terms of the stipulation, was but two days before his right to such possession of that part of the property held by him expired, and that on the hearing of the motion defendant failed to produce the affidavit of the attorney who had formerly represented him in the matter—it was but a fair inference which the trial court was authorized to make, and which from its order may be assumed was made, to wit, that in fact defendant either had expressly authorized his attorney to make the stipulation of which defendant later complained, or that subsequent to the entry of the judgment defendant acquired notice or knowledge of the fact and thereafter ratified it. But, even without any ratification of the said assumed authorized act of his attorney, if, acting within its discretion, the trial court found as a fact that which may be legally assumed it did find, to wit, that either immediately or shortly after the judgment had been entered said defendant had notice or knowledge thereof, and thereafter accepted the benefits which accrued to him under the stipulation, among which were the right of possession of the property for a period of approximately two months, that he be not compelled to pay plaintiff's costs in the action, nor treble damages to which plaintiff might become entitled, it is clear that defendant would not then have, nor now has, just cause for complaint.

The final contention by appellant to the effect that, in rendering the judgment, and subsequently in denying the motion to vacate the same, the trial court abused its discretion, is entirely lacking in merit.

The judgment and the order from which the respective appeals herein are taken are, and each of them is, affirmed.

CONREY, P. J.

The facts are stated in the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice HOUSER. We are all in agreement that the court did not err in sustaining the demurrer to the plaintiff's complaint. We of the majority, however, think that the alleged publication of which plaintiff complained was neither libelous on its face nor capable of being given a libelous quality by means of any amendment to the complaint. We therefore are of the opinion that the court very properly dismissed the action without first giving plaintiff permission to file an amended complaint.

There being no argument presented in support of the appeal from order denying motion to strike cost bill, that appeal is deemed to be without merit.

The judgment is affirmed. The order is affirmed.

I concur: YORK, J.

HOUSER, J. (dissenting).

From the complaint filed in the lower court in pertinent substance it appears that plaintiff, as an author, and the defendants, as publishers of a newspaper, theretofore had agreed one with the other that the defendants would publish as a serial in their newspaper a certain story which had been written by plaintiff and as to which, with the knowledge of the defendants, plaintiff was desirous of copyrighting both in the United States and in Great Britain; that (as alleged), "in order to secure a copyright in the United States an affidavit must accompany the application for copyright stating that the 'matter is printed from type set within the borders of the United States'; that in order to copyright the same material in Great Britain there must, under British law, be simultaneous filing for copyright in Washington, D. C., and in the British Museum in London, the British law allowing only fourteen days for transportation by mail as a divergence in dates of filing; that unless British copyright is secured simultaneously with the copyright in the United States the same matter could never later be copyrighted in Great Britain."

The complaint contains further allegations to the effect that, notwithstanding full knowledge possessed by the defendants of the foregoing facts, and without having theretofore caused the entire matter of the story written by plaintiff to be set in type as contemplated by the said copyright regulations, the defendants caused a "large display advertisement—announcement" to be inserted in a publication of their newspaper that the story "would begin in a few days"; that immediately thereafter plaintiff unsuccessfully endeavored to perfect arrangements with the defendants so that, in order to have the said story copyrighted, a compliance would be had with the required legal conditions precedent with reference to having the said story in type prior to the publication of any part or installment thereof; and, upon failure and refusal of the defendants to co-operate with plaintiff to that end, "directed the newspaper not to publish any more announcements until they could arrange to set the type of the entire story and run off sheets which could be forwarded to the British Museum in London"; that thereupon, without and in the absence of any "misunderstanding" on the part of either of the parties regarding the situation, the defendants "maliciously published of and concerning the complainant the following false, defamatory, and unfair professional libel: 'Due to a misunderstanding with the author, it will be impossible to start the new story "Enduring Love" advertised to start today, Monday, Feb. 18th.'"

Following an allegation contained in the complaint to the effect that the statements contained in said publication were false, etc., the allegation is made: "That the said professionally defamatory, false and unfair publication by innuendo said, and by innuendo meant to state, and was so taken by newspaper readers to mean, that the author, Mary Greer Conklin, the complainant, was irresponsible and did not keep her writing engagements; that the said professionally defamatory, false and unfair publication by innuendo said, and by innuendo meant to state, that the author, Mary Greer Conklin, the complainant herein, was not to be depended upon."

Although by several different subsequent allegations contained in the complaint plaintiff endeavored to set up facts from which malice of the defendants toward plaintiff might be found to have existed both before and after the alleged libel was published—neither in form nor in substance were any pertinent extrinsic facts, nor any inducement nor innuendo alleged other than such as those or that respectively to which attention hereinbefore has been directed.

The lower court sustained the defendants' demurrer to plaintiff's complaint "without leave to amend" the same, and thereupon rendered judgment against plaintiff and in favor of the defendants. It is from such judgment, as well as from an order made by said court by which plaintiff's motion to strike defendants' cost bill was denied, that the instant appeals are taken.

Although the point is neither suggested by the respondents nor discussed in the prevailing opinion, in order that no merited criticism may be directed toward the appeal by reason thereof, it may be stated that, in view of the fact that the demurrer to the complaint was sustained "without leave to amend"—to enable plaintiff on appeal from the judgment not only to protest the sufficiency of the complaint, but as well to attack the validity of the order and the ensuing judgment by which her right to amend the complaint was denied, she was not required as a condition precedent to the assertion of such right to first make a motion for leave to amend the complaint and thereafter have such motion denied by the trial court. Schaake v. Eagle Automatic C. Co., 135 Cal. 472, 480, 63 P. 1025, 67 P. 759; Metzger v. Vestal, 76 Cal. App. 409, 416, 244 P. 942.

It is clear that, leave to amend the complaint having once been denied by the trial court, it should be presumed that thereafter, had plaintiff presented her formal motion to amend her complaint, in substance an order identical with that formerly made by the trial court again would have been made. The law does not demand the performance of an idle act.

On consideration of the alleged libelous language it becomes manifest that, if actionable, it must be so because by its covert meaning, as was intended by its publisher, and as was rightfully understood by the readers of the newspaper in which the words were published, some aspersion was cast upon the character of plaintiff which was harmful to her in the pursuit of her occupation.

It is obvious that in its ordinary significance, and as commonly understood, no libelous meaning could attach to the language of which plaintiff complains; but it is contended by appellant that, as explained by the "extrinsic facts," or the inducement, and the colloquium, the published words "due to a misunderstanding with the author" constituted a libel of plaintiff which had a tendency to injure her in her occupation. Section 45, Civ. Code. It therefore becomes apparent that, somewhat reduced in its expression, the question here presented is whether, by the allegations contained in the complaint, plaintiff set forth such facts that from them it should follow as a matter of law that a cause of action either was or might have been stated.

Preliminarily, it should be noted that "words which on their face appear to be entirely harmless, may, under certain circumstances, convey a covert meaning, wholly different from the ordinary and natural interpretation usually put upon them" (16 Cal. Jur. 39, and authorities there cited); and that, if by proper pleading and competent evidence such hidden meaning be respectively averred and established, the plaintiff may become entitled to recover such a judgment for damages against the defendant as the evidence may show resulted to the plaintiff by reason of the publication of the alleged libel.

As apt illustrations of the application of such rule, see Maynard v. Fireman's Fund Insurance Co., first reported in 34 Cal., at page 48, 91 Am. Dec. 672, and later in 47 Cal., at page 207, where the alleged libel consisted in the published statement that "this company, for good and sufficient reasons, has resolved to dismiss D. D. Maynard from its service." Likewise, in the case of Ingraham v. Lyon, 105 Cal. 254, 38 P. 892, in which it appears "that defendants were members of a Merchants' Protective and Collection Association, doing business in Oakland; that they caused to be entered upon the 'black list' of the association the following: 'When entered, February 13, 1892; name of delinquent debtor, George Ingraham; occupation, porter; residence, 718 Henry street; when account closed, month, January, day, 2nd, year, 1892, amount, $14.25, by whom reported, J. L. Lyon & Son.'" See, also, Grand v. Dreyfus, 122 Cal. 58, 54 P. 389, 390, in which case the plaintiff complained of the words, "If he (plaintiff) continues to sell (steal) my hogs, I [defendant] will send him where he was another time. * * *"

As applied to an action for damages for a libel of the character of that here under consideration, it is a well-recognized rule of pleading that, in order to show the connection between what ordinarily would be understood as innocent and harmless words, and the sinister or injurious meaning, or the innuendo, which it is claimed was by the publisher thereof intended to be, and which in fact was, understood by the readers of such published words, the extrinsic circumstances, or what ordinarily is termed the inducement, must be set forth in the complaint. 16 Cal. Jur., 86 et seq., and authorities there cited. But, notwithstanding the existence of the rule that the utterance or the publication of apparently harmless words, when properly and sufficiently supported in the complaint by allegations of extrinsic facts, may be actionable, nevertheless it is equally well-settled law that the innuendo, or the declaration by the plaintiff in the action by which he ascribes the meaning which was intended by the defendant and the manner in which the libel or the slander was understood by the readers or the hearers thereof, can be no broader than is justified or warranted by the facts upon which such attributed meaning rests. 16 Cal. Jur. 88; Bates v. Campbell (Cal. Sup.) 2 P. (2d) 383; Pollock v. Evening Herald Pub. Co., 28 Cal. App. 786, 154 P. 30, and authorities in such cases respectively cited. In other words, the innuendo, like an allegation of fraud, is nothing more nor less than a pleading of an ultimate fact (or possibly a conclusion of law), which in order to be legally effective must be supported by extrinsic facts which have been pleaded in the complaint.

Adverting to the extrinsic facts or the inducement set forth in the complaint herein, and coupling it with the alleged innuendo therein contained, it appears that the gist of the charge is that, as between plaintiff and the defendants, although complete harmony existed in the minds of such respective parties relative to the requirements of copyright regulations, and incident thereto the necessity that the entire manuscript theretofore prepared by plaintiff should be actually in "type" prior to the publication of any part of it—the defendants falsely published the statement that, because of a "misunderstanding" with the author, the story theretofore written by plaintiff could not be published; and by such statement intended to declare, and by the readers thereof was understood to mean, that plaintiff was "irresponsible and did not keep her writing engagements; * * * was not to be depended upon."

It will be noted that, other than that in effect the defendants asserted that a "misunderstanding" existed between them and plaintiff regarding the publication of the story of which plaintiff was the author, the complaint contained no averment of extrinsic facts or inducement by or from which it might be reasoned and thereby legally concluded that by the use of the word "misunderstanding" the defendants had intended to assert, and the readers of their newspaper had understood the defendants as asserting, that plaintiff was "irresponsible," or that she could not "be depended upon." Exactly as is stated in the case of Mellen v. Times-Mirror Co., 167 Cal. 587, 591, 140 P. 277, 278, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 766, in the inducement proper, "no facts are alleged upon which it can reasonably be claimed that this charge imputed to plaintiff anything dishonorable or disreputable, or anything that could expose him to hatred, contempt, ridicule, or obloquy, or cause him to be shunned or avoided by any one, or that could cause him any injury, * * *" or (as applied to the instant case), which could have a tendency to injure her in her occupation. Section 45, Civ. Code. Particularly does the inducement not contain any sufficient statement of facts by or from which it might or does even inferentially appear that by the use of the alleged libelous words any hidden or covert meaning of a sinister or harmful significance was either intended or expected to be conveyed, or was so understood by the readers of the published article.

In the case of Mahana v. Echo Publishing Co., 181 Cal. 233, 237, 183 P. 800, 802, in commenting upon a situation similar to that here under consideration, the Supreme Court said: "Unless the article was of such a nature that in view of extrinsic facts alleged and proved it conveyed to the readers of the newspaper charges of dishonesty and financial irresponsibility of plaintiffs, of course the innuendo will not give it that sinister significance. Mellen v. Times-Mirror Co., 167 Cal. 587, 140 P. 277, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 766." To the same effect, see Chavez v. Times-Mirror Co., 185 Cal. 20, 25, 195 P. 666.

As stated in the prevailing opinion herein, the members of this court are in accord one with the other in the conclusion that, in view of the adjudicated cases by the Supreme Court and the Court of Appeal of this state, the demurrer to the complaint was properly sustained. But my inability to completely agree with my associates arises from the order of the trial court by which plaintiff was denied the right to amend her complaint.

It must be apparent that, if from the allegations contained in the complaint it appears that the defect in attempting to state a cause of action is as to form only, or that either the stated or the obviously omitted facts, or both of them combined, were such that, had they been correctly and scientifically pleaded, a cause of action might have been stated, it should follow that the denial to the plaintiff of the right to amend her complaint was prejudicial to her substantial rights in the premises. 21 Cal. Jur. 121, and authorities there cited. In other words, unless it affirmatively appear that the complaint is incapable of amendment so as to state a cause of action, ordinarily leave should be granted to plaintiff to amend his complaint.

The theory upon which the trial court is empowered to deny to a plaintiff the right to amend his complaint rests upon the incontrovertible assumption that by no possible combination of the facts surrounding the transaction, or condition of which the plaintiff complains, may he state a cause of action. Manifestly the proper function and duty of the court is to administer equal and indiscriminative justice as between parties before it—not to deny justice to either or any of them. If on consideration of the complaint in an action, irrespective of either the allegations which it contains, or those which in reason might thereafter be inserted therein, under and in pursuance of the law of the land, the trial court be authorized irremediably to sustain a demurrer thereto "without leave to amend," the perpetuation of an apparent arbitrary and autocratic power consistent only with the disposition, rights, and liberties of man as exercised by an absolute monarchy would be threatened, if not be actually existent. Fortunately in this jurisdiction the invariable rule has been adopted that "it is error to sustain a general demurrer without leave to amend, unless it appears that the complaint is incapable of amendment in a radical particular." 21 Cal. Jur. 121, and authorities there cited. Nor in an action for damages which arises from an alleged libel should the rule differ in that particular from the rule which is applicable in any other action.

From a consideration of the nature of the action and the allegations of the complaint constituting the extrinsic circumstances or the inducement, to my mind it does not affirmatively appear that in no possible condition or circumstances might additional or substituted allegations not be made which, together with those now appearing in the complaint, might constitute a sufficient statement of a cause of action. It may be a fact that because of inadvertence, or of the lack of experience of plaintiff in matters of the character of that here under consideration, she has failed to appreciate the existence of certain relevant and material facts which, if properly pleaded, would at least aid in the proper and scientific preparation of her complaint. As an indication that in the inducement proper plaintiff did not exhaust her opportunities to lay a foundation either for the alleged innuendo which she claims was intended, or for some other innuendo which might be supported by the extrinsic facts, the later allegations of her complaint by which the malice of defendants was pleaded may be cited. Such allegations were as follows:

"That showing the malice of said professionally defamatory, false and unfair statements in said publication the complainant avers that the defendants Harvey R. Ling, one of the high officers of the Review Ptg. Co., and Mrs. Lillian Harris Greer, another of the high officers of the Review Ptg. Co., and Miss May Read, another high officer of the Burbank Review Pub. Co., have stated repeatedly that the complainant, Mary Greer Conklin, is crazy; that she is 'an educated fool' and a 'writing fool'; that nobody could get along with her; that the said Harvey R. Ling laughed sardonically when he discussed the tactics he quietly pursued with regard to publishing the story 'Enduring Love' and how with glee he noticed that those tactics worried the complainant; that he stated months later apropos of publishing a want advertisement the complainant had prepared for another member of the family that he would not publish said advertisement because the complainant had written it—not if anybody paid him a million dollars for so doing; that by other and divers ways he has shown malice not only toward the complainant but toward other immediate members of her (the Greer) family as well. * * *

"That showing further the malice of said false, professionally defamatory and unfair publication complainant avers that the said Harvey R. Ling and the Review Ptg. Co. through others of its high officers intended to state (coupling their own repeated verbal statements that the complainant was 'crazy' with the professionally defamatory, false and unfair publication) and by innuendo did state that the author and complainant was crazy and therefore resorted to ruses ('misunderstandings') in her professional writing engagements; that the readers who had heard these verbal accusations that the author (because of certain sociological work she had done in Burbank) was 'crazy' so took the publication to mean by innuendo that the author and complainant had thus given another example of her 'craziness.'"

In the case of Grand v. Dreyfus, 122 Cal. 58, 63, 54 P. 389, 391, it is said: "It is not material where the matters of inducement appear in the complaint—whether before or after the statement of the language published —although logically they should precede the words spoken."

In the same case, on page 63 of 122 Cal., 54 P. 389, 391, relative to the allegation of extrinsic facts, the following language appears: "* * * We cannot regard this [a specified allegation] as in any sense explaining the situation of and circumstances surrounding the parties, or as explaining what the defendant meant by saying, 'If he continues to sell my hogs.' It is alleged that the hearers understood defendant to mean 'steal my hogs'; but does the complaint disclose enough extrinsic facts from which alone to warrant us in holding that the hearers had a right to put such construction on the language used, or that as matter of law his language had such meaning? We think not. It certainly cannot be the law that a defendant must answer to the charge of slander whenever, without reason, some bystander attributes to his language a meaning wholly different from the natural import of the language used. There should be sufficient inducement alleged somewhere in the complaint from which, when proven to be true, it would be fair and reasonable to say, as matter of law, that defendant intended, in using the language, to charge that the plaintiff was guilty of the crime, or the act giving rise to the alleged slander."

However, neither in the case of Maynard v. Fireman's Fund Insurance Co., 34 Cal. 48; Id., 47 Cal. 207, nor in Ingraham v. Lyon, 105 Cal. 254, 38 P. 892, is it in anywise suggested that in framing a complaint and in alleging extrinsic facts or inducement the plaintiff must go to anything like the length suggested in the case to which reference has just been had.

But, even relying exclusively upon the principle announced in the case of Grand v. Dreyfus, 122 Cal. 58, 54 P. 389, it would seem clear that, if by proper foundational allegations of extrinsic facts and circumstances in the complaint it should appear that, by the publication by the defendants of a statement that "due to a misunderstanding with the author," etc., the defendants falsely, and without any exemption of privilege, meant to charge, and that the readers of the newspaper published by the defendants "had a right to put such construction on the language used," and in fact understood the defendants to mean, that plaintiff was "crazy"; that she was "an educated fool; * * * a writing fool; * * * resorted to ruses ('misunderstandings') in her professional writing engagements"; and had "thus given another example of her craziness"—in substance, if not in form, the complaint contained required basic elements for the statement of a cause of action. Maynard v. Fireman's Fund Ins. Co., 47 Cal. 207; Ingraham v. Lyon, 105 Cal. 254, 38 P. 892. Of course, it may be that, as apparently is required by the respective rulings to which attention has been directed, plaintiff would not have been successful in any attempt which she might have made to establish a proper and sufficient connection between the word "misunderstanding" and either of the several or the combined epithets or characterizations which, as alleged, the defendants expressed regarding plaintiff, her mentality, or her business habits, and consequently could not have laid a sufficient foundation for her conclusion as to what she alleged was intended by the defendants by their said publication, or as to how the language so employed by the defendants was rightfully understood by the readers of the newspaper; but to my mind, considering the existing conditions, at least an opportunity should have been afforded plaintiff to so amend her complaint as to comply, if possible, with the legal requirements of the situation.

O'BRIEN v. EDENS.

Civ. 7390.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California.

July 26, 1932.

1. Trial ⇐228(1).

That unnecessarily large number of instructions was given on damages was not alone ground for reversal.

2. Trial ⇐295(11).

That some instructions did not limit consideration respecting future conditions to damages reasonably certain to be suffered held not to require reversal where all instructions on damages considered together correctly declared rule (Civ. Code, § 3283).

3. Trial ⇐228(1).

Trial court need not state all law applicable in single instruction.

4. Damages ⇐130(1).

$10,000 for broken leg, contusions, sprain of left leg, and numerous cuts and bruises, involving several months' confinement in hospital, held not excessive.

5. Trial ⇐241.

In action for injuries by being run down by backing automobile, reading to jury alleged inapplicable statute held not error where jury could not have been misled.

6. Negligence ⇐89(1).

Joint enterprise doctrine is inapplicable to actions by one joint adventurer against another for injuries due to latter's negligence.

7. Automobiles ⇐181(1).

Joint enterprise doctrine held not applicable to exonerate motorist from liability for running down his business partner, sent to flag traffic, while backing automobile.

Even if plaintiff and defendant, who were partners in restaurant business, were engaged in joint enterprise in operating automobile when it broke down near garage, defendant who ran down plaintiff, who had been sent by defendant to flag traffic in back of automobile so as to permit defendant to back automobile to garage, was not exonerated from liability for negligence by doctrine of joint enterprise, since plaintiff's flagging of traffic had nothing to do with operation of automobile which was left entirely in hands of defendant.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Percy Hight, Judge.

Action by Joseph O'Brien against R. W. Edens. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

George H. Moore, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Russell H. Pray, of Long Beach, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J.

Action to recover damages for personal injuries received by reason of alleged negligence of the defendant. Judgment was entered in accordance with a verdict for the plaintiff in the sum of $10,000. Defendant appeals from the judgment.

While appellant and respondent were returning from Los Angeles to Long Beach in a Cadillac automobile driven and operated by appellant, mechanical trouble developed in the car. Edens drove the car to the side of the road and asked O'Brien to go to a service station, which was about two hundred yards away, and get a mechanic to repair the car. After examining the automobile, the mechanic stated that he could do nothing there and desired to know if the car could be driven back to the service station. According to the testimony of appellant, he said to the respondent: "The traffic is very thick here on the street at this time of night, and I am afraid to turn around, I am afraid I will kill my engine, but if you will flag the traffic behind me I can safely back up to this garage." (Supp., fol. 552.) Respondent accordingly walked around the car to the rear thereof, and had gone a distance of some five or ten feet when the car, driven by appellant, struck and ran over respondent. Respondent suffered a comminuted fracture of the right leg, contusions above the

[1] Appellant cites, as his first ground for reversal, that "the court erred in repeating some eight times the same proposition concerning the right of the plaintiff to recover damages; and the measure is incorrectly stated." From an examination of the instructions referred to and the instructions taken as a whole we find no merit in appellant's contention. These criticized instructions related to the measure of damages to be awarded in the event of a verdict in favor of the plaintiff. It may be conceded that the instructions on this subject might have been reduced in number without loss of clarity, but the instructions upon other phases of the case must have made it entirely clear to the jury that the court was not expressing any opinion to the effect that the plaintiff was entitled to a verdict in his favor. The fact that an unnecessarily large number of instructions was given on the subject is not of itself a ground for reversal of the judgment. Bergen v. Tulare County Power Co., 173 Cal. 709, 721, 161 P. 269.

[2, 3] With regard to the same instructions above mentioned, appellant contends that the instructions were erroneous in that, with respect to future conditions, they did not limit the jury to considering "only such damages as are reasonably certain to be suffered in the future." The rule governing this matter is stated in section 3283 of the Civil Code. "Damages may be awarded, in a judicial proceeding, for detriment resulting after the commencement thereof, or certain to result in the future." There are several instructions on this subject, and in some of them the court did not use the customary language found in the quoted section of the Civil Code. For instance, the court in one of the instructions advised the jury that they should take into consideration "such prospective suffering and loss of health, if any, as the jury may believe, from all the evidence before them in this case, he has sustained, or will sustain by reason of such injuries." But in another instruction the court said: "If you find for the plaintiff, and it appears from the evidence with reasonable certainty that plaintiff's physical condition will be impaired in the future by reason of said accident, or that plaintiff will suffer inconvenience or loss therefrom, it is your duty to award such sum as will, in your opinion, compensate him therefor." Reading the instructions in connection with each other, they correctly declare the rule of certainty which must be the basis of damages for detriment resulting in the future. A trial court is not required to state all of the law applicable to the case, in a single instruction. Peak v. Key System Transit Co., 88 Cal. App. 354, 365, 263 P. 578.

[4] In his first assignment of error appellant also states that the verdict is excessive in amount. The injuries received by the plaintiff included a broken leg, and other injuries hereinabove mentioned, and he suffered great pain during several months of confinement in the hospital. The award was not so large, in comparison with the damages, as to justify this court in declaring that the verdict was controlled by passion or prejudice.

[5] Appellant urges in his second point for reversal that "the court erred in quoting in substance certain sections of the Motor Vehicle Act not applicable to plaintiff and defendant." The reading of said quoted sections of the California Vehicle Act, in connection with the other instructions given, could not have misled the jury upon either the facts or law of this case. (See Suppl. to App. Brief, fols. 674, 683, 691, 693, being instructions identified as p. 8, p. 18, p. 24, and p. 27.)

[6, 7] In addition to defendant's denial of his own negligence, and his plea charging contributory negligence of the plaintiff, the defendant attempted to make the further defense that plaintiff and defendant were engaged in a joint business and in a joint undertaking in making the trip between Los Angeles and Long Beach during which this accident occurred, and that plaintiff and defendant, with a mechanic, were engaged in a joint endeavor to get the car to the garage for repairs so that plaintiff in particular could get back to the restaurant in which plaintiff and defendant were jointly interested, in order that plaintiff might attend to the evening's business in that restaurant. Evidence having been introduced in support of this defense, defendant requested the court to give to the jury certain instructions declaring and applying to the facts of this case the rule of law, in substance to the effect that if the jury found that both plaintiff and defendant were jointly engaged and acting together in accomplishing the movement of the automobile and were engaged in a joint and common enterprise, then that the negligence, if any, of the defendant must be imputed to the plaintiff, "and if you find that there was such a joint undertaking your verdict must be for the defendant." It is now contended by appellant that the court erred in refusing to give to the jury the instructions proposed by him dealing with this particular defense. Two decisions are cited by appellant as authority on this question. In Callahan v. Harm, 98 Cal. App. 568, 577, 277 P. 529, the rule of imputed negligence in connection with the joint prosecution of a common purpose was stated and approved, but was held not applicable to that case, inasmuch as the plaintiff's authority with respect to control of the agencies employed did not include any right to direct the movements of the person who was operating the machine. In Bryant v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 174 Cal. 737, 742, 164 P. 385, 387, the court declared its approval of the rule or principle of imputed negligence in accordance with an Illinois decision, as follows: "There can be no such thing as imputable negligence, except in those cases where such a relation exists as that of master and servant or of principal and agent. In order that the negligence of one person may be properly imputed to another, they must stand in such relation of privity that the maxim qui facit per alium facit per se directly applies."

The principal instruction on this matter, which appellant contends that the court erred in refusing to give to the jury, reads as follows: "If you believe from the evidence in this case, that plaintiff and defendant were at the time of and prior to the accident involved herein engaged in a business or undertaking in which both of them were interested, and if you believe both of them had a controlling voice and authority in the undertaking and business, and if you believe that after trouble with the automobile developed, they were both jointly engaged in an effort to have the automobile repaired or moved to a place where it could be repaired and both of them were acting together in accomplishing this movement of the automobile, then I instruct you that for that purpose they were engaged in a joint and common enterprise and undertaking, and if you find that they were so engaged then the negligence, if any, of the defendant, is imputed to the plaintiff and likewise the negligence, if any, of the plaintiff, is imputed to the defendant, and if you find that there was such a joint undertaking, then your verdict must be for the defendant."

We find that this would be an erroneous instruction. In no case to which the attention of this court has been directed in which has been considered the question of liability for a negligent act resulting in injury, committed by one individual as against another or others, all of whom are engaged in a common or joint enterprise, has it been held that because of such relationship of the several parties one toward the other or others, an immunity from liability exists for the commission of such tortious act. To the contrary, although the authorities by no means are numerous such as are available indicate that "the doctrine of joint enterprise * * * has no application to actions brought by one joint adventurer against another to recover for injuries due to the latter's negligence" (45 Cor. Jur. 1021, and authorities there cited); and with the rule thus announced this court is in accord.

But even considering the existence of a principle of law in harmony with that for which appellant contends, as disclosed by the record herein, the facts which surrounded the happening of the accident in question were such as to preclude the proper application of any such rule. It may be conceded that there was evidence showing that plaintiff and defendant were partners in the restaurant business, and were both interested in an early completion of their journey so that plaintiff could resume his work in the restaurant; that by reason of this joint interest they were co-operating in an endeavor to move the automobile to the service station; that the plaintiff had gone to the rear of the automobile in order to be in a position "where he could flag the traffic"; that is to say, warn people to keep out of the way of defendant's automobile. But such business of flagging the traffic had nothing to do with the operation of the automobile, which was left entirely in the hands of the defendant.

The judgment is affirmed.

TAPPAAN, Justice pro tem.

This is an appeal from a judgment rendered in plaintiff's favor. The cause of action as alleged in plaintiff's complaint is one for damages arising from a certain collision had between automobiles driven by the respective parties to this action. The complaint alleges negligence on the part of defendant in the operation of his automobile as the cause of the damage. The answer of defendant is, in effect, a general denial of the allegations of the complaint, and also pleads by way of defense, contributory negligence upon the part of the plaintiff and that the damage was the result of unavoidable accident. The only questions presented here have to do with the allegations of negligence.

The facts as disclosed by the record, in brief, are as follows: Plaintiff was driving his car in a southerly direction upon a paved road or street while defendant with two passengers in his car was driving east upon another road that intersected the road upon which plaintiff was operating his car at a right angle. The view of the respective drivers of the cars in question was unobstructed, and they were able to see each other as they approached the intersection of the roadways for five hundred feet or more. One witness placed the distance as one thousand feet. Both drivers testified that they saw the other car approaching the intersection. The testimony on this point is that defendant saw plaintiff when he was three hundred feet from the intersection, while plaintiff testified that he saw defendant's car when it was five or six hundred feet from the same point. There is some conflict as to the speed at which the cars approached the intersection. Defendant testified his car was traveling at forty miles per hour, and that he reduced his speed to fifteen or twenty miles per hour at the time of the collision, and that plaintiff's speed was twenty-five or thirty miles per hour, while plaintiff's testimony is to the effect that defendant's speed was fifty miles per hour and that his (plaintiff's) speed at the time of the accident was twelve to fifteen miles per hour. The collision of the two cars took place at a point at or near the south line of the roadway upon which defendant was driving and near the center line of the street upon which plaintiff was operating his car; that is to say, that plaintiff had crossed or nearly crossed, from the north, when defendant coming from the west collided with him. Defendant and his witnesses testified that the cars entered the intersection at about the same time, while plaintiff testified that some thirty or forty feet before he entered the intersection defendant's car was three hundred feet from the intersection and that he watched it as he entered the intersection and as he crossed it. "I had plenty of time, in my opinion, to cross safely. Q. You were satisfied then you were there first, and so you kept going, is that right? A. Yes." Plaintiff's car was overturned by the impact of the collision and came to rest against the pumps of a filling station some twenty-five feet southeast of the intersection. Defendant's car appears to have traveled but a short distance after the accident.

[1, 2] Appellant's first specification of error is that there is no evidence that he was operating his car in a careless, negligent, and unlawful manner at the time of the collision with plaintiff's car. In support of this contention, appellant cites section 131 of the California Vehicle Act (Stats. 1925, p. 412, § 15), which at the time of the accident read in part as follows: "(a) When two vehicles approach an intersection of public highways at approximately the same time, the vehicle approaching from the right shall have the right of way, provided such vehicle is traveling at a lawful speed." Appellant states his position to be that he approached the intersection at approximately the same time that plaintiff did, and that he was traveling at a lawful speed. To make use of appellant's own language: "Hence we contend * * * that the plaintiff has failed to show by a fair preponderance of the evidence that the defendant did not fulfill the duty required of him to avoid the collision when he saw that the plaintiff did not intend to yield the right of way." The question presented to the trial court for determination was clearly one of fact, and there was evidence of a substantial nature to support the finding made by the court that appellant was negligent. The evidence viewed in a light most favorable to appellant, at best, presents but a conflict in the evidence. "The record shows conflicting evidence, but it discloses some evidence upon which the findings can reasonably be predicated, and under such circumstances this court may not inquire into the weight of the evidence." Kuck v. McConnell, 39 Cal. App. 266, 267, 178 P. 533, 534.

[3] Appellant next contends that respondent was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law. The trial court made a finding negativing this contention, and appellant's position is that this finding of fact is not sustained by the evidence. In the case of White v. Davis, 103 Cal. App. 531, 540, 284 P. 1086, 1090, the court says: "Contributory negligence 'is a question of law only when the evidence is of such a character that it will support no other legitimate inference than that in the one case the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. * * * When the evidence is such that the court is impelled to say that it is not in conflict on the facts, and that from those facts reasonable men can draw but one inference, and that an inference pointing unerringly to the negligence of the plaintiff contributing to his own injury, then, and only then, does the law step in and forbid plaintiff a recovery. * * * Even where the facts are undisputed, if reasonable minds might draw different conclusions upon the question of negligence, the question is one of fact for the jury.'" From an examination of the record presented here, it appears that there was evidence of substantial and satisfactory nature to support the finding as made by the trial court, and, as has been said heretofore, the evidence presents, at best, but a conflict. "Reasonable minds might draw different conclusions upon the question of negligence," and, the question being one of fact, and having been decided by the trial court, may not be questioned upon appeal.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

YORK, J.

Appeal from a judgment awarding damages to plaintiff for the death of her husband caused by the alleged negligence of defendants.

The decedent was walking from north to south in a safety zone across Hollywood boulevard at the intersection of Wilcox avenue in the city of Los Angeles, when he was struck by a taxicab owned by defendant Vincent and coming from the east, while operated by defendant Mider. Decedent thereby received injuries which later resulted in his death.

From a judgment for the sum of $9,500 based upon verdict of the jury, the defendants appeal on the grounds that: (1) The evidence does not justify the verdict, in that (a) the evidence shows no negligence on the part of the defendant proximately causing the accident; (b) that the evidence clearly shows that the accident was due to the negligence of the decedent proximately contributing thereto. (2) That the court erred in its instructions to the jury. (3) That the court erred in denying a motion for a mistrial because of misconduct of the jury. And (4) that the court erred in denying defendants' motion for a new trial.

It is clear from the evidence that the decedent was attempting to cross Hollywood boulevard from the north to the south side thereof within the safety zone extending across that street parallel with the westerly boundary line of Wilcox avenue; that he had proceeded to a point south of the center line of Hollywood boulevard within the said safety zone; that as he stepped off the curb he had looked to his left (the east), and when he reached the center of the street he had then looked to his right (the west); that the taxicab which struck him was proceeding west on Hollywood boulevard, and when it reached the intersection referred to, it veered to the south, cutting into the south half of the street, where the decedent then was walking.

There is attached to and made a part of the record presented to this court, Exhibit No. 1, this being a copy of a map of the intersection of the two streets where the accident occurred, which was used at the trial and marked by the various witnesses as they gave their testimony and at the beginning of the trial had been stipulated to as being correct. This map shows the street car tracks on Hollywood boulevard, and shows the course of the taxicab as it proceeded through the intersection, as testified to by the two witnesses Moehring and Newton, who were occupants of another car approaching the intersection from the west and which was within ten feet of the taxicab at the time of the accident. By these two witnesses the course of the cab is shown to have been west in the usual line of traffic on Hollywood boulevard until it reached the intersection of Hollywood with Wilcox avenue, when it veered to the south or left-hand side of the street, crossed the car tracks on the north half of Hollywood boulevard and continued southerly over the center line of the street to and upon the car tracks upon the southerly half of the street, and then turned to the northwest, apparently to avoid hitting the car of the witnesses Moehring and Newton, and in so doing collided with the decedent. This evidence clearly shows that the decedent had passed the center of the street, and was crossing the car tracks on the south half of the street, and that the taxicab was proceeding westerly on the wrong side of the street.

[1, 2] With this in mind, we are not prepared to say as a matter of law that the evidence shows no negligence on the part of the defendants which proximately caused the accident, nor that there was any negligence on the part of the decedent which contributed to the accident. On the contrary, we believe the jury was completely justified in returning its verdict.

The trial court committed no error in the instructions given and committed no error in refusing to give the instructions requested by appellants.

[3] Appellants contend that the court erred in denying defendants' motion for mistrial and also defendants' motion for a new trial on the ground of misconduct of the jury in that they discussed the case before it was finally submitted to them. During a five-minute recess, after all the evidence was in and both parties had rested, a number of jurors were noticed grouped around the map (to which reference has heretofore been made in this opinion), and to which they were pointing or measuring with a ruler, at the same time conversing among themselves. No one heard what was said by the jurors, and the map had been admitted in evidence and its correctness had been stipulated to. Assuming that this was a technical violation of the court's instruction to the jury not to discuss the case until it was finally submitted to them, it is not shown that it could have been prejudicial to the appellants.

The judgment is affirmed.

CONREY, P. J.

The defendants issued to plaintiff's assignor, Kingman Manufacturing Company, a fire insurance policy on property described therein "while contained in, on or about the premises owned, leased or occupied by the assured, situate; #2000 East 52nd Street, Vernon, California." Under the heading of "exceptions" in said policy were exceptions in which it was provided that the insurance did not cover pig iron, cast iron, and some other specified articles. While this policy was in force, the building and contents were destroyed by fire, and this action followed a refusal of defendants to pay and satisfy the claim of loss. Judgment having been entered in favor of plaintiff, the defendants appeal therefrom.

The argument in support of the appeal raises only two points. These are that the court erred in failing to find on two special defenses pleaded by the defendant; and that the plaintiff is not entitled to recover in any event, because false swearing on the part of the insured voided the entire policy. The "second special defense" rests upon the terms of the policy (Rep. Trans. p. 70), which provide "that this entire policy shall be void * * * in case of any fraud or false swearing by the insured touching any matter relating to this insurance or the subject thereof, whether before or after a loss." Defendants alleged that subsequent to the fire the Kingman Manufacturing Company through its president presented to the duly authorized representative of defendants a proof of loss stating that said manufacturing company was the sole owner of all property destroyed by the fire, and for which indemnity was claimed, except the land upon which said property was situated; that said statement was false and fraudulent, etc., and was made with intent to mislead and defraud the defendants, and that the building for which indemnity was claimed was not owned by said Kingman Manufacturing Company either at the time of the execution of the policy, or at the date of the fire; and that there was no agreement between said parties, excepting from said policy the provisions thereof requiring that, if the interest of the assured in property covered by said policy be other than unconditional and sole ownership, the entire policy should be void, etc., that by reason of said false and fraudulent statement, etc., the policy of insurance is null and void, etc.

[1] It was admitted by the plaintiff that at the time of the fire the insured was not the sole owner of all the personal property which was destroyed. In the "proof of loss" it was stated that the interest of the assured in the land on which the insured building stood was a leasehold interest. Following this in the document was the question: Interest of insured in all property other than the land? To which the answer was, "Sole Owner." It is upon this statement in the duly verified proof of loss that appellants base their contention that the policy became null and void because of false swearing. The filing of said proof of loss was preceded by an adjustment wherein an adjuster acting for the defendants determined the amount of the loss, and in accordance therewith "an adjuster's agreement" was executed between the adjuster and the claimant. From said documents it appears that the amount of loss and damage claimed in the proof of loss was copied from the adjuster's agreement, and that the indemnity provided for in the adjuster's agreement, and claimed in the proof of loss, extended only to property of which the insured was the sole owner. We are of the opinion that, if the court had made findings upon the second special defense, such findings necessarily must have been in favor of the plaintiff. Therefore the omission of such findings is not a proper ground for reversal of the judgment.

[2] The third special defense relates to that part of the indemnity claim, which included loss and destruction of certain miscellaneous articles of cast iron or of cast-iron construction. It should be remembered that in the policy there was an exception from its terms of certain articles of property, among which were "pig iron, cast iron," and some other named substances. The loss accounted for in the adjuster's agreement and carried on into the judgment in this action excluded any item of crude cast iron, but did include damage to finished merchandise of cast-iron construction. We are of the opinion that such fabricated articles of cast-iron construction were not excluded from the protection of the policy, and that there was no merit in said third affirmative defense. We are further of the opinion that the claim of appellant based upon the alleged false statement in the proof of loss presented by plaintiff's assignor to the defendants is without merit.

The judgment is affirmed.

SPENCE, J.

This action for conversion was brought against the defendant sheriff for the alleged wrongful sale upon execution of an automobile. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiff appeals.

The cause was tried upon an agreed statement of facts. It appears that an attachment was levied by the defendant sheriff upon said automobile in an action brought by the Western Bond & Mortgage Company against John McGriff. In that action plaintiff herein duly presented to defendant herein its third party claim based upon an assignment of a chattel mortgage upon said automobile. The attaching creditor thereupon presented to the defendant its verified statement and bond under section 2969 of the Civil Code claiming that said chattel mortgage was void. Defendant subsequently proceeded with the sale upon execution.

The sole question presented upon this appeal involves a determination of the relative rights of the Western Bond & Mortgage Company as attaching creditor and the plaintiff herein as the assignee of the chattel mortgage. We shall therefore proceed to a consideration of the admitted facts concerning said chattel mortgage.

On June 2, 1926, at Canon City in the state of Colorado, said John McGriff executed a promissory note for $876 and the chattel mortgage covering the automobile in question to the "Rainbow Route Garage." Said John McGriff signed his own name as mortgagor and the name "Rainbow Route Garage, By John McGriff" as the mortgagee. The parties have stipulated that the mortgagor and mortgagee "was at all times one and the same person." On said June 2, 1926, the note and chattel mortgage were assigned by said John McGriff to plaintiff herein in consideration of the payment by plaintiff to said John McGriff of the sum of $876. The mortgage was duly filed in the office of the county clerk and recorder of Fremont county, Colo., but the assignment was not filed or recorded. Neither the chattel mortgage nor the assignment was ever recorded in California. Shortly after the execution of these instruments said John McGriff, without the knowledge or consent of plaintiff, drove the automobile to California. On or about July 2, 1926, plaintiff learned that the automobile had been taken out of the state of Colorado, but was unable to locate it until after the attachment had been levied thereon in said month of July, 1926. The trial court entered its judgment in favor of defendant upon the agreed statement of facts as briefly outlined above and its judgment rests upon the theory that the rights of the attaching creditor were superior to those of plaintiff as assignee of said chattel mortgage.

[1-6] In our opinion the judgment must be reversed. The chattel mortgage was not invalid because of the failure to execute and record the same in accordance with the laws of California and if the mortgage was valid under the laws of Colorado it should be recognized here. Mercantile Acceptance Company v. Frank, 203 Cal. 483, 265 P. 190, 57 A. L. R. 696. The mortgage was filed as required by section 5083 of the Compiled Laws of Colorado (1921) and there is no requirement in that state that the assignment be filed or recorded. Respondent argues, however, in support of the judgment that the chattel mortgage as originally executed was invalid for want of parties, the same person being both mortgagor and mortgagee thereunder. 41 Cor. Jur. 375. This may be freely conceded, but we do not believe that it is determinative of the issues here involved. After the note and chattel mortgage were executed, McGriff, in consideration of the payment to him by appellant of the sum of $876, assigned them to appellant and guaranteed the payment of the note by a written agreement of guaranty indorsed thereon. This transaction evidenced by the written instruments definitely indicated an intention by the parties to make the automobile security for the obligation of McGriff to appellant and in our opinion created an equitable mortgage enforceable as between McGriff and appellant despite the defect in parties in the original mortgage. Washington Lumber & Millwork Company v. McGuire (Cal. Sup.) 1 P.(2d) 437; Nau v. Santa Ana Sugar Company, 79 Cal. App. 685, 250 P. 705; Title Insurance & Trust Company v. California Development Co., 171 Cal. 173, 152 P. 542; Peers v. McLaughlin, 88 Cal. 294, 26 P. 119, 22 Am. St. Rep. 306; Tufts v. Beach, 8 Colo. App. 33, 44 P. 771. Ordinarily an attaching creditor obtains a lien only upon the interest which the debtor has in the property at the time of the attachment (3 Cal. Jur. 483), and the facts of the present case do not bring it within any exception to the general rule. The provisions of section 2957 of the Civil Code making chattel mortgages void as against creditors unless executed in compliance therewith as well as the provisions of section 2959 of the Civil Code are not applicable here. Mercantile Acceptance Company v. Frank, supra. We conclude that appellant had a valid lien superior to the lien of the attaching creditor.

Evidence ⇐441(11).

In action on unconditional demand note, parol evidence of contemporaneous agreement to pay note only out of defendant's share of commissions earned jointly by parties in sale of realty held inadmissible; no invalidity, illegality, fraud, accident, or mistake being alleged (Code Civ. Such parol evidence was inadmissible, since it was in direct contradiction of express terms of note, because it tended to establish that note was not payable on demand, but only out of particular fund.

HARDEN, Justice pro tem.

Plaintiff sued upon a promissory note made by defendant and payable on demand to the order of plaintiff in the sum of $2,000. The note was free from uncertainty or ambiguity. The defense interposed was that said note had been made for the accommodation of plaintiff and without consideration to defendant. No issues of invalidity, illegality, fraud, accident, or mistake were tendered. Defendant also filed a pleading denominated "a counterclaim and cross-complaint," alleging several causes of action against plaintiff for money. Parol evidence was received which tended to establish that it was agreed by the parties thereto, at the time of the making and delivery thereof, that said note was to be paid only out of defendant's share of commissions earned jointly by defendant and plaintiff in the sale of real estate. No express findings were made upon the defense that defendant was an accommodation maker. Judgment was entered crediting defendant with the payment of $400 thereon and adjudging that said note was payable only out of defendant's share of said commissions. Defendant was also given judgment upon his counterclaim and cross-complaint for $1,118.49 and interest.

Plaintiff appeals from the judgment and from the denial by operation of law of his motion for a new trial. The only point raised on the appeal is that said parol evidence was incompetent.

The note was an unconditional promise to pay money on demand. The parol evidence received was in direct contradiction of the express terms of said note. It tended to establish that said note was not payable on demand, but, on the contrary, was payable only out of a particular fund. Said evidence was not admissible. Section 1856, Code Civ. Proc., and section 1625, Civ. Code. Said sections lay down rules of substantive law. Harding v. Robinson, 175 Cal. 534, 540, 166 P. 808. Under conditions similar to those existing here, the principles of law involved have been applied to prevent the reception of parol evidence to contradict the terms of written instruments in a great variety of cases. In support of our holding we shall cite only a few decisions dealing with commercial paper. Brown v. Spofford, 95 U. S. 474, 24 L. Ed. 508; San Jose Sav. Bank v. Stone, 59 Cal. 183; Cashman v. Harrison, 90 Cal. 297, 27 P. 283; Leonard v. Miner, 120 Cal. 403, 52 P. 655; Wright v. Shoenhair, 100 Cal. App. 163, 280 P. 174. Our case falls squarely within the rules announced and applied in said cases.

The findings of the court are not such as to warrant our ordering any judgment thereon; and we think this court should not make any findings upon the evidence. The error in the reception of said parol evidence requires a reversal of the judgment and a new trial.

The judgment is reversed. The appeal from the denial of a new trial by operation of law is dismissed.

Ford & Johnson and Fletcher A. Cutler, all of San Francisco, for appellants.

NOURSE, P. J.

Four actions for damages for injuries arising out of an automobile collision were tried jointly. George Kalleg, the driver of one of the cars, sued for personal injuries to himself; his wife, Dorothy, sued for personal injuries to herself; two minor children of these parties each sued through their guardian for personal injuries. The jury returned four verdicts. In the actions of the husband and the wife the verdict found "in favor of plaintiff" and awarded "the damages in the sum of one dollar, $1.00." In the actions of the two minors verdicts for $1,500 were returned in each case. These judgments have been paid, but both husband and wife have appealed upon the same record from the verdicts entered in their cases.

The facts are simple. Kalleg was driving easterly on Market street in the city and county of San Francisco, and, when he reached the intersection of Market, Franklin, and Page streets, he attempted to make a left-hand turn across the west-bound traffic on Market street. At that point four lines of street car tracks are maintained. As Kalleg crossed the east-bound tracks and approached the first west-bound track, he looked to his right, but did not see any vehicle approaching. From that point he crossed over the second track and across the west-bound lane of vehicle traffic without looking to his right—the point from which danger might have been anticipated. The defendant was proceeding westerly about four feet north of the most northerly car track where the cars collided. Neither plaintiff saw defendant's car approaching at any point of their progress.

On the issue of damages, the husband claimed that he had suffered a bruised shoulder and some nervous shock, the wife had a slight scar above the right eyebrow, which was fully healed, and also claimed that she had been bruised about the hip. Both children were cut about the face by broken glass.

[1, 2] The verdicts in the parents' cases are easily explained. Their claims of personal injuries were manifestly feigned and greatly exaggerated. A verdict for either in an amount in excess of their costs of suit would have been a gross miscarriage of justice which the trial court would have necessarily set aside. The evidence of the husband's contributory negligence, which, of course, must be imputed to the wife, was such that the jury should have found against both on that issue. Hence, again, if substantial verdicts had been rendered in their favor, the trial court would have been compelled to set them aside on this issue as well. Thus, when we examine the entire record, including the evidence within the purview of article 6, § 4½, of the Constitution, we cannot say "that the error complained of has resulted in a miscarriage of justice."

Because of this view, it would serve no purpose to discuss Wolford v. Lyon Gravel Gold Mining Co., 63 Cal. 483, where a verdict for plaintiff assessing his damages at $1 was held to be "grossly absurd." That case was decided before the days of open plumbing. A case more nearly in point here is Mosekian v. Ginsberg (Cal. App.) 10 P.(2d) 525, where the Fourth District held that an appeal from a verdict for the plaintiff which assessed his damages at $0 (nothing) was in legal effect an appeal from the order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial, and that, on such appeal, the question for the appellate court to determine was whether the trial court had abused its discretion in that respect. This is in accord with our view.

[3, 4] Another point requires some consideration. The trial court instructed the jury that Kalleg was not entitled to recover because of "grief, sorrow, or resentment * * * on account of any injury sustained by his wife or children * * * or because of * * * any scars, blemishes or disfigurement on the faces of the wife or children." The appellants criticize the instruction, saying that it unduly limited the jury in the consideration of the element of "nervous shock," and they cite Easton v. United Trade School Contracting Co., 173 Cal. 199, 159 P. 597, L. R. A. 1917A, 394, and Lindley v. Knowlton, 179 Cal. 298, 176 P. 440. The criticism is not sound. The element of physical pain, including the "nervous shock" theory, was fully covered by other instructions. This instruction was limited to the element of grief and sorrow because of the subsequent disfigurement or suffering of other members of the family. It is the accepted rule that a parent cannot recover damages upon those grounds because the minor child has his own right of action for the same damage. 17 Cor. Jur. p. 835. Upon the same principle the husband should be denied recovery for such damages arising out of injuries to the wife.

Neither of the cases cited by appellants is in point. They involved the question of fright and fear of the parent for the safety of a minor child at the time of the accident. The instruction complained of was confined to the element of grief and sorrow after the collision and to subsequent distress by contemplation of scars or disfigurements on the faces of the other members of the family.

The judgment is affirmed.

Action by A. Don Duncan against Latane C. Tormey and another. From an order taxing and disallowing costs claimed by plaintiff, plaintiff appeals.

Reversed.

Percy A. Smith and A. Don Duncan, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Ford & Johnson and Fletcher A. Cutler, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

An appeal by the plaintiff from an order taxing and disallowing costs claimed by plaintiff. The reason of the order was that a judgment entered in plaintiff's favor was one which could have been rendered by the municipal court in the city and county of San Francisco.

The action was brought in the Superior Court of the city and county of San Francisco to enforce a lien created by contract upon a judgment entered in respondent's favor against defendant Petersen. The complaint, which was filed on February 14, 1930, alleged an express promise to pay as a contingent attorney's fee 33⅓ per cent. of the judgment recovered; the amount of plaintiff's claim being $1,832. On May 14, 1931, a supplemental complaint was filed, alleging that the judgment had been assigned by respondent to one Millerick, who took subject to plaintiff's lien, and on May 29, 1931, there was filed an amendment to the original complaint by adding a count for the reasonable value of plaintiff's services, alleged to be the above sum, and praying that the same be declared a lien on the judgment. The action was tried by a jury, which returned a verdict for the plaintiff. A judgment was entered thereon by the court declaring the amount claimed to be a lien on the judgment mentioned.

Section 1022 of the Code of Civil Procedure contains the proviso "that the plaintiff shall not recover costs when the judgment is one which could have been rendered by a municipal or inferior court within the county, or city and county, in which the action is properly commenced." Stats. 1929, p. 846, § 1. The parties concede that the Superior Court had jurisdiction of the action, that no municipal court was established in said city and county before July 1, 1930, and that the justice's court was limited in its jurisdiction to $1,000. The parties differ as to whether under the pleadings as finally presented the action was one at law or in equity, and whether in the latter case a municipal court would have had jurisdiction.

But, however this may be, there was, as stated, no court in said city and county except the Superior Court which had jurisdiction of the action when the same was commenced; and, if respondent's contention is correct, then all actions pending in the Superior Court of a county when a municipal court is established therein, and of which the latter court would have had jurisdiction had it been in existence when the actions were filed, will be affected, and in none of such actions can a successful plaintiff recover his costs in the Superior Court.

[1-6] The right to recover costs is purely statutory (Williams v. Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Ry. Co., 156 Cal. 140, 103 P. 885, 134 Am. St. Rep. 117, 19 Ann. Cas. 1260); and, while the Legislature may give to a statute a retroactive operation except in so far as it would conflict with some vested right secured by constitutional guaranty (State Commission in Lunacy v. Welch, 20 Cal. App. 624, 129 P. 974; Herrold v. Reen, 58 Cal. 443), a mere literal construction ought not to prevail if it is opposed to the legislative intention apparent from the act itself; and, in the absence of a clearly expressed intention to the contrary, every statute will be construed to operate prospectively (In re Frees' Estate, 187 Cal. 150, 201 P. 112; Roberts, Thomas & Co. v. Allen (Cal. Sup.) 7 P.(2d) 309); nor will it be construed so as to affect pending proceedings unless such intention is expressly declared or necessarily implied from its language (Gates v. Salmon, 28 Cal. 320; Vanderbilt v. All Persons, 163 Cal. 507, 126 P. 158; East Bay Municipal Utility Dist. v. Garrison, 191 Cal. 680, 218 P. 43; Montecito County Water Dist. v. Doulton, 193 Cal. 398, 224 P. 747; People v. Allied Architects' Ass'n, 201 Cal. 428, 257 P. 511; Blade v. Sup. Ct., 102 Cal. App. 375, 283 P. 81). Here there is no such declaration, nor is the intention necessarily implied from the language of the proviso. The construction contended for by the respondent would work an injustice to parties to pending litigation, a result which it cannot be presumed the Legislature intended; and, in view of the authorities, it is our conclusion that the proviso should not be given a retroactive operation.

The order is reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; L. T. Price, Judge.

Action by the Atlas Mixed Mortar Company, a corporation, against J. P. Stein, the Progressive Finance Corporation and others. From a judgment for defendant finance corporation, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

G. C. De Garmo and Winthrop M. Crane, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Willebrandt & Horowitz, Paul J. Fritz, Goldman & Lieberman, and Derthick, Cusack & Ganahl, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

JAMISON, Justice pro tem.

This action was brought by plaintiff to foreclose a mechanic's lien for material furnished to defendant J. P. Stein. Respondent Progressive Finance Corporation answered, claiming that it was the owner of a deed of trust upon the premises covered by the said mechanic's lien and that said deed of trust was prior to said lien. Judgment was rendered in favor of appellant against defendants Stein, Peet, and Cheroff for the various sums alleged to be owing to it as set forth in the complaint, but adjudged respondent's deed of trust to be superior in point of time to appellant's said lien. Appellant does not deny that the deed of trust is a prior lien, but contends that it was executed without consideration and is, therefore, null and void.

Respondent was the owner of the property in controversy and desiring to sell it listed it with one Kalb, a real estate broker. Kalb worked in conjunction with another real estate broker named Gordon and associated with Gordon and occupying the same office was defendant Stein. Stein was engaged in the building business. Stein agreed to purchase the property for the sum of $34,000, $2,000 of which was to be paid to Gordon and Kalb for the commission in making said sale. On July 9th the said Steins and the Progressive Finance Corporation executed escrow instructions by the terms of which the said Steins were to pay $11,250 in cash and deliver a note for $22,750 secured by deed of trust not to exceed $60,000. The Progressive Finance Corporation placed in the hands of the Title Guaranty & Trust Company, the escrow holder, a deed for said property to be delivered upon compliance with said terms. On July 27, 1928, the said Steins executed their note, secured by a deed of trust to said Gordon, and on the 6th day of August, 1928, the said Gordon assigned the said note and deed of trust to the Progressive Finance Corporation as collateral security for the payment of said sum of $22,750. On the 7th of September, 1928, the said Gordon wrote the said escrow holder, inclosing the $60,000 note and deed of trust, which he stated had been assigned to the Progressive Finance Corporation as collateral security authorizing it to use the same under instructions from the said Steins, and on September 12th, Stein wrote the escrow holder authorizing the said note and deed of trust to be used in accordance with said escrow. On September 8, 1928, the Progressive Finance Corporation requested said escrow holder to place the date of said deed of trust as of September 6, 1928. It appears that the said escrow was closed and the deed to the property was delivered to the Steins and the $60,000 note and deed of trust were delivered to the Progressive Finance Corporation.

J. P. Stein testified the terms under which he purchased the property were that he was to pay $11,250 in cash and to give a note for $22,750 secured by a deed of trust, the amount of the deed of trust to be determined later.

Some time after the date of the escrow, Stein suggested that the deed of trust should be for $60,000. The object in placing the deed of trust at this sum was primarily to secure the balance of the purchase price of said property, to wit, $22,750, and to endeavor to discount said note and mortgage, pay off the $22,750, and use the remainder in his business, and having full confidence in Gordon, he executed the same to him as a matter of expediency.

[1] Appellant contends that the Progressive Finance Corporation accepted a $22,750 note without security in payment of the remainder of the purchase price of said property, but there is no evidence supporting this contention. Appellant cites authorities to the effect that a valid deed of trust must rest upon a sufficient consideration, and others, where the courts have held that there was no consideration; but none of the cases are applicable to the facts as presented by this case. It is true that no consideration passed from Gordon to the Steins for the note and mortgage, but they were executed by the Steins for the purpose of completing and fulfilling the terms of the escrow agreement upon their part, and when Gordon assigned them to the Progressive Finance Corporation the escrow agreement upon the part of the Steins was completed and they thereupon became entitled to receive and did receive the deed conveying to them the title to said property.

[2, 3] Upon a plea of want of consideration a presumption of consideration arises from the writing itself. Moore v. Gould, 151 Cal. 723, 91 P. 616; Civ. Code, § 1614, and 17 Cal. Jur. 953. The burden of proof is upon the party seeking to invalidate the instrument for want of consideration. Civ. Code, § 1615.

We find no merit in the contention of appellant that the note and deed of trust, in the hands of the Progressive Finance Corporation, was without a sufficient consideration.

Appellant having presented no other grounds for reversal, the judgment is affirmed.

Action by Nellie P. Clark against Zetta W. Smith, as executrix of the last will and testament of Ralph H. Smith, deceased. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals.

Judgment modified and, as modified, affirmed.

SPENCE, J.

This is an appeal by the defendant executrix from a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought by plaintiff to recover upon two promissory notes executed by Ralph H. Smith, deceased, during his lifetime.

Deceased died in 1928. Plaintiff held two promissory notes, one dated January 3, 1927, for the sum of $12,000 and the other dated January 10, 1928, for the sum of $5,000. Claims were duly presented to the defendant executrix, and upon her failure to approve or reject said claims within the time provided by law, plaintiff brought this action. The trial court found in favor of plaintiff upon the issues of due execution and consideration and accordingly judgment was entered in plaintiff's favor.

[1, 2] Appellant first contends that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings.

⇐For other cases see same topic and KEY NUMBER in all Key Number Digests and Indexes

*For subsequent opinion see 20 P.2d 937.

The attack is directed solely to the findings relating to consideration. Appellant had alleged in her answer that each of said notes was executed "without any consideration whatever; that said Ralph H. Smith received nothing of value for the execution of said instrument and that plaintiff parted with nothing of value." The trial court made findings that said allegations were not true and found as to each note that "plaintiff paid unto Ralph H. Smith adequate consideration for the execution and delivery of said promissory note." In our opinion these findings are supported by the evidence.

On the trial respondent introduced sufficient evidence to make out a prima facie case and then rested. Thereupon appellant called respondent to the witness stand under section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure in an effort to show want of consideration for the notes. Respondent was questioned in a searching examination covering her affairs over a period of almost twenty years. It appears that respondent met the deceased in 1918 when he acted as her attorney in her divorce action. From about 1920 until a few months prior to his death in 1928, respondent and deceased lived together in the same house in Santa Cruz. The evidence shows that deceased handled her affairs during that time and that respondent had the utmost confidence in the deceased. She testified that he invested and reinvested her money without rendering an accounting; that the notes represented "money that he had of mine, attending to my business"; and that at the time he gave her the $5,000 note he said "he still owed me this $5,000, and it may be some more."

In an effort to discredit respondent's testimony counsel for appellant questioned her at length. Her bank statements running back as far as 1912 were introduced in evidence. Numerous checks passing between respondent and deceased were admitted and also some receipts executed by said parties. Respondent was questioned regarding the estates of her deceased father, mother, and husband, her divorce action, the property, real and personal, owned by her over a long period of time, including notes, mortgages, bonds, and stocks. No detailed account of the financial transactions between respondent and deceased is found in the record. If respondent's testimony is true the money and property coming into the hands of deceased from time to time for her account exceeded the amount of the notes in controversy. On the other hand, the evidence showed that checks totaling several thousand dollars had passed from deceased to respondent over a period of years and that receipts for various securities had passed between the parties in 1925. It is impossible, however, to piece together the fragmentary evidence and determine just how much of respondent's money and property was held by deceased or the manner in which said money and property was invested and reinvested. The relationship between the parties was undoubtedly one of trust and confidence and this may account for the apparently informal manner in which they handled their financial affairs. Respondent claimed that the amount represented by the notes was due her from deceased and that deceased expressly stated this to be the fact at the time of executing the second note. Counsel for appellant states in his brief that the "plaintiff and respondent is practically the only witness in this case, and upon the truth or falsity of her statements rests its merits." This statement impliedly concedes that there is sufficient evidence to support the findings. It is true that during the lengthy examination covering the details of transactions many years before, respondent frequently answered that she did not know or could not recall. It is further true that some of the documentary evidence produced contradicted previous testimony given by respondent. We cannot say, however, that her testimony was so inherently improbable as to be wholly unworthy of belief and the question of the credibility of the witness was one for the trial court. As in our opinion the evidence was sufficient to support the findings without regard to the presumption of consideration arising from the execution of the instrument, we deem it unnecessary to discuss the authorities cited by counsel relating to this presumption and to the burden of proof on the issue of consideration.

[3] Appellant further contends that the trial court erred in its rulings on evidence. After appellant's counsel had completed his examination of respondent, counsel for respondent started to examine her about the withdrawals shown by one of her bank statements which is in evidence. Appellant objected to respondent's "refreshing her memory" from the bank statement. Counsel for respondent argued that the bank statement was being used "not for the purpose of recollection but for the purpose of explaining what they (the withdrawals) were for." Considerable argument followed and thereafter respondent was permitted, with the bank statement before her, to state from her "own knowledge what checks were withdrawn from your bank account and given to Mr. Smith for the purpose of investment." There was no error in permitting respondent to have the bank statement before her for this purpose. Counsel for appellant used the statement in his examination of respondent and he has relied upon said statement showing the deposits and withdrawals both in the trial court and on this appeal. An effort has been made to connect the items on the statement with various transactions. It was proper to permit respondent to identify, if she could, the items which had reference to transactions with the deceased.

[4] Respondent has called our attention to the form of the judgment and has requested a modification. The judgment against the defendant executrix is not in the form prescribed by section 1504 of the Code of Civil Procedure then in effect. We deem it proper to modify the judgment in accordance with the request of respondent, although the point is not raised by appellant.

The judgment is modified by adding thereto the following: "It is ordered, adjudged and decreed that said defendant executrix shall pay said sums so found to be due together with interest, costs of suit and attorneys' fees all in due course of administration." As so modified the judgment is affirmed, respondent to recover her costs on this appeal.

SNODGRASS v. HAND et al.

Civ. 1024.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

Aug. 5, 1932.

Rehearing Denied Aug. 29, 1932.

Appeal and error ⇐800.

Motion to dismiss appeal for failure timely to file transcript was denied, where transcript was filed before motion was made and submitted (Rules of the Supreme and District Courts of Appeal, Rule 5).

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; George H. Thompson, Judge.

Action by Donald Snodgrass, by Karl C. Snodgrass, guardian ad litem, against Henry W. Hand and another. From an adverse judgment, defendants appeal. On plaintiff's motion to dismiss the appeal.

Motion denied.

Edward J. Kelly, of San Diego, for appellants.

Stickney & Stickney, of San Diego, for respondent.

MARKS, J.

This is a motion to dismiss an appeal from a judgment of the Superior Court of San Diego county because of the failure of appellants to file their record on appeal within the time specified in section 1 of rule 1 of the Rules of the Supreme and District Courts of Appeal of the state of California, and seeking to invoke the penalty for the failure to so file the record prescribed in section 1 of rule 5 of the same rules.

The judgment in question was rendered on July 31, 1931. A motion for new trial was denied on September 29, 1931, and notice of this order served on either September 30 or October 1, 1931. Notice of appeal was filed October 9, 1931. On October 9, 1931, an order was signed by a superior judge of the court below giving defendants until November 9, 1931, in which to settle and file a bill of exceptions. Various other similar orders were signed and filed, the last of which purported to give appellant to July 10, 1933, to settle and file the bill of exceptions. We suppose that 1933 is a typographical error. The notice of motion to dismiss, certificate of the clerk, affidavits, and points and authorities, were filed here on June 29, 1932. On July 6, 1932, appellants filed their printed transcript on appeal, and on July 8 filed their opening brief. Appellants filed their points and authorities and an affidavit of their attorney, wherein is set forth that they have a good and meritorious cause on appeal, the reasons for delay in having the bill of exceptions settled and filed, and seeking relief from default under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, if it be considered they were in default. The motion to dismiss was made, argued, and submitted in this court on July 12, 1932. The transcript on appeal bears the following indorsement: "Due service of the within transcript, and receipt of copy thereof is hereby admitted this 6 day of July, 1932. Stickney & Stickney, Attorneys for plaintiff and respondent."

Section 1 of rule 1 of the rules adopted for this court by the judicial council provides in part as follows: "The appellant in a civil action shall, within forty days after an appeal is perfected, except as hereinafter stated or as otherwise provided by law, serve and file the printed transcript of the record, duly certified to be correct by the attorneys of the respective parties, or by the clerk of the court from which the appeal is taken. If a proceeding for the settlement of a bill of exceptions which may be used in support of such appeal is pending or may still be instituted, the time aforesaid shall not begin to run until the settled and authenticated bill of exceptions has been filed, or the time in which a proceeding for such a bill of exceptions may be instituted has expired, or such proceeding, if instituted, has been dismissed by the trial court."

Section 1 of rule 5 of the same rules provides the penalty that may be enforced here for failure to file the record in time. This rule has been construed in Toth v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 113 Cal. App. 55, 297

P. 564, 565, as follows: "Rule V of the rules of this court provides as follows: 'If the transcript, or the points and authorities, though not filed within the time prescribed, be on file at the time such notice is given, that fact shall be sufficient answer to the motion.' In Jaques v. Board of Supervisors, 22 Cal. App. 627, 135 P. 686, 688, the court used the following language: 'Besides, although the language of rule 5 is that if the transcript, not having been filed within the time prescribed, "be on file at the time the notice is given, that fact shall be a sufficient answer to the motion," it has been held that if the transcript, properly authenticated by the clerk of the superior court, has been filed prior to the hearing of the motion, the ground for the motion has thereby been removed. In re Ryer, 110 Cal. 560, 42 P. 1082; Woodside v. Hewel, 107 Cal. 141, 40 P. 103; Warren v. Hopkins, 110 Cal. 506, 42 P. 986, 906; Poole v. Grand Circle, Women of Woodcraft, 17 Cal. Facts disclosed that the mortgagee took a chattel mortgage to secure certain advancements of money he had made to the mortgagor; that the mortgagor operated a dairy and owed his employee a certain sum of money as wages for his services as milker; that employee in less than a month after the execution of the mortgage filed suit to collect wages, and had also secured an award against the mortgagor for compensation for an injury sustained prior to the mortgage execution; and that mortgagee knew of employee's compensation claim, but was unaware of his claim for labor.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

Action by John H. Sullivan against Frank Vera, in which Peter Prestinari intervened. From a judgment for plaintiff, the intervener appeals.

Affirmed.

Fred A. Watkins, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Edmund Scott, of Redwood City, for respondent.

WOODWARD, Justice pro tem.

This is an appeal by the intervener from a judgment in favor of plaintiff for the foreclosure of a chattel mortgage bearing date March 6, 1930, and given by defendant to plaintiff to secure the payment of a promissory note in the principal sum of $6,500, with interest at seven per cent. Appellant, a creditor, intervened in the action as against both litigants, alleging, among other things, that the chattel mortgage sought to be foreclosed had been executed by the defendant Vera, "without consideration and with intent to hinder, delay and defraud creditors," including appellant, and that plaintiff had accepted the mortgage with full knowledge of the facts. It is averred also, on information and belief, that the instrument was not acknowledged before the notary public purporting to have taken the same. The defendant made no appearance as against plaintiff, but filed an answer to the complaint in intervention, denying generally the allegations thereof.

The factual background of the controversy may be epitomized thus: During the month of July, 1925, the defendant purchased a ranch from plaintiff, paying a small amount in cash on the purchase price and executing his note, secured by a deed of trust on the property, for the balance. He thereupon began to operate a dairy on the premises, but soon met with financial difficulties and defaulted in payments due plaintiff. Plaintiff, however, evidently believing the defendant would eventually make a success of his business, began to advance him various sums of money to pay for labor and to purchase equipment, including a tractor, pump, electric motor, piping for irrigation, lumber, and other materials. These pecuniary advances aggregating more than $6,500, began in November, 1925, and ended in January, 1930, at which time the plaintiff, dissatisfied with the arrangement, demanded security for his loans. It was in these circumstances that defendant, two months later, executed the mortgage in question.

It seems that for several years prior to the date of the mortgage appellant had worked continuously as a milker for the defendant, and had failed to draw or demand the greater part of his wages. On April 17, 1930, less than a month after the execution of the mortgage, appellant filed a suit in the Superior Court for the collection of his back wages and, three months later, obtained a judgment against Vera in the sum of $810. It is an admitted fact, also, that on December 15, 1929, appellant, in due course of his employment as a milker for defendant, sustained an injury consisting of a fracture of his right arm. Thereafter he filed a claim with the Industrial Accident Commission, which, on May 7, 1930, made him an award of $9.49 a week for temporary disability, payments to begin as of December 23, 1929. The commission found that the employer was uninsured. On these facts appellant intervened in the present action, claiming that the chattel mortgage was executed in anticipation of his judgment for wages and also of the award for compensation.

The trial court found, in substance, that the mortgage was executed by the defendant for a valuable and sufficient consideration and with no intent to hinder, delay, or defraud the intervener or any other creditor of the defendant; that the instrument was accepted by plaintiff in good faith and as security for a sum in excess of $6,500, which he had theretofore advanced the defendant; that the mortgage was duly acknowledged by the parties thereto before Frank L. Crist, a notary public in and for the county of Santa Clara.

Appellant states in his opening brief that he cannot criticize the trial court's finding on the question of adequate consideration, but insists that the mortgage is invalid for two reasons: (1) That it was given and accepted to hinder, delay, and defraud creditors; (2) that it is not in the form prescribed by section 2956 of the Civil Code of California. The points thus relied upon by appellant in his specifications of error will be considered in the order named.

The first point relied on is the usual challenge to the sufficiency of the evidence to support the trial court's finding on the issue of fraud. Without an extensive discussion of the testimony, it may be pointed out that plaintiff testified he had demanded the mortgage in order to protect his interests; that, when the same was executed, he did not know of defendant's indebtedness to appellant for wages, but was aware of appellant's injury and of the claim filed pursuant thereto; that he did not demand or accept the chattel mortgage for the purpose of enabling Vera to avoid appellant's claim; that said mortgage note did not cover any part of the obligation secured by the deed of trust. The defendant, called as an adverse witness by appellant, admitted the amount claimed by plaintiff and the purpose for which it was advanced. It could scarcely be said that the defendant's testimony was the result of collusion. On the contrary, appellant's counsel terminated the cross-examination somewhat abruptly, declaring at the time: "I won't ask this witness any more questions. I think what he says is true." Mrs. Flossie Tripp, called as a witness on behalf of the appellant, testified that she had executed the mortgage as "Flossie Vera," wife of the defendant; that she was a partner of Vera's; that she had lived with him as his wife, but had never been married to him; that Vera did not tell her of his business affairs, and that she did not know of any advances made him by the plaintiff; that, when she signed the mortgage, she was alone with the defendant, and did not then or thereafter acknowledge it before a notary public; that subsequent to the execution of said instrument Vera had informed her it was "kind of a bluff paper."

Appellant suggests that the admitted facts, together with the circumstances surrounding the transaction, throw more light on the issue of fraud than the parol testimony of the parties. This view seems to be based largely on the assumption that the execution of the mortgage in consideration of a pre-existing debt, and at a time when the defendant owed appellant a substantial sum for wages and had also become liable to him for compensation by reason of the injury to his arm, was in itself an act inherently fraudulent. This contention, as an abstract proposition, cannot be sustained. One who owes another money is not, in every instance, estopped from executing a chattel mortgage to a third person in consideration of a pre-existing debt. On the contrary, except in certain circumstances not present in the instant case, "a debtor may pay one creditor in preference to another, or may give to one creditor security for the payment of his demand in preference to another." Civ. Code, § 3432. And, "in the absence of fraud, every contract of a debtor is valid against all his creditors, existing or subsequent, who have not acquired a lien on the property affected by such contract." Civ. Code, § 3431; Parkinson Brothers Co. v. Figel et al., 24 Cal. App. 701–712, 142 P. 135. It is not suggested in the briefs that appellant had acquired any lien on the property involved prior to the execution of the mortgage.

[1-3] Whether the transaction in question was tainted with fraud was primarily a question of fact for the trial court to determine, and, since its finding thereon is supported by the evidence, we cannot, under well-established rules of appellate practice, interfere. It may be observed parenthetically that the credence to be given the testimony of a witness is a matter wholly within the province of the trial court, and, if the trial court denies credence to the testimony of a particular witness, as manifestly occurred in the instant case, its discretion cannot be disturbed, unless abused. This rule is too well known to require the citation of authorities.

[4] As to appellant's second specification of error: In his complaint it is alleged, as already pointed out, that the mortgage in question was not actually acknowledged before a notary public. Section 2956 of the Civil Code prescribes the form for chattel mortgages, and section 2957 of the same Code explicitly provides that a mortgage of personal property is void as against creditors of the mortgagor and subsequent purchasers and incumbrancers in good faith and for value, unless (subdivision two) "it is acknowledged or proved, certified, and recorded in like manner as grants of real property." It has been held that the term "creditors," as used in the last-mentioned Code section, " 'is general, and applies to creditors existing prior to the mortgage, as well as subsequent.' " Noyes v. Bank of Italy, 206 Cal. 266, 271, 274 P. 68, 71; Cardenas v. Miller, 108 Cal. 250, 258, 39 P. 783, 41 P. 472, 49 Am. St. Rep. 84. The trial court, however, found adversely to appellant on the question of whether the chattel mortgage had been properly acknowledged, and this finding, in similar circumstances, was sustained in the case of Ware v. Julian (Cal. App.) 9 P.(2d) 906, 907, wherein it is stated: "We are satisfied that the prima facie evidence of the certificate of acknowledgment was sufficient to support the finding of due execution even though contradicted by the oral testimony of appellant. This holding not only accords with all the authorities, but is in line with the recent decision of our own Supreme Court in Smellie v. Southern Pacific Co., 299 P. 529."

[5-7] In his opening brief counsel for appellant presents two points which admittedly were not raised in the court below. It is now urged for the first time that the mortgage is fatally defective for two reasons: (1) That the due date of the obligation is omitted; and (2) that the description of the mortgaged property is insufficient. In an effort to avoid the well-known inhibitory rule with reference to points made for the first time on appeal, appellant contends that the plaintiff's complaint, by reason of the defects now presented, does not state a cause of action. This contention cannot be sustained. Assuming that the mortgage in question does not fully comply with the requirements of section 2956 of the Civil Code, this fact would not affect the original complaint as a pleading. As between the mortgagor and the mortgagee, a mortgage is valid and may be enforced even though it does not comply with statutory requirements. Lemon v. Wolff, 121 Cal. 272–276, 53 P. 801, 802; Loosemore v. Baker, 175 Cal. 420–423, 166 P. 26. It has been held that intervening creditors cannot raise or litigate questions as to validity of note and mortgage as between original parties; all they can demand is judgment protecting their interests and preventing enforcement of judgment to their prejudice. Horn v. Volcano Water Co. et al., 13 Cal. 62–72, 73 Am. Dec. 569. Appellant claimed no title to the mortgaged property. His only interest in the foreclosure suit was to prevent a diminution of the defendant's general assets to his prejudice. It may be observed that appellant did not attack the mortgage through process authorizing a seizure of the property. It was said in the Lemon Case, supra, that "only a creditor who has acquired a lien upon the mortgaged property by virtue of some legal proceeding, or who is armed with some process authorizing a seizure of the property" can question the sufficiency of a mortgage which is valid between the parties. Assuming, however, but not deciding, that appellant, by reason of his accrued claims, was in a position to challenge the statutory sufficiency of the mortgage, we know of no rule under which he was relieved from the duty of properly pleading his objections. Aside from the general rules of pleading, section 387 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that one entitled to intervene may, if he is appearing adversely to both plaintiff and defendant, file a complaint "setting forth the grounds upon which the intervention rests." Appellant elected to base his action on fraud. He omitted from his complaint the grounds on which he now relies, and did not raise the points in the court below. It is the law of this state that appellate courts will not review or consider points made for the first time on appeal. Douglas v. Southern Pacific Co., 203 Cal. 390–397, 264 P. 237; Imperial Valley L. Co. v. Globe G. & M. Co., 187 Cal. 352, 359, 202 P. 129; Greene v. Riordan, 97 Cal. App. 462, 470, 276 P. 141.

For the reasons herein stated, the judgment is affirmed.

GRAHAM v. YELLOW CAB CO. OF LOS ANGELES (two cases).

Civ. 7861.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California.

July 29, 1932.

1. Damages ⇐26.

Person injured through another's negligence may recover for damages certain to result in future, as well as those accruing before trial.

2. Damages ⇐216(10).

Instruction to consider "mental anxiety" plaintiff had suffered or would suffer because of her injuries in determining damages therefor held proper, especially where complaint alleged that she suffered great "mental anguish."

3. Damages ⇐50.

Mental worry, distress, grief, and mortification are proper elements of mental suffering, for which person injured because of another's negligence may recover damages.

4. Appeal and error ⇐1033(5).

Instruction to consider "mental anxiety," suffered by plaintiff because of injuries, in determining damages therefor, held favorable, not prejudicial, to her, though complaint claimed damages arising from "mental anguish."

"Anxiety" is at most but form of, and of same nature as, "anguish," though lesser in degree.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Anguish," see Words and Phrases.]

5. Appeal and error ⇐110.

No separate appeal lies from order denying motion for new trial.

Appeals from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Emmet H. Wilson, Judge.

Consolidated actions by Ada I. Graham and Jennie B. Graham, respectively, against the Yellow Cab Company of Los Angeles. From judgments for plaintiffs and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals.

Judgments affirmed, and appeals from order denying new trial dismissed.

Faries & Williamson and McIntyre Faries, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

George C. Watson and Richard A. Dunnigan, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

HOUSER, J.

In a separate action against the defendant for damages for personal injuries which ensued by reason of its alleged negligence, each of the plaintiffs recovered a judgment. For the purpose of trial the two actions were "consolidated." The questions raised by the appellant from each of such judgments, as well as from "an order denying a new trial," are limited to alleged errors committed by the trial court in its instruction to the jury. To all practical intents and purposes, the instruction given in the one action was identical with that given in the other. In the case of Ada I. Graham against the defendant the instruction of which appellant complains was as follows:

"If you find for the plaintiff, Ada I. Graham, then in determining what damages, if any, you are to give to her for the injuries, if any, she received, as set out in the complaint, you may award her such damages in such sum as in your judgment will fairly and reasonably compensate her for the injuries she has received, if any, and in estimating the damages in that behalf, you may consider what before the accident was her health and physical activity, if shown to you, and the extent and nature of her injuries, if any, and also to what extent the injuries, if any, she has received, or any of them, are permanent in their character, as well as the physical pain and mental anxiety, if any, which she has suffered, or will certainly suffer in the future because of her injuries. You may also consider what, if any, effect such injuries are reasonably certain to have upon Ada I. Graham in the future in respect to pain and suffering, and also what, if any, effect such injuries are reasonably certain to have in the future in respect to plaintiff's power to earn money. And you may allow plaintiff such sum as will fairly and reasonably compensate her, but in no event should your judgment be for more than the amount sued for in plaintiff's complaint, to-wit: The sum of $25,000.00."

Specifically, it is contended by the appellant that by the said instruction the defendant was prejudicially affected in its substantial rights because thereby the jury was authorized to assess damages in favor of plaintiff and against the defendant not only for "mental anxiety" which she may have suffered preceding the rendition of the judgment, but as well for such "mental anxiety" and for such general injuries as were reasonably certain to result to plaintiff in the future.

[1] With reference to the right of a person injured through or by the negligence of another to maintain an action against the latter and to recover a judgment therein not only for such proper damages as may have accrued up to the time of trial, but as well for like damages which are certain to result in the future, the law is so well established that it is deemed unnecessary to cite authorities to that effect.

In the case of Worden v. Central Fireproof Building Co., 172 Cal. 94, 155 P. 839, 840, the rule which relates to the sufficiency of an allegation of general damages which have resulted or which may result from a personal injury sustained by reason of the negligence of a defendant is thus stated:

"Complaint is made of an instruction given to the jury, relating to the measure of damages, which is as follows: 'If the injury has impaired the plaintiff's power to earn money, such sum as will compensate him for such loss of earning power.' It was not necessary to allege specially the damage to the complainant from this cause. The complaint alleged that by reason of the injury he had suffered great physical pain, 'and will continue to suffer,' and that the alleged injury to his knee is permanent, 'all to his damage in the sum of $15,000.' This is a sufficient allegation of the damage and it includes whatever loss of earning power may have been caused by the permanent injury stated. Consequences which naturally follow from a personal injury, because of the nature of the injury, are general damages, and need not be specially pleaded in order to recover damages resulting therefrom. Treadwell v. Whittier [80 Cal. 574, 22 P. 266, 5 L. R. A. 498, 13 Am. St. Rep. 175], supra; Sloane v. Southern Cal. Ry. Co., 111 Cal. 668, 685, 44 P. 320, 32 L. R. A. 193; Castino v. Ritzman, 156 Cal. 587, 588, 105 P. 739; Storrs v. Los Angeles Traction Co., 134 Cal. 91, 93, 66 P. 72."

To the same effect, see Scragg v. Sallee, 24 Cal. App. 133, 140, 140 P. 706, 708, wherein it is said that:

"The rule is that the future and permanent effect of injuries directly or necessarily resulting to the plaintiff from the negligence of the defendant need not be specially pleaded in order to warrant proof thereof or recovery therefor. It is only such damages which are not the necessary result of the injuries which must be specially pleaded. Treadwell v. Whittier, 80 Cal. 574, 22 P. 266, 5 L. R. A. 498, 13 Am. St. Rep. 175; Bonneau v. North Shore R. R. Co., 152 Cal. 413, 93 P. 106, 125 Am. St. Rep. 68; Castino v. Ritzman, 156 Cal. 587, 105 P. 739; Zibbell v. Southern Pacific Co., 160 Cal. 237, 253, 116 P. 513.

"There are numerous elements which may enter into the whole of the damage which necessarily results from the infliction of certain bodily injuries. Among these is that of physical and mental suffering which the injured party has endured and will endure from his injuries as the cause (Sutherland on Damages [3d Ed.] § 945), and 'it is not necessary in such a case to state separately the amount of the loss that is caused by each element of damage. A general statement of the whole amount of damage will suffice when all the damage claimed is the natural and ordinary effect of the injuries alleged.' Castino v. Ritzman [156 Cal. 587, 105 P. 739], supra."

[2] It therefore becomes apparent that, even in the absence of a special allegation of damages of the character of that set forth in the instruction of which appellant complains, plaintiff was entitled to have given to the jury just such an instruction as was given to it. But fortifying plaintiff's position in the matter, it appears that plaintiff's complaint contained the following allegation: "That plaintiff suffered numerous bruises, cuts and contusions in and about her head, body and limbs; that plaintiff was thereupon rendered unconscious; that plaintiff's nose was crushed and fractured, and that breathing of plaintiff through her said nose has been permanently impaired; that plaintiff suffered a permanent injury to her right ear; that plaintiff's right arm was bruised, wrenched and injured; that plaintiff suffered an injury to her spine; that her back was severely wrenched, bruised and injured; that plaintiff suffered internal injuries; that plaintiff has suffered since said accident severe and lasting headaches; that she sustained a permanent nervous shock; that plaintiff suffered great physical pain and mental anguish. That by reason of the premises this plaintiff has sustained damages in the sum of Twenty-five Thousand Dollars ($25,000)."

It follows that in the particular under consideration appellant's point is not well taken.

[3] But appellant urges that because by the terms of plaintiff's complaint she claimed damages which arose from "mental anguish" suffered by her as a result of the accident, she may not recover damages for any "mental anxiety" that she may have suffered. In that connection, appellant contends that such a dictionary difference exists between the words "anguish" and "anxiety" that by the instruction given to it the jury was induced to include within its verdict an item of damage for which no recovery legally may be had.

However, whatever technically may be the distinction between the words "anguish" and "anxiety," nevertheless, in accordance with the views which are thoroughly and painstakingly expressed in the case of Merrill v. Los Angeles Gas & Electric Co., 158 Cal. 499, 111 P. 534, 540, 31 L. R. A. (N. S.) 559, 139 Am. St. Rep. 134, the law of this state is to the effect that, in an action for damages for personal injuries arising from a negligent act, "mental worry, distress, grief, mortification, where they are shown to exist, are properly component elements of that mental suffering for which the law entitles the injured party to redress in monetary damages." See, also, Steinberger v. California Electric, etc., Co., 176 Cal. 386, 168 P. 570; Ryan v. Oakland Gas, etc., Co., 21 Cal. App. 14, 130 P. 693; Freiburg v. Israel, 45 Cal. App. 138, 187 P. 130; May v. Farrell, 94 Cal. App. 703, 271 P. 789; Bethurum v. Krumm, 109 Cal. App. 5, 292 P. 287.

[4] Moreover, since by the authorities to which reference has been had, in a proper situation of the parties and the facts relative to the cause of action, a recovery of a judgment in which may be included an item of damage on account of "mental anguish" suffered by the plaintiff is permissible, and since it is manifest that, at most, "anxiety" is but a form of, and necessarily of the same nature as, "anguish," though lesser in degree, it follows that, regarding the instruction of which complaint is made, the specific language or word therein to which attention is directed was in favor of the defendant, rather than as strong against it as other appropriate language or words might have been, and consequently that, by reason of the instruction as given to the jury, the appellant has no just cause for complaint.

[5] It is ordered that the judgments be, and they are, affirmed. Since no separate appeal lies from an order denying a motion for a new trial, it is ordered that appellant's appeals in that regard be, and they are, dismissed.

HAYWARD LUMBER & INVESTMENT CO. v. NASLUND et al.

Civ. 764.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

July 21, 1932.

Rehearing Denied Aug. 11, 1932. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 19, 1932.

1. Mortgages ⇐151(3).

Where future advances under trust deed are obligatory on part of beneficiary, trust deed is prior to mechanic's lien.

2. Bills and notes ⇐167.

Note otherwise negotiable is not rendered nonnegotiable by conditions in mortgage or trust deed or by fact its payment is secured by such mortgage or deed (Civ. Code, § 3265 as amended by St. 1923, p. 193).

3. Bills and notes ⇐370.

Note executed without consideration had potential validity and became enforceable instrument when negotiated to innocent purchaser for value before maturity (Civ. Code §§ 2909, 3109).

4. Mechanics' liens ⇐197.

Materialman's lien is based on owner's title, and lienholder stands in owner's shoes as far as regards innocent purchaser.

5. Mortgages ⇐258.

Promissory note imparts negotiable character to mortgage or trust deed securing its payment, making mortgage or deed in hands of innocent purchaser free from equities between original parties (Civ. Code, § 3265 as amended by St. 1923, p. 193).

6. Mortgages ⇐258.

Holder of subsequent materialman's lien could not impeach prior trust deed for absence of consideration for deed and note where such deed was held by innocent purchaser (Code Civ. Proc. § 1186).

Prior trust deed could not be impeached under such circumstances since the holder thereof took every reasonable precaution to protect his rights before purchasing the note and deed, materialman commenced furnishing materials when the trust deed was already on record and constituted constructive notice to him, and since the negotiable character of the note was imparted to the trust deed which secured its payment making the deed free in the hands of an innocent holder from equitable defenses between the original parties.

7. Mortgages ⇐151(3).

Duly recorded trust deed constitutes constructive notice to persons thereafter furnishing materials and has precedence over any materialman's lien for materials subsequently commenced to be furnished (Code Civ. Proc. § 1186).

8. Alteration of instruments ⇐24(1).

Erasure and substitution in property description in trust deed after execution, consented to by both trustor and beneficiary, did not render deed inadmissible in mechanic's lien foreclosure (Code Civ. Proc. § 1982).

9. Mortgages ⇐186(5).

Evidence in mechanic's lien foreclosure sustained finding that note and trust deed were delivered before lien accrued.

10. Appeal and error ⇐931(1).

Apparent contradictions in evidence must be resolved in favor of judgment.

11. Appeal and error ⇐1010(1).

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Robert B. Lambert, Judge.

Suit by the Hayward Lumber & Investment Company against Sam Naslund and others. From an adverse judgment, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

LeRoy B. Lorenz, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Clyde C. Downing, of Santa Ana, and Harvey & Heard, of Bakersfield, for respondents.

THOMSON, Justice pro tem.

This is an appeal by the plaintiff from the judgment of the trial court, sitting without a jury, in a suit to foreclose a materialman's lien on certain real property.

The principal question presented by this appeal is the matter of priority between a certain materialman's lien and a certain deed of trust.

In the complaint, which is in the ordinary form for the foreclosure of a mechanic's lien, defendant Sam Naslund is sued as the owner of the premises and the purchaser of the building materials furnished by appellant. The trial court found, in substance, that, at all times involved in the action, defendant Stapp was the owner of the real property in controversy; that said property stood of record in the name of the defendant Naslund, but that Naslund had no right, title, or interest in the premises, except a possessory interest, but held the record title for the sole benefit of Stapp; that Naslund commenced the erection of a building on said premises on July 7, 1927, on which day Naslund made a contract with appellant under which appellant, on July 7th, began the delivery of materials to said premises for said building, and continued to deliver such materials for said building until September 24, 1927; that, on November 26, 1927, appellant filed for record in the office of the county recorder of Kern county its claim of lien for said building materials. The trial court further found that, on June 21, 1927, Naslund executed and delivered to Stapp his promissory note, negotiable in form, for $2,500, payable three years after date, and at the same time and as part of the same transaction Naslund executed and delivered to Stapp a deed of trust of said premises, securing the payment of said note; that in said trust deed defendant Security Trust Company was named as trustee and Stapp was named as beneficiary; that the trust deed was recorded in said county recorder's office on July 6, 1927, one day before plaintiff began to furnish said building materials. The trial court further found that, on or about November 26, 1927, for value received, the promissory note was indorsed by Stapp to respondent Hasenjaeger, and at the same time the trust deed was assigned and transferred to Hasenjaeger; that thereafter Hasenjaeger indorsed the note and assigned and transferred the trust deed to defendant Marthasville Bank, and thereafter, for value received, said bank reindorsed the note and reassigned the trust deed to Hasenjaeger, who has been ever since the owner and holder of the note and trust deed and all rights of the beneficiary thereunder. The trial court further found that the execution of said promissory note and said trust deed by Naslund to Stapp was without any consideration, but that neither Hasenjaeger nor the Marthasville Bank had any knowledge or information or belief that the execution of the note and trust deed was without consideration, and each of said last-named defendants became the holder of the note before maturity, and took the same in good faith and for value, and neither of them had any notice of any infirmity in said note or of any defect in the title thereto. The trial court adjudged that the deed of trust was prior to appellant's materialman's lien.

Appellant's lien attached to the premises as of July 7, 1927, that being the date on which appellant began to furnish materials for the building. Code Civ. Proc., § 1186; McClain v. Hutton, 131 Cal. 132, 144, 61 P. 273, 63 P. 182, 622; Powers v. Soule-Martin Lumber Co., 209 Cal. 557, 560, 289 P. 809.

Appellant contends that the materialman's lien is prior to the trust deed for the reason that, although the trust deed was recorded the day before the accrual of appellant's lien, still, as the execution of the note and trust deed was without consideration, it follows that the trust deed did not constitute an incumbrance within the meaning of section 1186 of the Code of Civil Procedure; and that, if the deed of trust ever did acquire a legal status, it must have been when the note and trust deed first changed hands for a valuable consideration, which was after appellant's lien accrued.

[1] In this connection appellant cites a number of authorities holding in effect, that, where a deed of trust which is recorded prior to a mechanic's lien, does not require the beneficiary to advance the entire amount for which it is given as security, but gives the beneficiary an option as to whether or not he will advance such sum, advances made by such beneficiary, after notice of the lien claimant's rights, are voluntary payments, and the mechanic's lien is prior to the trust deed as to those payments. See Owens-Parks Lumber Co. v. McCarty (Cal. App.) 9 P.(2d) 310, March 15, 1932; W. P. Fuller & Co. v. McClure, 48 Cal. App. 185, 191, 191 P. 1027; Yost-Linn Lumber Co. v. Williams (Cal. App.) 9 P.(2d) 324, March 12, 1932. From this appellant argues that, in the instant case, there being no payment of consideration at the time of the execution of the note and trust deed, the principle involved is similar to a case in which the consideration is to be advanced in the future at the option of the beneficiary, and, therefore, the materialman's lien is prior to the trust deed because it accrued before any consideration was advanced or paid for the note and trust deed. It is also well settled that, where the future advances are obligatory on the part of the beneficiary, the trust deed is prior to the mechanic's lien. Fickling v. Jackman, 203 Cal. 657, 662, 265 P. 810; Valley Lumber Co. v. Wright, 2 Cal. App. 288, 291, 84 P. 58. In the cases in which the mechanic's liens are held to be prior to the mortgage or trust deed, the holder of the note and security had notice or knowledge, either by the terms of the instrument itself, or otherwise, as to whether the advances which were the consideration for the note and mortgage or trust deed were optional or obligatory; and, consequently, such holder had notice or knowledge as to whether or not the lien of the mortgage or trust deed would be postponed. Appellant's argument overlooks the very important fact that respondent Hasenjaeger is an innocent purchaser for value. He had no notice of any want of consideration or other defects in the note or trust deed. Neither the note nor the trust deed involved in this case gives any indication that the consideration was to be optional. Even if it were optional, it is not necessary to state that fact in the instrument when the amount of liability to be incurred in it is expressly limited, as in the present case. Owens-Parks Lumber Co. v. McCarty, supra. Each of the instruments provided on its face for an unconditional payment of a certain amount, at one specified time.

[2] So far as the promissory note is concerned, considered apart from the trust deed, there is no doubt that Hasenjaeger purchased it free and clear of all equities and defenses against it. Civ. Code, §§ 3133 and 3138. This is conceded by appellant in its opening brief, which states: "Appellant does not question the liability of any of the parties to the note." Prior to the 1923 amendment to section 3265 of the Civil Code, if a note was secured by a mortgage, the note, although negotiable in form, was not negotiable in law, if the purchaser took it with knowledge of the mortgage. But since said amendment (St. 1923, p. 193) a promissory note, otherwise negotiable in form, is not rendered non-negotiable by reason of the fact that its payment is secured by a mortgage or trust deed, nor is its negotiability affected or abridged by any conditions contained in the mortgage or trust deed securing the same. 17 Cal. Jur., pp. 887, 888; 19 Cal. Jur., pp. 945, 946; Witty v. Clinch, 207 Cal. 779, 785, 279 P. 797.

[3] It becomes important, therefore, to consider in what way, if at all, this amendment affects a mortgage or trust deed given as security for the payment of a negotiable instrument. The lien of a mortgage or trust deed is a mere incident of the debt or obligation which it is given to secure; or, as expressed in section 2909 of the Civil Code, "a lien is to be deemed accessory to the act for the performance of which it is a security, whether any person is bound for such performance or not. * * *" In this connection appellant argues that "there cannot be a mortgage if there is no debt or other obligation to be secured"; and that the absence of consideration for the note and trust deed in controversy was an absolute defense against Stapp, the beneficiary and holder of the note and trust deed, at the time appellant's materialman's lien accrued, because at that time the trust deed was "only a piece of paper; * * * it did not secure a debt because there was no debt between the parties to the note, actually or in contemplation." Such a contention has merit, no doubt, when applied to the parties to the original instruments and those holding under them with notice. It is without merit, however, when extended to bona fide purchasers for value, before maturity, without notice of any defects. As stated in section 3109 of the Civil Code, "absence or failure of consideration is matter of defense as against any person not a holder in due course. * * *" Although, in the instant case, the note while in the hands of the payee was subject to impeachment for lack of consideration, still, even from the time of its execution, this instrument was not "only a piece of paper," as contended by appellant, but it had a potential validity, which, by reason of the statute, became a real, enforceable instrument immediately upon being negotiated to an innocent purchaser for value, before maturity. Such transfer purged the instrument of any imperfections or defenses available to others than a holder in due course. Jones on Mortgages (7th Ed.) vol. 1, §§ 525, 612, 616; vol. 2, § 827a, p. 324.

[4-6] The materialman's lien is based upon the title of the owner and the lienholder "stands in the shoes" of the owner, so far as an innocent purchaser is concerned. If the quality of negotiability which is possessed by the note is imparted to the trust deed which secures its payment, it follows that the holder of a subsequent materialman's lien cannot impeach the trust deed by reason of the absence of consideration for the execution of the note and trust deed, when such trust deed is held by an innocent purchaser. We are of the opinion that, since the amendment of 1923 to section 3265 of the Civil Code, the negotiable character of such a promissory note does impress a similar quality or characteristic upon the mortgage or trust deed which secures its payment. As expressed in 19 R. C. L., § 127, p. 356, "While a mortgage does not of itself possess the quality of negotiability, yet, when given to secure a negotiable obligation, it will, by the weight of authority, so far partake of the character thereof that whenever the obligation is so transferred as to free it from all equities existing in favor of the maker of the note, prior indorsers, or third persons, the mortgage will also be freed therefrom." The same principle is expounded in Jones on Mortgages (7th Ed.) vol. 2, p. 331, as follows: "A mortgage note, if negotiable in form, is of course assignable by indorsement, and the assignee takes the legal title to it. But the debt being the principal thing imparts its character to the mortgage. * * * When, therefore, the debt secured is in the form of a negotiable note, a legal transfer of this carries with it the mortgage security; and inasmuch as a negotiable promissory note by the commercial law, when assigned for value before maturity, passes to the assignee free of all equitable defenses to which it was subject in the hands of the payee, it does not lose this character which it has under the commercial law when it is secured by a mortgage. The mortgage rather is regarded as following the note, and as taking the same character; and it is the generally received doctrine that the assignee of a mortgage securing a negotiable note, taking it in good faith, before maturity, takes it free from any equities existing between the original parties." See, also, 41 Cor. Jur., § 700, p. 683, and § 712, p. 693; American Savings Bank & Trust Co. v. Helgesen, 64 Wash. 54, 116 P. 837, Ann. Cas. 1913A, page 390. The foregoing is the doctrine which is followed in most of the jurisdictions of the United States. Contrary to this general doctrine, however, it is held in a few states that, although the mortgage note is negotiable, the mortgage itself is only assignable in equity, and, therefore, the assignee, having to resort to equity to enforce his rights, is compelled to do equity toward the mortgagor, and allow him all the rights of defense he had against the mortgagee. Jones on Mortgages (7th Ed.) vol. 2, § 838, p. 342. No California cases which have passed upon this question since said amendment of 1923 have been called to our attention, and we assume that the effect of this amendment on mortgages and trust deeds has not been determined by a court of last resort in this state. We are of the opinion that, since said amendment of 1923 to section 3265 of the Civil Code, the majority doctrine should be adopted and followed in this jurisdiction. The contrary doctrine would greatly curtail the use of negotiable instruments, and it would unduly restrict the purpose of said amendment.

In the case at bar, even under the principles of equity applicable to nonnegotiable instruments, appellant's lien should be subsequent to the trust deed. The evidence shows that the respondent Hasenjaeger took every reasonable precaution to protect his rights before purchasing the note and trust deed. He caused a search of title to be made by a title company, he ascertained when appellant began the delivery of the materials, and he learned that the trust deed had been recorded prior to the time the materialman's lien accrued. There was nothing on the face of the promissory note or the trust deed to impeach their validity, or which disclosed any infirmities or defects of title, or which would ordinarily arouse the suspicion of a prudent man that the transaction was irregular or fraudulent in any respect. Since the said amendment to said section 3265, he was not required to investigate the validity of the promissory note, or to inquire as to the consideration or the circumstances surrounding its execution, as he was taking it in due course. Civ. Code, § 3138; Witty v. Clinch, supra.

[7] Contrast Hasenjaeger's precaution with appellant's conduct. The trust deed was on record before it began to furnish materials, and a trust deed which is duly recorded has precedence over any materialman's lien for materials the furnishing of which was subsequently commenced; the record of the trust deed being constructive notice to persons who thereafter furnish such materials. Code Civ. Proc., § 1186; 18 Cal. Jur., p. 125; Middleton v. Arastraville Mining Co., 146 Cal. 219, 225, 79 P. 889; Valley Lumber Co. v. Wright, supra. If appellant had taken ordinary precautions before commencing the delivery of the materials, it would have discovered that the trust deed was recorded, and it could then have taken such steps to protect its interest as might seem advisable. Had appellant discovered the trust deed on record, it could have refused to furnish the materials; or if appellant had discovered the lack of consideration for the note, it, no doubt, could have obtained an order of court restraining the assignment of the note and trust deed on the ground that his materialman's lien was impaired by the fraudulent trust deed, and that appellant was exposed to the chance that the note and trust deed might pass into the hands of a bona fide assignee for value. Jones on Mortgages (7th Ed.) vol. 1, § 628, pp. 1034, 1035. It was the duty of appellant to take such precautions as a reasonably prudent man would have done under similar circumstances, and appellant was negligent in failing to ascertain that the trust deed was on record. Jones on Liens (3d Ed.) § 1545, p. 781; Owens-Parks Lumber Co. v. McCarty, supra. It is also a legal maxim that, when one of two innocent persons must suffer by the act of a third, he, by whose negligence it happened, must be the sufferer. Civ. Code, § 3543.

It follows, therefore, that the trial court did not err in its conclusion of law and judgment that the trust deed held by Hasenjaeger is prior to appellant's materialman's lien.

[8] Appellant next contends that the trust deed was not admissible in evidence under section 1982 of the Code of Civil Procedure, for the reason that a correction was made therein, after its execution, consisting of an erasure of "four (4)" and the substitution therefor of "three (3)," after the word "block" in the description of the property. The evidence shows that a mistake was made in the description; that it was intended by the parties to execute a trust deed on lot three; that, after the instrument had been recorded on June 22d, the mistake was discovered and collected and the trust deed recorded on July 6th, before appellant began the delivery of any materials. Appellant claims that the evidence does not show that the trustor consented to the alteration. The evidence does show, however, that it was intended by the trustor and the beneficiary named in the instrument to have the trust deed cover lot three, instead of lot four; that the trust deed was a "dummy" transaction as between Naslund, the trustor, and Stapp, the beneficiary, the trustor claiming no interest in the trust deed or the property covered thereby; that Naslund merely held the record title for the benefit of Stapp; and that Stapp consented to the correction. Under the circumstances of this case, as between appellant and Hasenjaeger, the instrument was admissible in evidence.

[9] Appellant advances the further contention that the trial court's finding to the effect that the note and trust deed were delivered before appellant's lien accrued, is not supported by the evidence. But the witness Naslund testified, in substance, that he executed the trust deed in controversy to Stapp; that, at the time, he (Naslund) understood that he was executing a trust deed of the property involved in this action to Stapp; that he signed the note in controversy and thereupon he "handed it back to Mr. Stapp." Again, in answer to a question by the court, he testified as follows: "The court: * * * and then you made this note and trust deed and gave it back to him (Stapp) * * *?" To which question the witness answered "Yes." In addition to this, Stapp testified that he got the trust deed from Naslund. Such evidence warranted the trial court in making the finding complained of by appellant.

[10, 11] Appellant further asserts that the findings relating to transfers of the note and trust deed are unsupported by evidence. There is a considerable amount of evidence in the record with respect to these transfers. We deem it unnecessary to discuss it, except to say that the apparent contradictions must be resolved in favor of the judgment, and that there is ample evidence to support the findings criticized by appellant. A reviewing court is not justified in disturbing a judgment unless it appears that upon no hypothesis is there sufficient substantial evidence to support it. Packer v. Wagner, 109 Cal. App. 26, 32, 292 P. 523; Waxman v. Jennings, 72 Cal. App. 671, 674, 238 P. 98; Taylor v. U. S. Fidelity & Guaranty Co., 86 Cal. App. 382, 386, 260 P. 898.

The judgment is affirmed.

HOUSER, J.

Defendant Gardner and one Stromberg were charged with the commission of the crime known as "possession of a still," alleged to have been operated by them for the purpose of manufacturing intoxicating liquor for beverage purposes.

On the trial, after all the evidence had been introduced, through his attorney, defendant Stromberg indicated "that he would change his plea to the court and plead guilty." Thereupon the trial court found each of the defendants "guilty of the offense charged, to-wit, the possession of a still, a felony." From the ensuing judgment, as well as from an order by which his motion for a new trial was denied, defendant, Gardner, has appealed to this court.

[1] It is first urged by appellant that the evidence adduced on the trial of the action was insufficient to support the judgment.

Although not established without contradiction as to each of several important items of testimony, from the record and based upon substantial evidence, it may be assumed that the jury believed that on several different occasions the two defendants together called at a real estate office for the ostensible purpose of renting a chicken ranch for the use of defendant Stromberg. As was testified by a salesman who was employed by the proprietor of the real estate office:

Defendant Gardner said "that he wanted to rent a ranch with some chicken equipment for his partner, there; that he wasn't very well, and he wanted to get him out in the country; that he wanted to get in the chicken business. I told him we had a dandy place, just about what he wanted. He said he didn't want a big house; just a small house with a few rooms, and that this was a dandy place for him; and I took him over there to 1917 Holly and showed him the place.

"Q. What else was said there? A. Well, they looked the place over, and they went all over the chicken equipment and through the house. * * *

"Q. Then what happened after that? A. Well, I think we disbanded then and there and they came back later on, as near as I can remember.

"Q. Where did you see them the next time? A. Why, they came back to the office, and something was said about a lease—they were going to draw up a lease, and, of course, I had nothing to do with the lease. The broker took care of the lease.

"Q. And were both defendants together at that time? A. Yes, sir."

The real estate broker who was the employer of the salesmen in his office, testified that he had seen defendant Stromberg at the real estate office on several different occasions, and that on the third visit of defendant Stromberg to the office, under the name of "Harry Allen," Stromberg signed a lease of the chicken ranch. It also appeared that the defendants were arrested within two weeks after the lease of the chicken ranch was executed, at which time the still was in full operation. A police officer testified that in a chicken house on the leased premises he found a complete still for the manufacture of intoxicating liquor; that at the time they were arrested for the commission of the offense in question the two defendants were together on the leased property, "sitting in the car directly back of the house, between the house and the garage." According to the testimony of defendant Gardner, he was the owner of the automobile to which the policeman referred, but that on several different occasions within the two weeks following the leasing of the chicken ranch he rented the automobile to defendant Stromberg, although on each of such occasions defendant Gardner "would drive it for him" (Stromberg). It also appeared that, at the time when defendants were arrested, defendant Stromberg had two keys in his possession which, respectively, fitted the outer and the inner door of the chicken house in which the still was operated. Sufficient evidence was introduced to justify the conclusion by the trial court that at the time of his arrest defendant Gardner had in his possession a similar set of keys; that said keys and the keys in the possession of defendant Stromberg were manufactured by the same company; that defendant Gardner purchased and paid for certain "black iron gas pipe," which was delivered by the seller thereof on the leased property; and that pipe similiar in size and character was used in the construction and the operation of the still.

In the case of People v. Borrego, 211 Cal. 759, 297 P. 17, wherein in many respects the facts were similar to, but taken together were much weaker than, those which relate to the instant case, the Supreme Court ruled that the evidence was sufficient to support a verdict of guilt of the defendant. Likewise in People v. Mitsunaga, 91 Cal. App. 298, 266 P. 1020, and People v. Helt, 100 Cal. App. 279, 279 P. 1046. Primarily the question of whether the evidence established the guilt of defendant was for the determination of the trial court; and, since its conclusion appears to have been based upon substantial and sufficient evidence, it is not the province of this court to disturb the ensuing judgment. As is stated in People v. Martinez, 20 Cal. App. 343, 344, 128 P. 952, 953, and reiterated in People v. Mitsunaga, 91 Cal. App. 298, 301, 266 P. 1020: "* * * Where the circumstances are such as to reasonably justify an inference of guilt, as found by the jury, the fact that an inference of innocence might likewise be reasonably drawn therefrom does not present a question of law for review by an appellate court any more than does a verdict based upon direct conflicting evidence; in neither case will the verdict be disturbed. * * *"

[2] Appellant also contends that the trial court erred in overruling his objection to a compound question asked by the prosecution of one of its witnesses. Although it is manifest that the objection was well taken and properly might have been sustained by the trial court, since the effect produced no substantial prejudice to the rights of defendant, the error should not result in a reversal of the judgment.

A further specification of error by appellant, which consists in a complaint that, over the objection of defendant, various exhibits were received in evidence, is not (the record considered) worthy of serious attention by this court.

The judgment and the order by which the motion for a new trial of defendant was denied are affirmed.

MARKS, J.

Petitioner brought this action in the court below by filing his petition for writ of mandate to compel payment of a warrant drawn in his favor on the funds of the Stratford public utility district in the possession of respondent. This warrant was drawn by the board of directors of the district, and was for services rendered by petitioner in the sale of bonds. The cause was submitted to the trial court upon an agreed statement of facts, and judgment rendered for respondent. Petitioner has appealed from this judgment.

From the agreed statement of facts it appears that the Stratford public utility district is a public utility district organized in Kings county under the provisions of an act providing for the incorporation and operation of such districts in unincorporated territory. Stats. 1921, p. 906. Under the terms of this act, the county treasurer of Kings county, respondent here, was made the acting treasurer of the district and custodian of its funds. The district was governed by a board of directors.

On the 11th day of August, 1930, the electors of the district authorized the issuance of bonds in the sum of $30,000 for the acquisition, construction, and completion of a waterworks system for the distribution of water within the district. The board of directors made several unsuccessful attempts to sell these bonds.

Under date of October 10, 1930, petitioner addressed a letter to the board of directors, wherein he offered to find a purchaser for the bonds who would pay their par value and accrued interest to the date of delivery. This offer was in consideration of the payment to him of a commission of $1,625. The bonds were dated September 1, 1930. The offer was accepted by the board of directors on the day of its receipt.

Petitioner produced a purchaser, to whom the bonds were sold, and presented a demand for the payment of his commission. This was allowed by the board of directors and a warrant drawn upon respondent, but payment was refused upon the ground that the expenditure was not authorized by law. It is stipulated in the agreed statement of facts that the sum of $1,625 is a reasonable amount to be paid as a commission for the sale of the bonds and "that the work contemplated by said proposition as set forth in the notice of election has been completed and paid for in full and that there still remains from the sale of said bonds sufficient money to pay said order, requisition and warrant in full."

The sole question to be considered on this appeal is whether or not, under the circumstances disclosed by the record, the district can pay petitioner a commission for the sale of bonds out of the moneys received from the sale of these bonds, which were issued for the purpose of the acquisition, construction, and completion of a water works system under the terms of the Public Utilities District Act. We have been referred to no case in California which is decisive of this question.

We find in the Public Utilities District Act (Stats. 1921, p. 906) the following provisions: "Sec. 32. * * * The bonds so issued shall be issued in denominations of not less than one hundred dollars and not more than one thousand dollars, and may be sold by the board of directors at such times and in such manner as they shall determine, but shall not be sold at less than par and accrued interest. Any such bonds shall have the same force, value, and use as bonds issued by a municipality of this state. The proceeds from the sale of bonds shall be placed in the treasury to the credit of the proper fund, and shall be applied exclusively to the purposes and objects mentioned in the ordinance authorizing their issue until such objects are fully accomplished; after which, if any surplus remains, such surplus may be transferred to the general fund; except that if such surplus exceeds the sum of five thousand dollars, then such surplus and the whole thereof shall be transferred to the appropriate fund or funds to pay interest and maintain the sinking fund, or provide for the retirement of the bonded indebtedness in connection with which such surplus remains. * * * Sec. 45. The board of directors or other officers of the district shall have no power to incur any debt or liability whatever, either by issuing bonds or otherwise, in excess of the express provisions of this act, and any debt or liability incurred in excess of such express provisions shall be and remain absolutely void."

[1] It clearly appears from the portion of section 32 of the Public Utilities District Act which we have quoted that the Legislature did provide and require that all moneys received from the sale of the bonds should be first used exclusively for the purposes named in the call for the election authorizing their issuance; that if, after the utility has been fully completed and paid for, there remained a surplus exceeding the sum of $5,000, such surplus should be transferred to an appropriate fund and used exclusively to pay interest upon the bonds and maintain the sinking fund or provide for the retirement of the bonded indebtedness; that, if a surplus remained amounting to $5,000 or less, it might be transferred to the general fund of the district. It is apparent that the only circumstance under which the petitioner might be paid his commission out of the bond money would be when a surplus remained that did not exceed $5,000. The record does not disclose the amount of the surplus which remained; the agreed statement of facts merely containing the statement that the surplus was sufficient to pay the $1,625 demanded by petitioner.

[2] It is fundamental that a judgment will not be reversed unless error appears in the record. In order that error might be made to appear, we would have to assume that the surplus did not exceed $5,000. We cannot presume error in order to reverse a judgment; therefore we must affirm it where none is made to appear.

Nothing which we have said should be construed as holding that the commission could be paid to petitioner if the surplus were $5,000 or less. This question is not decided. However, the reasoning and arguments used in the following cases would seem to point to the conclusion that it should not be paid. Stephens v. Richardson, 184 Cal. 721, 195 P. 651; Ellis v. Stephens, 185 Cal. 720, 198 P. 403; Hunter v. County of Santa Barbara, 110 Cal. App. 698, 294 P. 1082; Peery v. City of Los Angeles, 187 Cal. 753, 203 P. 992, 19 A. L. R. 1044; Uhler v. LOWY v. McKEON DRILLING CO. et al.

Civ. 8290.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California.

Aug. 13, 1932.

1. Mines and minerals ⇐109.

Contract giving certain portion of any oil produced for drilling services gave no proprietary interest in land, nor in any production therefrom except as produced under contract.

Lessee entered into drilling contract with plaintiff's predecessor, whereby latter was granted right to drill for oil on two separate parcels of land and right to receive for his services a portion of oil produced by such drilling operations. Plaintiff's contention that under this contract he became vested with an interest in whatever hydrocarbon substances were afterwards produced, from any part of the lot, regardless of when, how, or by whom they were produced, was without merit, since the drilling contract on which plaintiff's right of ownership was based carried no proprietary interest in the land, nor in the production therefrom except such as was produced by drilling operations prosecuted thereunder, and plaintiff therefore had no interest in the oil produced under another contract.

2. Mines and minerals ⇐109.

That grantee of right to drill for oil capped second well and removed equipment held not to authorize finding of forfeiture of rights on theory of abandonment.

The fact that plaintiff's predecessor capped second well before it was brought on production, and removed equipment, did not operate as a forfeiture of future rights under the drilling contract because under the terms thereof he had the right thereafter, and at any time up to expiration of lease, to re-enter premises and resume drilling operations thereon, since he had completed a producing well on the west half of lot as required by contract.

Action by Charles F. Lowy against the McKeon Drilling Company and others for declaratory relief. From an adverse judgment, plaintiff appeals.

KNIGHT, J.

This is an action for declaratory relief. It was alleged in the complaint that for several years past plaintiff had been the owner of 8¼ per cent. "of the oil, gas and other hydrocarbon substances produced, saved and sold from the East half of Lot Five (5) in Block One (1) of Webber Tract No. Two (2)," in Los Angeles county, that by mesne assignments the defendant Three-In-One Petroleum Corporation acquired the lease to said premises and sublet the same to the defendant G. C. Fairchild, who in December, 1927, entered into a contract with the McKeon Drilling Company to complete the drilling of an oil well thereon and bring the same on production; that as a result of said contract plaintiff's ownership in a portion of the oil production from said premises was repudiated; and he asked, therefore, that his rights thereto be determined, and that he be granted such other relief as would be just and equitable. The defendants filed separate answers, consisting merely of denials of plaintiff's ownership in any of the substances produced on the east half of said lot. The judgment was that plaintiff take nothing by his action, and therefrom plaintiff has taken this appeal.

It appears from the evidence that on February 17, 1922, W. H. Biel, as lessee entered into a drilling contract with R. C. Steel, whereby the latter was granted the right to drill for oil on two separate parcels of land and to receive for his services a portion of the oil produced by such drilling operations. Parcel 1 included property not here involved. Parcel 2 embraced all of lot 5 of the Webber tract; and by mesne assignments plaintiff acquired an 8¼ per cent. interest in the oil, gas, and other hydrocarbon substances produced, saved, or sold as a result of the drilling operations prosecuted under the Steel contract. Pursuant to the Steel contract, a producing well was completed on parcel 1, and afterwards a producing well was completed on the west half of parcel 2 (lot 5). Thereafter drilling operations were started on the east half of lot 5; but before the well was brought on production the hole was capped, the equipment was dismantled, removed, and sold, and nothing further was done toward developing the well until about five years later, when the defendant McKeon Drilling Company, operating under the drilling contract let by Fairchild, the sublessee of the Three-In-One Petroleum Corporation, which had acquired the Biel lease, entered upon the premises, reopened the well, continued the drilling, and brought the well on production. The trial court found that plaintiff was not entitled to any portion of the hydrocarbon substances produced under the McKeon contract; and the evidence supports such finding, because, as shown, plaintiff's ownership in any of the production from said lot 5 or elsewhere was restricted to substances produced under the Steel drilling contract. He acquired no interest whatever in the production under the McKeon contract.

[1] The main argument advanced by plaintiff with reference to the above finding is that, inasmuch as an oil producing well was completed on the west half of said lot 5 under the Steel contract, the parties claiming thereunder were vested with an interest in whatever hydrocarbon substances were afterwards produced, saved, or sold from any part of said lot, regardless of when, how, or by whom they were produced. There is no force in the argument, for the reason that the Steel drilling contract upon which plaintiff's right of ownership is founded carried no proprietary interest in the land, nor in any of the production therefrom except such as was produced by the drilling operations prosecuted under the Steel contract; and, to repeat, there was no production thereunder from the east half of said lot. Whether or not the letting of the McKeon contract amounted to a breach of the Steel contract is a question not here involved; the action being one purely for declaratory relief.

[2] The trial court went much farther, however, and found that "the predecessors in interest of the plaintiff abandoned said premises [the east half of lot five], and all rights theretofore by them, or any of them, acquired in said premises under and by virtue of said [Steel] drilling agreement aforesaid," and concluded as matter of law therefrom that "plaintiff has no right, title or interest in or to any of the oil, gas or other hydrocarbon substances produced, saved or sold from the East Half of Lot Five. * * *" As will be observed, the effect of such finding and conclusion was to declare a forfeiture of all future drilling rights under the Steel contract as to the east half of lot 5 as of the date of the rendition of said findings, to wit, July, 1929. In the state of the pleadings above set forth and in the absence of any affirmative defenses pleaded in that behalf, it may be seriously doubted, as plaintiff contends, whether the trial court had the authority to declare a forfeiture of the rights acquired under the Steel drilling contract; but, assuming that it did, the evidence, in our opinion, is legally insufficient to support a finding and conclusion to that effect. As will be noted, they were based entirely upon the fact that, after starting the second well on lot 5, the hole was capped and the equipment dismantled and sold. But the evidence shows without dispute that the lease held by Biel at the time he entered into the Steel drilling contract fixed a ten-year term. The lease was dated September 30, 1921, which gave Biel until September, 1931, to develop oil on any part of lot 5, and the right to enter into drilling contracts covering the entire period of the lease. The Steel contract was drawn to that effect, no limitation of time being placed on the termination of the drilling operations to be prosecuted thereunder. In this regard it provided that, if Steel performed the terms and conditions thereof pertaining to parcel 1, he was given the option of drilling on parcel 2 (lot 5), providing drilling operations were commenced within a specified time. It further provided that if he "shall perform the conditions and terms of this agreement and shall actually start the drilling operation on parcel No. 2, and the drilling of the well thereon as hereinbefore specified he shall continuously and in good faith prosecute the work of drilling said well with all due diligence until the oil producing sands under said parcel are found or until he is satisfied that said parcel is not oil bearing." And, continuing, said contract read: "It is the intention of this agreement and the second party agrees to perform each and all of the terms and conditions of the oil leases held by the party of the first part upon each of said premises hereinbefore described, he, however, binding himself only to drill a well upon parcel No. 1, and having the option of drilling a well on parcel No. 2. If, however, he proceeds to drill a well on parcel No. 2 he shall perform all of the terms and conditions of the oil lease on said parcel No. 2." Admittedly Steel complied with all the terms and conditions of said contract as to parcel 1. Thereupon he entered upon parcel 2 and performed the terms and conditions of said contract with respect thereto by completing a producing well on the west half of lot 5, following which he started to drill a second well on lot 5, to wit, on the east half thereof; but, as stated, in May, 1923, before the same was brought on production, he discontinued the drilling operations, capped the hole, and removed the equipment. However, having completed one producing well on said parcel, he complied with his contract, which did not require him to drill a second well thereon, although he had the option of doing so. And, if he started to drill a second well, there was nothing in said contract requiring him to complete the same and bring it on production within any specified time, or which required him to drill continuously. Therefore the fact that in May, 1923, he capped the second well before it was brought on production, and removed the equipment, did not operate as a forfeiture of future rights under the contract because, as shown under the terms thereof, he had the right thereafter, and at any time up to the expiration of the Biel lease, to re-enter the premises and resume drilling operations thereon. And, that being so, he was entitled to declaratory relief to that effect.

For the reasons stated, the judgment is reversed, with directions to the trial court to modify its findings on the issue of abandonment and thereupon to re-enter judgment defining plaintiff's rights under the Steel contract in conformity with the views herein expressed.

MARKS, Acting P. J.

Appellants, who had a permit from the railroad commission of California to operate as a transportation company under the provisions of the Auto Stage and Truck Transportation Act (Stats. 1917, p. 330, and the acts amendatory thereof), instituted this action to enjoin respondents from transporting goods over the public highways of the state, alleging that they were operating as a transportation company as defined in the aforementioned act without a permit from the railroad commission. Judgment was rendered for respondents. This judgment is attacked here upon the ground that the findings upon which it rests are not supported by the evidence.

The facts in this case are not involved and the law applicable to them is so well settled that an extended discussion of them is unnecessary.

[1] The portions of the Auto Stage and Truck Transportation Act applicable here bring under its terms a transportation company operating as a common carrier over any public highway in the state between fixed termini, or over a regular route and not operating exclusively within an incorporated city and town. In Forsyth v. San Joaquin Light, etc., Corp., 208 Cal. 397, 281 P. 620, 623, the Supreme Court said: "Section 2168 of the Civil Code defines a common carrier as follows: 'Every one who offers to the public to carry persons, property, or messages, excepting only telegraphic messages, is a common carrier, of whatever he thus offers to carry.' 'Private carriers are such as carry for hire and do not come within the definition of common carrier. Certain prominent characteristics mark the difference between these two classes. To impress upon one the character of common carrier it must be shown that he "undertakes generally and for all persons indifferently to carry goods and deliver them for hire; and that his public profession of his employment be such that if he refuses, without some just ground, to carry goods for anyone, in the course of his employment and for a reasonable and customary price, he will be liable to an action." On the other hand, private carriers are not bound to carry for any person unless they enter into a special agreement so to do.' 4 Cal. Jurs. 815. This same principle is enunciated in the case of Associated Pipe Line Co. v. Railroad Commission, 176 Cal. 518, L. R. A. 1918C, 849, 169 P. 62, 65. In that case this court said, quoting in part from the case of Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113, 24 L. Ed. 77 [see, also, Rose's U. S. Notes]: ' "When, therefore, one devotes his property to a use in which the public has an interest, he, in effect grants to the public an interest in that use, and must submit to be controlled by the public for the common good, to the extent of the interest he has thus created." But so long as he uses his property for private use, and in the absence of devoting it to public use, the public has no interest therein which entitles it to a voice in its control.'" See, also, Klein v. Baker, 112 Cal. App. 157, 296 P. 631.

[2] The evidence in the record discloses that the respondents were engaged in the operation of a trucking business and transported personal property to any destination to which its consignee directed delivery. They maintained no fixed terminus unless the garage in Escondido, where their trucks were kept when not in operation, could be held to be such a terminus. They accepted goods for transportation only upon special contracts and did not undertake "generally and for all persons indifferently to carry goods and deliver them for hire." They consistently refused to accept goods for transportation from shippers generally and maintained that as they were private carriers they were not obliged to do so. The trial court found in accordance with these facts. The findings are amply supported by the evidence and support the judgment. This makes it unnecessary to consider other findings attacked by appellants as not supported by the evidence. Where a judgment is supported by all necessary findings based upon material and competent evidence, other findings made are not essential and become immaterial and need not be considered on appeal.

Judgment affirmed.

MERRILL et al. v. HOOPER et al.

Civ. 8265.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California.

July 26, 1932.

Rehearing Denied Aug. 25, 1932.

1. Quieting title ⇐44(3).

In action to quiet title to triangular parcel of realty at dividing line between tracts, testimony of competent engineer, produced by defendant, pursuant to survey made, held not conclusive.

Testimony of competent engineer engaged by the defendant, pursuant to survey made by him, was not binding on trial court, where survey was based on identification by defendant of locations of original monuments in accordance with her recollection thereof, and especially in view of fact that testimony of plaintiff and defendant was in sharp conflict.

2. Appeal and error ⇐931(1).

Where trial court determined issue in plaintiff's favor, appellate court must assume on appeal that conflict in evidence was resolved in plaintiff's favor, and appellate court is concluded thereby.

3. Adverse possession ⇐114(1).

In action to quiet title to triangular strip between tracts, evidence held to establish title in plaintiffs by adverse possession (Code Civ. Proc. § 322).

4. Adverse possession ⇐25.

In determining title by adverse possession, possession by tenants of adverse claimants constitutes their possession (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 322, 326).

5. Adverse possession ⇐44.

Temporary periods of vacancy, not evincing intention to abandon possession, do not interrupt continuity of adverse claimants' possession (Code Civ. Proc. § 322).

6. Adverse possession ⇐111.

Complaint in action to quiet title, alleging fee ownership in plaintiff, held sufficient to present question of title by adverse possession (Code Civ. Proc. § 322).

OGDEN, Justice pro tem.

This is an appeal from a judgment quieting title to a triangular parcel of real property, improved with a building, situated on the northwest corner of Thirty-Third and Hooper avenues in the city of Los Angeles. The complaint is in the usual simple form, alleging ownership in fee in the respondent Lucile A. Merrill as her separate property. The answer denies ownership in respondents, and alleges it to be vested in appellant. By way of affirmative defense the latter alleges therein that she has been in the adverse possession of the premises, under claim of title, for more than the five-year statutory period prior to the commencement of the action, and that respondents' cause of action, if any there were, was barred by the provisions of sections 318, 319, and 322 of the Code of Civil Procedure. A cross-complaint containing corresponding allegations, was also filed by appellant. The answer to the cross-complaint, in addition to denying the allegations thereof, likewise set up the same provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure in bar of appellant's cause of action, if any had existed. The trial court found in favor of the allegations of the complaint and answer to the cross-complaint and adversely to those of the answer and cross-complaint.

The parcel involved was originally part of a large tract of land granted by United States patent to one Dalton in the year 1873. One J. W. Hooper, the successor in interest of Dalton, granted the southern portion of this tract to one Shattuck, through whom respondents claim record title, and the northerly portion to one A. L. Hooper, through whom appellant claims the record title. The controversy, which has been of long standing, arises out of a dispute as to the correct location of the dividing line of said northerly and southerly portions so conveyed. The same point of beginning is referred to in both the conveyance from J. W. Hooper to Shattuck and from J. W. Hooper to A. L. Hooper; it being designated as the intersection of two line fences which had, long prior to the present controversy, disappeared.

[1] In an attempt to establish her record chain of title, appellant produced, at the trial, the testimony of a competent engineer, showing, pursuant to a survey made by him, the property in question to be included within the northerly portion of the original tract as conveyed to her predecessor in interest. The survey made by this witness was, however, based upon the identification, by appellant to him, of the locations of the original monuments in accordance with her recollection thereof. Especially in view of the fact that the testimony of appellant at the trial was in sharp conflict with that of respondents, the trial court was therefore not bound by this evidence.

Respondents, in so far as tracing their chain of record title is concerned, contented themselves with the introduction in evidence of the various deeds, from the one in which respondent Lucile A. Merrill is named as grantee back to the deed from Hooper to Shattuck above referred to. However, since there was no evidence offered tending to show the location of the property in question with reference to the descriptions contained in the earlier deeds and the inclusion of the former in the latter, these conveyances were not sufficiently helpful to establish respondents' title by virtue of them.

[2] We are, however, satisfied that there was sufficient evidence offered by respondents to establish title by adverse possession. As heretofore stated, the evidence in this regard was conflicting. The trial court, having determined title to be in respondents, we must assume, resolved that conflict in their favor, and on appeal this court is concluded thereby.

The evidence offered by respondents showed that, as far back as the year 1913, appellant knew that one Stimson, a predecessor in interest of respondents and who constructed a building and fence upon the property, claimed ownership adversely to her; that on January 12, 1918, Mrs. Merrill acquired a deed thereto from one Woodbury, the immediate successor in interest of said Stimson; that at the time of acquisition of this deed the property was vacant, but that respondents immediately attempted to rent it and soon did, for a short period, as a store; that in 1919 they leased it for purposes of a cigar factory for one year, it being so occupied for several months; that in September or October, 1920, respondents rented the premises to one Miller, who occupied them as tenant and later as purchaser under contract from Mrs. Merrill until he was evicted in October, 1924, by legal proceedings commenced by her; that the building was then locked up and for sale or rent signs displayed thereon; respondents maintaining an endeavor to secure a new tenant.

The testimony of appellant with reference to possession of the premises from 1918 to 1924 was rather meager. She testified that it was unoccupied in 1918 and 1919; that in 1920 she authorized the same Miller, whom respondents claimed as a tenant and purchaser under contract, to occupy the premises without payment of rent and that it was so occupied until 1924; that she subsequently rented it to a Mrs. Capillo for three or four months, and then, in 1925, to a Mr. and Mrs. Garrison; the latter being in actual possession at the time of the commencement of this action on March 16, 1926.

[3] The question of payment of taxes upon the property is not involved, as it is conceded that during all of the times mentioned they were assessed to and paid by both parties hereto.

It appears from the foregoing that the evidence is sufficient to establish respondents' continued occupation and possession of the premises, within the meaning of section 322 of the Code of Civil Procedure, for more than the required five-year period, to wit, from the early part of the year 1918, when respondents acquired their deed and first installed a tenant therein, until the latter part of the year 1924, when appellant, through her tenant, Capillo, effected a re-entry.

[4, 5] Respondents entered into possession under claim of title, exclusive of other right, founding such claim upon a written instrument, as being a conveyance of the property in question. Section 322, Code Civ. Proc. The possession by their tenants was their possession. Section 326, Code Civ. Proc. The temporary periods of vacancy, not evincing any intention of abandonment of possession, did not interrupt the continuity of their possession. 1 Cal. Jur. 554.

[6] The complaint, having alleged ownership in fee, was sufficient to present the question of title by adverse possession. 1 Cal. Jur. 620; Garbarino v. Noce, 181 Cal. 125, 183 P. 532, 6 A. L. R. 1433.

The judgment is affirmed.

Aug. 4, 1932.

1. Landlord and tenant ⇐231(6).

Evidence held to justify finding of no breach of implied warranty that leased land was suitable for growing alfalfa (Civ. Code, § 1932).

There was evidence that most of land was good and all of it fair for growing alfalfa; that considerable crops were produced and large numbers of stock pastured thereon; that some alfalfa was cut; that lessee pastured land when too wet, in violation of contract; that he irrigated too much at times; and that such conditions were detrimental to alfalfa growing.

2. Landlord and tenant ⇐231(6).

Evidence held to support finding that lessee knew of land's unfitness for growing alfalfa before rescinding lease (Civ. Code, § 1691).

3. Landlord and tenant ⇐34(1).

Lessee obtaining improvement of land, represented as suitable for growing alfalfa, by lessor, after nearly two seasons' experience, seeking and accepting subsequent reduction of water rent, paying rent for another year, and continuing to occupy and use land, waived right to rescind contract for failure of consideration.

BARNARD, P. J.

This is an action to recover certain rentals claimed to be due under the provisions of a written lease. Under date of November 14, 1924, the plaintiff leased 160 acres of land to the defendant for the term beginning January 15, 1925, and ending July 15, 1928. The lease recited that the plaintiff was then planting the premises to alfalfa and barley; that he would care for and irrigate the same until a good stand was obtained; that he would replant any portion of the premises upon which a good stand was not obtained; and that all of this work should be completed by January 15, 1925. The defendant agreed to take good care of the alfalfa after January 15, 1925, and "each year to replant such portion of said premises to alfalfa upon which a good stand is not maintained and growing, and each year during the fall to disc said alfalfa and plant barley therewith. * * *" The lease also contained a provision to the effect that the premises were leased only for the purpose of growing alfalfa and barley for feed, and that the lessee was not to pasture or permit any live stock upon the premises while the same were wet.

The defendant took possession of the premises on January 15, 1925, and thereafter paid the monthly rental called for by the lease. On August 7, 1926, the parties entered into a supplemental agreement, which by its terms was to be attached to and become a part of the lease. This provided as follows:

"The party of the second part represents that the Southwest quarter of the above Tract will irrigate much better if the borders are so changed that it irrigates from South to North. Party of the first part agrees to change these borders and will put in a new head ditch with concrete gates in each land for irrigating the same, and will leave the ground ready to plant and will pay and supply to the party of the second part 700 pounds of alfalfa seed for planting the same which party of the second part agrees to at once put in.

"It is further understood and agreed that the party of the first part does not guarantee a good stand on said land, and he is not to be asked to furnish any more seed or do any more work on any part of the above 160 acres. The party of the second part agrees to continue paying the rent as heretofore and this agreement shall be in no way construed to cancel any of the terms of the lease now in force on the said Tract, dated November 14, 1924. * * *"

On October 22, 1926, a further agreement was signed by the parties reducing the amount of water rent that should be paid by the defendant. The defendant continued to farm the premises, and, for a time, to pay the rent; the last payment being made October 6, 1927, but covering the rent to June 15, 1927.

No further rent being paid, this action was brought on March 5, 1928, to recover the rent due up to that date, and later a supplemental complaint was filed covering the rent for the balance of the term. On March 13, 1928, a notice of rescission was served by the defendant upon the plaintiff, based upon an alleged failure of consideration, stating that the property was delivered back, but making no mention of adjusting or accounting for the value of the use of the property up to that time. In due time an answer and cross-complaint were filed, with various amendments, in which the allegations of the complaint were denied, and further alleging that the plaintiff had represented the land in question to be suitable for the growing of alfalfa; that these representations had been relied on; that they were false; that there was a consequent failure of consideration; and that the contract had been rescinded on March 13, 1928. After a trial, judgment was entered for the plaintiff, and this appeal followed. The court found against the defendant as to the making of any misrepresentations. This finding is neither attacked, nor does the record show that any evidence in support of any such allegation was offered.

[1] The appellant now relies upon an implied warranty, under section 1932 of the Civil Code, that the land in question was suitable for the growing of alfalfa. If it be assumed that this section applies under these circumstances, it neither conclusively appears that the greater part of this land was unfit for such purpose, nor that any partial failure of crops occurred without the fault of the appellant. The record contains considerable evidence to the effect that the greater part of the land was good alfalfa land, that most of it was very good, and that all of it was fair for that purpose. It appears that some considerable crops were produced during each of the four seasons involved, that large numbers of stock were pastured thereon, and that some alfalfa was cut. There was also evidence that the appellant pastured the land when it was too wet, in violation of his contract, that he irrigated too much at times, and that these conditions were detrimental to the growing of alfalfa, especially on this particular land. While there was much evidence to the contrary, no more appears than a conflict upon this point.

The court also found that the appellant elected not to rescind the lease, that he reaffirmed the contract, and that he continued to carry out the terms of the lease and its modifications by continuing to farm the premises; by paying the rental therefor up to June 15, 1927; by executing the supplemental agreements of August 7, 1926, and October 22, 1926; and by continuing to use and occupy the property until after this suit was filed. The court also found that the appellant continued to occupy and use the premises after this action was begun, and until about June 1, 1928, within one and one-half months of the expiration of the lease. It was further found that all of these acts were done by the appellant with knowledge of "the quality of the land and its adaptability to grow alfalfa and barley."

In respect to these particular findings, it is first maintained that there is no evidence that the appellant continued to use the premises between March 13, 1928, and June 1, 1928. While largely immaterial, this finding is amply sustained by both written and oral evidence, including the testimony of the appellant.

[2, 3] It is next urged that the evidence is not sufficient to sustain the finding that the appellant had knowledge of the unfitness of this land for the purpose named, prior to March 13, 1928; it being argued that up to that time the appellant was merely diligent in endeavoring to grow such crops, and that not until that date did he make up his mind he would be unable to do so. Not only does the evidence fail to disclose any reason for the sudden discovery, after this action was commenced, that the land was not suitable for the growing of alfalfa, but there is considerable evidence which, with its reasonable inferences, supports the findings in question. The appellant testified that in the spring of 1925 only thirty-five acres of the land had a good stand of alfalfa and twenty acres a fair stand; that as soon as the barley was "eaten off" the land was reseeded; that he reseeded the place every spring and fall during the time he was there and also reseeded certain portions of it between irrigations; that the reseedings produced practically nothing; that he complained to the respondent in 1926 "about the place not growing alfalfa or barley"; that the respondent then agreed to reborder and replant the southwest forty acres; that this was done, but thereafter the same results were obtained; and that on March 13, 1928, he finally became convinced that alfalfa and barley could not be grown on the place for feed. Another witness testified that in the spring of 1926 he dug holes in the land, examined the soil, showed this to the appellant and told him what was the matter with the land. This testimony, with considerable other evidence, supports the findings complained of. Civ. Code, § 1691. After an experience covering nearly two seasons, and after having had the defects in the soil particularly pointed out to him, the appellant sought and obtained from the respondent a further concession by way of improvements to one-quarter of the land, and signed an agreement to the effect that the respondent did not guarantee a good stand of alfalfa and that he should not be required to do anything more on any part of the land. A few months later the appellant sought and accepted from the respondent a further favor in the reduction of the water rent; he then continued to pay rent over a period of another year; he continued to occupy the place with no further complaint until after this suit was filed; and, in fact, he continued to receive the beneficial use of the place until the term of the lease had practically expired. We think that any possible right of rescission was waived, and that the defense sought to be set up in the cross-complaint was barred by laches. Freligh v. McGrew, 95 Cal. App. 251, 272 P. 791.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

Civ. 913.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

July 22, 1932.

Rehearing Denied Aug. 15, 1932. Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Sept. 19, 1932.

1. Automobiles ⇐244(34).

Evidence supported finding of negligence of motorist, allegedly not keeping lookout, where headlights would have disclosed bicycle 300 feet away (St. 1923, p. 517, § 28½, subd. b, as added by St. 1929, p. 510, § 7).

Although evidence was conflicting, there was testimony that automobile was traveling in excess of 20 miles an hour within residence district as defined by California Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 517, § 28½, subd. b, as added by St. 1929, p. 510, § 7; that driver was not keeping lookout ahead; and that he admitted responsibility for collision with bicycle, which would have been disclosed by headlights of automobile at any point within 300 feet ahead of automobile.

2. Automobiles ⇐244(46).

On basis of testimony, even if uncorroborated, of bicyclist injured by automobile, jury held justified in negativing contributory negligence.

3. Automobiles ⇐226(2).

That bicycle struck by automobile was unlighted, thereby violating statute, would not preclude bicyclist's recovery because contributorily negligent, unless such violation proximately contributed to accident (St. 1923, p. 550, § 105).

4. Automobiles ⇐244(46).

Evidence warranted conclusion that absence of lights on bicycle did not constitute contributory negligence; automobile headlights disclosing bicycle 300 feet away, and motorist failing to keep lookout (St. 1923, p. 550, § 105).

5. Automobiles ⇐212.

Automobiles being parked along curb, bicyclist riding 18 feet from curb held not violation of ordinance keeping bicycles within 5 feet of curb unless turning or passing vehicles.

6. Trial ⇐228(3).

Contributory negligence instruction held faulty because using "approximate" instead of "proximate" in discussing cause of injury.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Approximate; Approximately" and "Proximate," see Words and Phrases.]

7. Trial ⇐261.

Court is not required to modify instruction to make it correct.

8. Automobiles ⇐246(48).

Instruction that bicyclist and motorist had equal right to street held not erroneous; ordinance keeping bicycles within 5 feet of curb being inapplicable because of parked automobiles.

9. Automobiles ⇐246(28).

Instruction that bicyclist need not look back for vehicles approaching from behind to avoid collisions held not erroneous.

10. Trial ⇐29(3).

That court in negligence case required witness several times to indicate on plat meaning of "here" in her testimony held proper.

11. Trial ⇐29(3).

If counsel is asking proper questions without delay or repetition, court should ordinarily refrain from taking over questioning of witness, particularly in jury trials.

12. Trial ⇐31.

Court's questioning defendants' witness, thereby developing strong evidence for defendants, held not error available to defendants, in absence of timely objection.

13. New trial ⇐77(2).

Court may interpose its judgment as against jury's only where verdict is so grossly disproportionate as to shock sense of justice and raise strong suspicion of prejudice or passion.

14. Damages ⇐130(1).

$20,000 for woman 41, sustaining fractured ribs, vertebræ, and wounds confining her to bed for over two months, and causing suffering from heart trouble which probably would greatly shorten life, held not excessive.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; Charles C. Haines, Judge.

Action by Gerda Hart against Robert Farris and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

Noon & Noon and Charles A. Brinkley, all of San Diego, for appellants.

Fred A. Steiner, of San Diego, and Eugene D. Williams, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HARDEN, Justice pro tem.

Defendants appeal from a judgment entered upon the verdict of a jury in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $20,000 and for costs. The action is one for damages for personal injuries sustained by plaintiff arising out of a collision between a bicycle ridden by plaintiff and an automobile driven by the defendant Malcolm L. Farris. The accident occurred on El Cajon avenue in the city of San Diego at about 7 p. m. on January 30, 1930. Malcolm L. Farris, the son of defendants, Robert Farris and Mabel Farris, was driving the automobile with the consent of his parents; and his mother, Mabel Farris, and a friend were passengers therein. El Cajon avenue is a thoroughfare 75 feet in width running in an easterly and westerly direction. Three parallel streets intersect El Cajon avenue at right angles. From west to east they are Cherokee street, Thirty-Seventh street, and McClintock street. The scene of the accident was within a residence district as defined by the California Vehicle Act (St. 1929, p. 510, § 7). The collision occurred at a point approximately 52 feet west of McClintock street and 18 feet from the southerly side of El Cajon avenue. On the day of the accident, the sun set at 5:19 p. m.

[1] The first of several points raised is that the evidence did not establish negligence on the part of the defendants. The testimony of plaintiff was to the effect that at the time of the collision she was riding her bicycle in an easterly direction along the southerly side of El Cajon avenue; that immediately after an automobile had passed her bicycle on the left side she was run down from the rear by the automobile of defendants. There was evidence from which the jury could have concluded that at the time of the collision defendants' automobile was traveling in excess of 20 miles per hour and that the driver was not keeping a lookout ahead. There was also evidence of declarations made by the driver of the automobile admitting responsibility for the collision. It was shown that the headlights of the automobile lighted the highway to such an extent that a person riding a bicycle at any point within a distance of 300 feet ahead of the automobile would be visible to the driver thereof. It was also in evidence that the force of the impact threw plaintiff a distance of from 18 to 20 feet in an easterly direction. While there was testimony tending to exonerate the driver of the automobile from fault, it merely created a conflict in the evidence to be determined by the jury. The evidence was ample to support a finding of negligence upon the part of the driver of the automobile.

[2] The next point raised is that the evidence established contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff barring a recovery. Several contentions are advanced in support of this claim. The first one is that the evidence established that plaintiff having ridden her bicycle in an easterly direction along the north side of El Cajon avenue from Cherokee street to a point between Thirty-Seventh and McClintock streets approximately north of the scene of the accident, turned her bicycle at that point and proceeded to cross El Cajon avenue between street intersections by riding due south. There is no merit in this contention. Plaintiff testified that she rode along the north side of El Cajon avenue from Cherokee street to Thirty-Seventh street; that she turned south upon reaching Thirty-Seventh street and crossed El Cajon avenue to a point where she could and did fall in with the east-bound traffic; that she then proceeded easterly along the south side of El Cajon avenue to the point of collision. Her testimony to the effect that she pursued said course was corroborated to some extent by the testimony of other witnesses. But, whether corroborated or not, plaintiff's testimony alone was sufficient to justify the jury in finding in accordance therewith.

[3, 4] Appellants' second contention in connection with the defense of contributory negligence is that the evidence established that, in violation of the requirements of section 105 of the California Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 550), plaintiff's bicycle was not equipped with a lamp on the front nor with a reflex mirror or lamp on the rear exhibiting a red light. It was admitted that the bicycle carried no light at all. Appellants contend that such fact establishes negligence per se upon the plaintiff's part barring recovery. A violation of the provisions of the statute by plaintiff would not bar her from recovery on the ground of contributory negligence unless such violation of law proximately contributed to the accident. Berges v. Guthrie, 51 Cal. App. 547, 197 P. 356; Godeau v. Levy, 72 Cal. App. 13, 236 P. 354. Presumably the jury concluded that, in view of the lack of attention of the driver of the automobile to the road ahead and the good light which the headlights of the automobile reflected ahead for a distance of 300 feet, the absence of lights on the bicycle was not a contributing factor in the accident. Such was the view of the trial court as expressed in denying appellants' motion for a new trial. Such a conclusion had ample support in the evidence.

[5] Appellants' third contention in connection with said defense is that the evidence established contributory negligence as a matter of law, in that it was shown without conflict that plaintiff, in violation of the provisions of a city ordinance in effect at the time, operated her bicycle at a greater distance than 5 feet from the right-hand curb of the roadway. The provisions of the ordinance in question are: "Section 26. * * * The rider of a bicycle upon a roadway shall ride as nearly as practicable within five feet of the right-hand curb or edge of the roadway, except when passing a standing or other vehicle or making a left-hand turn at an intersection."

The evidence disclosed that automobiles were parked along the right-hand curb of the roadway at the scene of the collision. The ordinance therefore did not oblige plaintiff to ride her bicycle within 5 feet of the right-hand curb of the roadway. There is nothing in the situation that would warrant us in holding that plaintiff violated the provisions of the ordinance.

All of the questions raised here in support of the contention that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence were for the determination of the jury in the first instance and for consideration by the trial court upon motion for a new trial.

[6, 7] The next point raised involves the action of the court in refusing to give the second paragraph of an instruction numbered 14 requested by defendants. Said instruction narrated the facts as contended for by defendants in connection with their defense of contributory negligence, and concluded with the statement: "* * * And if you further find that the manner in which said movement was so executed by plaintiff was the approximate cause of the injury to plaintiff, then you will find that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, and your verdict must be for the defendants." (Italics ours.) Upon the authority of Waniorek v. United Railroads of San Francisco, a Corp., 17 Cal. App. 121, 128, 118 P. 947, and of Renton, Holmes & Co. v. Monnier, 77 Cal. 449, 19 P. 820, appellants contend that it was reversible error for the court to refuse to give the second paragraph of said instruction for the asserted reason that a party has a right to have an instruction given to the jury based upon his theory of the case if there is any evidence to support it. It will be noted that the instruction made use of the expression "approximate cause" instead of "proximate cause" in connection with the injury to plaintiff. In the case of State Compensation Ins. Fund v. Jorn, 186 Cal. 782, 200 P. 624, 625, the trial court erroneously used the word "approximately" instead of "proximately" in submitting a special issue to the jury in connection with the question of contributory negligence. It was there said: "Standing alone it might be misleading and prejudicial. * * * In common parlance the two words, 'proximate' and 'approximate,' are used interchangeably, and the dictionaries give them as synonyms. It is true, however, that the word 'proximate' has a distinct and separate legal significance; but, in view of the explicit instructions making the negligence to depend upon the 'proximate' cause, the jury could not well have been misled by the substitution of the word 'approximate' in the submission of the special issue. The courts have frequently held such an interchange of these terms in instructions without prejudice. [Citing cases.]"

While the use of the expression "approximate cause" was probably inadvertent, thereby the instruction was rendered faulty. The court was not required to modify it to make it correctly state the law. Dover v. Archambeault, 57 Cal. App. 659, 208 P. 178; Williamson v. Tobey, 86 Cal. 497, 25 P. 65. Plaintiff also requested the court to give an instruction whereby she undertook to recite the facts from her point of view and to conclude with a direction that, if the jury found such facts had been established, plaintiff should have judgment. Said requested instruction was also refused. It was not error to refuse said instruction requested by defendants.

[8, 9] Appellants also complain of a portion of the instructions of the court to the effect that bicycle riders had the same right as automobile drivers to the use of the streets. The complaint rests upon the contention that, under the provisions of the city ordinance, bicycle riders were required to ride within 5 feet of the right-hand curb. We have already shown that under the circumstances said provision of the ordinance was not applicable. The instruction was not erroneous. Complaint is also made of the instruction: "Bicycle riders * * * are not required to look back for vehicles approaching from behind to avoid collisions, or to avoid being run over from behind." No particular error is pointed out in said instruction; and we see none.

The instructions given correctly and fairly stated the law upon all phases of the case.

[10-12] Complaint is also made concerning the action of the trial court in the examination of an important witness called by the defendants. Aside from the occupants of the automobile, this was the principal witness relied upon by the defendants to establish their defense of contributory negligence. Shortly after her examination began, the court intervened several times to require her to indicate upon a plat what she meant by "here" in her description of the accident. Such action of the court was proper and tended to clarify her testimony. Somewhat further along in the examination of the same witness the court asked questions concerning the facts and circumstances of the accident; and this examination proceeded to considerable length. It is said that the court virtually took the witness from counsel and conducted the examination to the prejudice of appellants. If counsel is proceeding by proper questions and without delay or repetition to elicit the evidence, it is better to permit him to develop his own case, particularly in jury trials. Here the questions propounded by the court were fair and competent and showed no desire to discredit the witness. On the whole, the examination by the court developed strong evidence in behalf of defendants. Counsel did not object to the court's examination at the time. Therein we find no error.

[13, 14] The remaining point is that the verdict was excessive. The plaintiff was of the age of 41 years at the time of trial, and was the mother of two children of the ages of 9 and 13 years, respectively. The trial was conducted thirteen months after the accident. The only expert witness called to testify to plaintiff's injuries was the physician who attended her after the accident, although she was examined at the instance of the defendants by their physician. In the accident plaintiff suffered fractures of the eighth, ninth, and tenth ribs in a line directly under the arm; and the eighth rib was also fractured near the spine. The right transverse process of the third lumbar vertebra was fractured. There was a lacerated wound of the scalp; and there were lacerations and contusions of the liver, resulting in hemorrhage into the abdomen. Plaintiff was confined to a hospital for five weeks following the accident, and was obliged to lie flat on her back for one month; and soon after leaving the hospital she was required to return to her bed for a month. Between the time of the accident and the trial she spent considerable time in bed. At the time of the trial she was anæmic and suffered from palpitation of the heart upon exertion. Her physician testified that the valves of her heart did not function properly and that she suffered from endocarditis, or inflammation of the lining of the heart; that, due to said heart trouble, he doubted if she would live; that, if she survived, her activities would be very much limited; and that the probabilities were that the heart trouble would greatly shorten her life. In his opinion the injuries sustained had lessened her resistance, and the lack of resistance had led to the heart trouble. Before the accident she was in good health. A motion for a new trial upon the ground, among others, that the verdict was excessive, was denied by the trial court. It is only where the verdict is so grossly disproportionate to any reasonable limit of compensation warranted by the facts as to shock the sense of justice, and raise at once a strong suspicion that it is based on prejudice or passion rather than sober judgment, that the court is at liberty to interpose its judgment as against that of the jury. Smith v. Royer, 181 Cal. 165, 183 P. 660; Zibbell v. Southern Pacific Co., 160 Cal. 237, 116 P. 513. Under the conditions shown to exist here, we cannot hold that the amount of the award bears no just relation to the injuries sustained, nor that it was excessive. It finds support in the evidence.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Claude F. Purkitt, Judge.

Action by Abe Gelfan against Bessolo & Gualano, Inc., and others. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, named defendant and defendant Angelo Bessolo appeal.

Affirmed.

Lawrence M. Cahill, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Benjamin & Benjamin and Aaron Elmore, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

TAPPAAN, Justice pro tem.

Plaintiff, who was a painting contractor, instituted this action against defendant Bessolo & Gualano, Inc., a corporation, which was the general contractor engaged in the erection of three separate apartment houses, for an alleged balance claimed by him as due under the terms of three agreements had with said defendant for the painting of said apartment houses, and as against defendant Angelo Bessolo under the terms of an alleged agreement of guaranty whereby said defendant guaranteed to plaintiff payment of the balances due him from Bessolo & Gualano, Inc., under the terms of his painting contract with said corporation.

Plaintiff's complaint contains five counts. The first three counts set forth three causes of action arising under the three separate painting contracts, a fourth count set up the cause of action upon the alleged contract of guaranty; and the fifth count of the complaint set out a common count for money. The defendants and appellants in their answer deny generally all of the material allegations of plaintiff's complaint. Defendant Angelo Bessolo denies the execution and delivery of the contract of guaranty, and further alleges that said contract was secured from him under an agreement that the signature of a codefendant, Fidelity Union Casualty Company, was to be obtained by plaintiff to said agreement, which signature was not secured by plaintiff. The answer also set up a number of special defenses which in effect allege a failure on the part of plaintiff to complete his said contracts in accordance with their terms and specifications, to the damage of defendants. The trial court found in plaintiff's favor and gave judgment for the sum claimed in the complaint less the sum of $70 allowed to defendants by reason of some minor omissions upon plaintiff's part. From this judgment defendants appeal.

Appellants' first attack upon the judgment is directed against the court rulings under which the alleged contract of guaranty was admitted in evidence. Appellants' first contention in this regard is that this contract was incomplete and not binding in that it had not been signed by all the parties who it was intended should become signers. The contract, after reciting that plaintiff and defendant Bessolo & Gualano, Inc., had made and entered into certain painting contracts, provided: "Whereas, work has been discontinued by mutual understanding between the parties hereto and the Fidelity Union Casualty Company; and, Whereas, the parties hereto and the Fidelity Union Casualty Company and Gilo Bessolo are desirous that the said work be completed by the said Abe Gelfan; and, Whereas, there are certain amounts due and unpaid on account thereof and on account of certain extra work authorized in writing by the said Bessolo & Gualano, Inc., Now, Therefore, the undersigned as sureties and guarantors agree as follows." Then followed the agreement to pay the balances unpaid upon the painting contracts in consideration of plaintiff completing the said contracts, the terms upon which payment was to be made, and a statement of the balances unpaid upon the several contracts. This contract was signed by defendant Angelo Bessolo, and "accepted and approved" by defendants Bessolo & Gualano, Inc. Under the signature of defendant Angelo Bessolo there appears the following:

~~"Fidelity Union Casualty Company~~ ~~"By~~
~~"Vice President"~~

The theory as advanced by appellant is that the contract upon its face shows that it was intended to be signed by the Fidelity Union Casualty Company. It is true that in some instances the failure of one of the contemplated parties to a contract, to become bound thereon, has the effect of rendering the contract voidable as to those who have become bound thereon. Illustrations of this rule are found in the cases where the consent of one to be bound is predicated upon certain specified other parties becoming bound as well and also in those cases where the contemplated contract to be effective, involves the relinquishment of some right by one or all the parties before it can become operative. The case of Barber v. Burrows, 51 Cal. 404, cited and relied upon by appellants falls in the latter class, involving as it does the extension of time of performance of an existing contract, and the one who had failed to sign being a surety for the performance of the terms of the original contract. From an examination of the contract itself it does not appear that the Fidelity Union Casualty Company was a necessary party to the contract by its terms or one that was necessary to the contract so that the contract could be operative. If the theory as advanced by appellant is to be sustained at all it must be sustained by evidence that there existed some understanding or agreement between defendant Angelo Bessolo and the plaintiff that his (Bessolo's) signature was conditional in nature and subject to the Fidelity Union Casualty Company becoming bound with him.

[1] From an examination of the evidence it appears that there is a sharp conflict in the evidence in this regard. Angelo Bessolo testified:

"Q. Now, just prior to signing this what did you tell Mr. Gelfan, if anything, or what did he say to you? A. I don't say anything at all, Mr. Gualano, he placed that paper there and he says, now this is all right, don't worry, he told me, just sign, he says it is all right, and if he says it is all right it is all right with me, I would not worry anything he says.

"Q. That is what Mr. Gualano says? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Then what did Mr. Gelfan say? A. Mr. Gelfan say nothing, he didn't say anything.

"Q. Now then you signed this instrument, did you Mr. Bessolo? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And did Mr. Gelfan take possession of it at that time? A. Yes, sir."

The Mr. Gualano referred to by Bessolo testified: "Q. Well, what did he say, what did Mr. Gelfan say? A. Well, I don't remember exactly, but he said in effect that he would have the bonding company sign it. * * * He would proceed with the papers and return me a copy. * * * Well, I told him that the Fidelity Union Casualty Company I thought would probably not sign it. * * * He (Bessolo) wanted to make sure that the Fidelity Union Casualty Company would sign the agreement. He (Gelfan) told him he would go right over and have it signed."

The testimony given by the plaintiff flatly contradicts Gualano's story that the delivery of the agreement to him was conditioned upon the securing of the signature of the bonding company. There is substantial evidence presented by the record to support the finding of the trial court that the delivery of the agreement was not one upon condition; at best, there is but a conflict in the evidence, and the finding of the trial court cannot be questioned here.

[2] Appellants' complaint that plaintiff failed to sign the agreement is without merit. The evidence shows that plaintiff was permitted to substantially perform the contract and under the circumstances presented here was entitled to enforce it though he had not signed. Civ. Code, § 3388; Cavanaugh v. Casselman, 88 Cal. 543, 549, 26 P. 515; Winter v. Kitto, 100 Cal. App. 302, 306, 279 P. 1024.

What has been said in reference to the point just discussed is a sufficient answer to appellants' contention that the trial court was in error in overruling defendant Angelo Bessolo's motion for a nonsuit. The record also discloses evidence sufficient to support the judgment rendered as against this defendant.

[3] Appellants next attack the sufficiency of the evidence supporting certain of the findings made by the court as to the special defenses set up in the answer. The record in each instance contains substantial evidence to support the finding as made, and the best that can be said as to appellants' contention is that the evidence is conflicting in nature. This being the case, the question cannot be raised upon this appeal.

[4] The fact that there is no evidence that "notice of completion" had been filed is immaterial under the circumstances as disclosed by the record. It does not appear that this question was raised by appellants at the time of the trial. The work required by the contract, as the court found, had been substantially completed. The buildings had been occupied before the time of the trial. The evidence as to the quality of the work was of a conflicting nature and the trial court chose to credit plaintiff's testimony rather than that of defendants. The filing of the notice was an act that should have been performed by other than plaintiff. The authorities support respondent in his position that the proof of filing of the notice was unnecessary. Rosenheim v. Howze, 179 Cal. 309, 176 P. 456; Wallace v. Carlin, 92 Cal. App. 31, 267 P. 596. In any event the notice of completion became necessary only because the original contract so provided, but that provision of the original contract was thereafter eliminated by a subsequent agreement of the parties. The evidence is sufficient to sustain the finding that plaintiff substantially performed his contract. Rischard v. Miller, 182 Cal. 351, 353, 188 P. 50; Musto, etc., Co. v. Pacific States Corp., 48 Cal. App. 452, 192 P. 138.

An examination of appellants' other specifications of alleged error, many of which are but restatement of the matters presented elsewhere in the record and already discussed in this opinion, fails to disclose any error that would justify a reversal of the judgment.

The judgment is affirmed.

TAPPAAN, Justice pro tem.

The defendants were charged by separate informations with the crime of assault with a deadly weapon; tried upon the charges contained in the informations; and were found guilty in each case of the crime of simple assault. From the orders of the court denying their motions for a new trial, and from the judgment entered against them and assessing a fine in each case, defendants appeal. The cases against the defendants involve the same transaction, and have been consolidated for hearing and determination here.

Appellants were employed by a water company which owned one hundred and sixty acres of land upon Big Rock creek, where it maintained a weir to divert the waters of the creek to ditches on the east and west sides of the creek. Some time before the happenings from which the charges here involved arose, there had been a controversy between the shareholders in the water company as to the amount of water which should be diverted into the respective ditches. One faction had for a long time maintained at the weir a tent and man to secure what it deemed a just division of the waters. An action was filed by the water company, and the man and tent were removed from the property of the water company. The only conflict in the evidence is that as to the alleged assault. On the morning in question, defendant Heise came to inspect the weir, found the complaining witness and another on the weir, and found that they had changed the flow of the water by nailing boards upon one side of the weir and removing boards from the other side. The complaining witness testified that defendant Heise brandished a hand ax, and on leaving said he would "get my man that will get you." Heise returned later with defendant Robertson. Heise stopped some seventy-five or one hundred yards from the weir, and Robertson came on to the weir. He had an ax in his hand. As to what next occurred there is a sharp conflict in the testimony. Robertson contends that the complaining witness sat upon the boards of the weir, and that he used the ax in attempting to remove the boards. The complaining witness' testimony is to the effect that Robertson hit him with the head of the ax. A scuffle then took place, and complaining witness' clothing was torn. The language used by the contending parties was of the character ordinarily engendered by situations of this kind. Defendants contend that only the hands were made use of in the removal of the complaining witness from the weir boards, while the complaining witness says that his removal was accelerated by the application of the head of the ax. Whether or not an ax is, or is not, a deadly weapon, depends upon the mode in which it is made use of. People v. Guidice, 73 Cal. 226, 227, 15 P. 44.

The court in the instant case must have found that the ax, if it was used at all, was not here used as a deadly weapon.

Appellants' specification of error is that, under an information for assault with a deadly weapon alleged to have been committed by the use of excessive force in the evicting of a trespasser, the offense is "battery," and not "simple assault." To sustain appellants' position, it is obvious that the complaining witness, at the time of the alleged acts, must have been a trespasser, and that undue force must have been employed against him. The court, in finding appellants guilty of simple assault, negatived the use of excessive force. "An assault is an unlawful attempt, coupled with a present ability, to commit a violent injury on the person of another." Pen. Code, § 240.

*For subsequent opinion see 20 P.2d 317

Either by stipulation of the parties, or as an assertedly assumed fact on the part of the trial judge, it satisfactorily appears that the Mutual Water Company was the owner and in the rightful and legal physical possession, not only of the weir and the water which were the subject of the quarrel between the complaining witnesses on the one side and the defendants on the other, but as well of the real property upon which the weir was located; that defendant Heise was an employee of the Mutual Water Company, and as such, and for and in behalf of said company, was in charge of the weir and the water; and that defendant Robertson was also an employee of the same company, working under the immediate direction of defendant Heise.

The uncontradicted evidence further shows that another corporation, named the Rock Creek Water Company, owned one-third of the capital stock of the Mutual Water Company; but as such stockholder claimed the right of physical distribution to it of 9/24 of the water owned by the Mutual Water Company. For the asserted reason that, instead of receiving 9/24 of such water, it was receiving only that to which it may have been entitled, to wit, 8/24 thereof, it caused its employees, who were the two complaining witnesses, to clandestinely and unlawfully seize, and to take and to hold, physical possession of the weir and to so arrange it that 9/24 of the water would be received by the Rock Creek Water Company. It was while the prosecuting witnesses were in such unlawful physical possession of the said property of the Mutual Water Company that the incidents which are hereinbefore detailed occurred.

[1] At the outset, it is obvious that, generally speaking, the mere fact that the Rock Creek Water Company was a stockholder in the Mutual Water Company gave the former company no right of possession to any part of the property of the latter company. In other words, because the Rock Creek Company was the owner of one-third of the capital stock of the Mutual Water Company, in the absence of some statute, or some regulation of the Mutual Water Company by which a special right was conferred in its stockholders to a division or the possession of its corporate property, a stockholder, as such, would have no right to assume, or to take, or to hold, physical possession of any property of which the corporation was the owner. And, assuming the absence of any statute, rule, or regulation by which such a special right in a stockholder to possession of corporate property was conferred, a stockholder, as such, of a corporation who unlawfully took possession of corporate property, would be a trespasser, just as in such circumstances any nonstockholder would occupy such a position with reference to property belonging to the corporation. But in the instant case, aside from any such principle of law, the fact in itself that in taking possession of the weir and the water the Rock Creek Company did not confine itself to an 8/24 of the water, but actually converted to its own use 9/24 thereof, should be sufficient to brand its act, or the act of its employee, as that of a trespasser.

[2] As a general principle of law, it is clear that the use of force ordinarily would constitute a battery; but it is also well-established law that the owner of property has a legal right to eject trespassers therefrom, using such force in so doing as may be necessary to accomplish such purpose; and the rule holds good as to "one who is lawfully in charge of the premises" for such owner. 5 Cor. Jur. 745, and authorities there cited. In 3 California Jurisprudence, at pages 188 et seq., the rule is thus announced: "The right of the owner of premises to expel trespassers is substantially the same under the code as at common law. At common law the owner of real estate had the right to enter upon his property to expel by force an intruder, and in doing so was entitled to use all the force necessary to secure possession. Having the right of entry and exercising it, he was not subject to an action for tort or damages resulting from his entry or from any force used upon, or physical injury sustained by one in wrongful possession, provided he used no more force than was necessary to dispossess him. * * *" The case of Walker v. Chanslor, 153 Cal. 118, 94 P. 606, 17 L. R. A. (N. S.) 455, 126 Am. St. Rep. 61, is illustrative of the point. In that case it appears that a corporation, known as the Superior Sunset Oil Company, was in possession and occupation of certain land, claiming it as its own under mining locations thereon. Notwithstanding such possession, it was held that the real owners of the property had a right to summarily eject the Superior Sunset Oil Company, together with its employees, and in so doing, if necessary, to resort to the use of firearms.

[3] If in the circumstances of the instant case the defendants would have been justified in the law in actually using as much physical force and violence toward and against the trespassers as was or became necessary to eject them from the property, it is difficult, if possible, to understand how, under such conditions, the defendants could possibly be legally guilty of an assault, which is a lesser crime, and which does not either embrace or contemplate the use of force or violence. To my mind, it is manifest that, in the situation presented by the evidence, prejudicial error was committed by the trial court in adjudging the defendants guilty of assault.

The judgments and orders appealed from are reversed.

Action by Abel De Brito and others against the San Diego Packing Company, a corporation, which set up a counterclaim. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal.

Affirmed.

V. N. THOMPSON, Justice pro tem.

This action was brought by plaintiffs and appellants against defendant and respondent for the purpose of recovering the amounts of certain payments totaling $4,067.21 claimed by them to have been made only as "deposits" upon the total purchase price of $12,000, in pursuance of the terms of a written contract for the purchase of a certain fishing boat named "Shina No. 2." Upon the execution of the contract, July 21, 1928, possession of the boat was delivered to appellants. The complaint in effect purports to set forth a rescission of the contract, and a right to recover the amounts of said payments on that ground, and also upon the ground that respondent wrongfully retook said boat and resold it at a time when appellants were not in default under the terms of the contract; that by reason thereof appellants were entitled to a return of the money paid by them, together with interest thereon from November 1, 1928, at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum. A copy of the contract is attached to the complaint, referred to and marked "Exhibit A."

Title to the boat remained in the respondent until the full sum of $12,000 was "* * * deposited with it as and for the purchase price."

Respondent in its answer admits the making of the contract, as well as the making of the initial payment of $3,000 by appellants upon the execution of the contract, the delivery of possession of the boat to appellants, and further credits amounting to $1,067.21 made upon the purchase price. Respondent contends that all the payments which were made were actually payments upon the purchase price, rather than simply "deposits," as contended by appellants. This contention is brought about between the parties because of the peculiar phraseology used in the written contract, referring to the payments as "deposits" to be applied upon the purchase price.

Respondent also contends that appellants, after using the fishing boat commercially for approximately six months, returned it to respondent's wharf in San Diego Bay and there abandoned it in a dilapidated condition, with bills and maritime liens against it, without having paid current and past due taxes and insurance upon it as required by the contract, necessitating respondent, for its own protection, retaking possession of the boat, having it repaired, paying the costs thereof, as well as bills, liens, and insurance standing against it; that such abandonment constituted a repudiation of the contract, entitling respondent to resell the boat to third persons, which it did in July, 1929. Respondent further sets up a counterclaim to recover from appellants interest on the deferred portion of the contract price as provided in the contract, moneys expended by it as above outlined, and also a claim for the reasonable value of the use of the boat for the period during which it was used by appellants.

The case was tried by the court without a jury; findings were made generally supporting respondent's contentions and claims, and conclusions of law were made in part as follows: "* * * That the equity of the defendant's counter claim is equal to any equity the plaintiffs may have in said boat; that defendant take nothing by its counter claim; that defendant have judgment against said plaintiff for its costs of suit herein." Judgment was entered accordingly, from which plaintiffs and appellants take this appeal.

[1] The evidence which was produced before the trial court is summarized in the transcript on appeal under the title "Plaintiffs' bill of exceptions." Following which appears: "Specifications of Error." "Said plaintiffs specifically except to the following acts found by the court and the conclusions drawn therefrom." Then follow thirteen separate paragraphs, each setting forth in substance particular findings which were made by the trial court.

⇐For other cases see same topic and KEY NUMBER in all Key Number Digests and Indexes

Respondent in its reply brief points out that appellants' entire "specifications of error" make no statement that the facts found by the court are excepted to on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence to support such findings, and interposes an objection to a review of the evidence upon this appeal for that reason. A reading of the several paragraphs mentioned discloses that each refers to the finding of the trial court in substance alone, and does not refer to the matter of insufficiency of the evidence to support such finding. The bill of exceptions not only fails to specify that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings, but it also fails to state the particulars wherein the evidence is insufficient as is required by section 648, Code of Civil Procedure.

The point raised by respondent is presented especially by the parties by leave of this court. Appellants cite the cases of Tannahill v. Greening, 85 Cal. App. 714, 716, 259 P. 1017, and Mazuran v. Stefanich, 95 Cal. App. 327, 330, 272 P. 772, 773, in support of their contention that the specifications of error assigned by them are sufficiently set forth. In the first case cited, findings to which exceptions were taken were referred to by number only, after grounds of exception had been stated, "* * * insufficiency of the evidence to warrant the finding." The question involved in that case concerned only the matter of a sufficient identification of the finding excepted to. It was held there that reference in the exceptions to the findings by number was sufficient. If only the matter of identification of the finding to which exceptions are taken was to be considered, the decision in the case of Tannahill v. Greening, supra, would sustain appellants' position in this respect. In the case of Mazuran v. Stefanich, supra, the only specification of error which was set out in the bill of exceptions was "that the evidence is insufficient to justify the decision of the court rendered in this action," which was held to be too general to meet the requirements of the statute.

The Supreme Court of California, in the case of Regoli v. Stevenson, 179 Cal. 257, 258, 176 P. 158, 159, has stated the rule upon this point very definitely in the following language: "The bill of exceptions wholly fails to specify the particulars wherein the evidence is insufficient to support such findings; nor, indeed, are any errors specified therein. In the absence of such specifications of the particulars wherein the evidence is insufficient to support the findings, the question cannot be reviewed on appeal. [Citing cases.]"

There are many decisions in other jurisdictions also which seem to be fully applicable to the instant case, some of which are based upon the requirements of statutes similar to our own, and some of which are based upon requirements of court rules. The decisions cited by respondent, all being by the Supreme Court of the State of Utah, pass upon the form of the exceptions substantially as they are set forth in the case at bar, where the exceptions refer only to particular findings, without any statement as to the grounds upon which such exceptions are taken or based. In each of these cases the findings to which exceptions were taken were referred to only by number, while in the case at bar the substance of each finding is set forth. In the Utah cases referred to the insufficiency of the statements of specifications was held because of the failure of the statements to include matters required by the rules of the Supreme Court of Utah, i. e., a statement of grounds upon which the exceptions were taken. In the instant case we have a definite statute, mandatory in its terms, as to what shall be stated in the exceptions. These requirements are necessary not only in a strict legal sense, but also because of the actual necessity of the court and respondent having before it an exact statement of the matters excepted to, the grounds or reasons for such exceptions, and the particulars in which it is claimed that the findings or judgment of the trial court are not justified.

Appellants in their opening brief discuss the evidence taken before the trial court, and urge questions of both law and fact in connection with their appeal. Thus, we have before us a concrete example of the specifications of error by appellants not stating grounds or reasons why findings excepted to are not sufficient, when from reading appellants' opening brief it is apparent that questions of both law and fact probably are involved, or should be involved, in this appeal.

[2] As to the propriety of this court considering the appeal further, the rule is definitely stated in the case of Regoli v. Stevenson, supra, and also in 3 C. J. 1357, 1359, wherein the following language appears: "It not only follows from the very nature of assignments or specifications of error, but also it is expressly required by most of the statutes or rules of court, that an assignment or specification of errors or reasons of appeal must both directly and clearly allege error or errors of the trial court, and point definitely and specifically, and substantially in form, if any, prescribed by the statute or rule, the particular error or errors relied upon, and as a general rule an assignment of errors not complying with this rule will not be considered by the appellate court."

Many cases are therein cited from various jurisdictions in support of this rule, and also cases referred to in which assignments or specifications of error have been held to be insufficient to warrant an appellate court in reviewing the matters relied upon, some of which are very similar in principle to the case at bar.

For the reasons stated, this court will not consider the matters attempted to be urged upon this appeal.

The judgment is affirmed.

I concur: BARNARD, P. J.

MARKS, J.

I concur. It is evident from a reading of appellants' brief that the principal ground upon which they rely for a reversal of the judgment is that a number of the findings made by the trial court are either not supported by the evidence or are contrary to it.

The record on appeal is quite brief and I have examined the evidence set forth in the bill of exceptions. It seems clear to me that the findings of which appellants complain in their brief are amply supported by the record. Some of the questioned findings are supported by such a preponderance of the evidence that it might almost be said that there is no evidence to the contrary. Other of the findings are based upon conflicting evidence, but there is substantial material evidence in the record to support them. The balance of the findings of which appellants complain are supported by strong inferences reasonably drawn from competent and material evidence.

On appeal all conflicts in the evidence must be resolved in favor of the judgment and all reasonable inferences from the evidence must be drawn in its support. Witherow v. United American Insurance Co., 101 Cal. App. 334, 281 P. 668. In my opinion if the case were considered on its merits the judgment would be affirmed.

On Rehearing.

PER CURIAM.

Because of an apparent lack of knowledge or misunderstanding of the records of this court on the part of counsel for appellants as shown in their petition for rehearing, we deem it advisable to call attention to the following:

This cause was placed on the calendar for oral argument on June 14, 1932. There were present on the bench at that time Mr. Presiding Justice BARNARD, Mr. Justice JENNINGS, and Mr. Justice pro tempore SCOVEL. The minutes of the court show that before the calling of the calendar the following occurred: "Presiding Justice Barnard announced that unless objection was offered, it would be deemed as stipulated that Justice Marks and any justice pro tem. may participate in the decision of any cause on this calendar."

The minutes of that day contain the following concerning this case: "4 Civil No. 904, De Brito et al. vs. San Diego Packing Co. Hearing on merits. Wm. H. Wylie, Esq., appeared for appellants and was granted leave to file reply memorandum. Jas. G. Pfanstiel, Esq., appeared for respondent and was granted 5 days to reply thereto. Cause then to be submitted." The cause was not orally argued, and no objection was made to the presumed stipulation as announced by the presiding justice.

The cause was submitted on July 11, 1932, at which time Mr. Justice pro tempore V. N. THOMPSON was sitting on this court under assignment of the Judicial Council of California.

The petition for rehearing is denied.

BARNARD, P. J.

The defendants were jointly accused by indictment of the crime of conspiring to violate the Alien Land Law of this state. Stats. 1921, p. lxxxiii; Stats. 1923, p. 1020; Stats. 1927, p. 881. The indictment charged that the defendant Ozaki was and is an alien ineligible to citizenship under the laws of the United States; that he was a citizen and subject of the empire of Japan; and that he was not and is not authorized by law or by any treaty between the United States and the empire of Japan or any other country to acquire, possess, enjoy, use, cultivate, or occupy any real property, or to have the beneficial use of, or any interest in, any real property in this state for agricultural purposes. It also charged that the defendants conspired to violate the provisions of the Alien Land Law, in that they willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously combined, conspired, and agreed by unlawful means and devices to bring about and accomplish the possession, enjoyment, use, cultivation, and occupancy for agricultural purposes, by the defendant Ozaki, of certain land described, which is situated in the county of San Diego. It was further charged that this land was and is agricultural land, and that, in furtherance of and to accomplish and effect the purpose and objects of said conspiracy, the defendant Morrison put the defendant Ozaki into possession of, and aided and encouraged him to take possession of, to use, enjoy, cultivate, and occupy, said land, and that the defendant Ozaki entered into possession thereof, and used, enjoyed, cultivated, and occupied the same, and raised and harvested crops thereon for his own use and benefit.

The case was tried before the court without a jury, on the following stipulated facts: "It is stipulated that the defendant George Morrison is, and was, at all times mentioned in the indictment, a native born citizen of the United States of America, and lessee of the land described in said amended indictment; that said land is agricultural land, and at all times mentioned in said amended indictment has been used exclusively for agricultural purposes; that on or about the 1st day of November, 1930, the said George Morrison did knowingly and willfully combine, confederate and agree with one H. K. Ozaki to bring about and accomplish the possession, enjoyment, use, cultivation and occupancy for agricultural purposes by said H. K. Ozaki, and thereafter to continuously keep and maintain the said H. K. Ozaki, in such possession, enjoyment, use, cultivation and occupancy, for agricultural purposes, and to the use and beneficial interest of the said H. K. Ozaki of all of the said land, and thereafter, and pursuant to said confederation, combination and agreement, and as a result thereof, and in furtherance of, and to accomplish and effect the purposes and objects thereof, the said George Morrison did put the said H. K. Ozaki into possession of, and did permit, aid and encourage the said H. K. Ozaki to go into possession of, and to use, enjoy, cultivate and occupy the said land, and did use, enjoy, cultivate and occupy the same, and did raise and harvest crops thereon, for the use and benefit of said defendants, and each of them; that said H. K. Ozaki is a member of a race ineligible to citizenship in the United States of America, to-wit, of the Japanese race, but that there is no evidence nor proof nor agreement as to the place of birth of the said H. K. Ozaki nor as to whether or not the said H. K. Ozaki is a citizen of the United States of America."

The defendants offered no evidence, and the court found each of the defendants guilty. Judgment was pronounced, but sentence was suspended, and each of the defendants was placed on probation. This appeal is from the judgment and from an order denying a motion for a new trial.

This case is practically identical with the case of People v. Osaki, 209 Cal. 169, 286 P. 1025, with the exception that the appellant maintains that the one point here raised was not passed upon or determined in that case. The only point raised is that section 9b of the Alien Land Law, as adopted in 1927 (as added by St. 1927, p. 881, § 2), is discriminatory and in violation of the equal protection clause of section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, in that a defendant who is proved to be a member of a race ineligible to citizenship is put to the burden of proving his citizenship or his eligibility to citizenship, whereas, a defendant who is not proved to be of such a race is not required to assume a like burden. Section 9b of this act, which is thus attacked, reads as follows:

"In any action or proceeding, civil or criminal, by the State of California, or the people thereof, under any of the provisions of this act, when the complaint, indictment or information, alleges the alienage and ineligibility to United States citizenship of any defendant, proof by the state, or the people thereof, of the acquisition, possession, enjoyment, use, cultivation, occupation or transferring of real property or any interest therein, or the having in whole or in part of the beneficial use thereof by such defendant, or of any such facts, and in addition proof that such defendant is a member of a race ineligible to citizenship under the naturalization laws of the United States, shall create a prima facie presumption of the ineligibility to citizenship of such defendant, and the burden of proving citizenship or eligibility to citizenship as a defense to any such action or proceeding shall thereupon devolve upon such defendant.

"The Legislature hereby declares that its purpose in adopting this section is not to modify, limit or affect in any manner the provisions of section 9a of this act."

[1, 2] This section of the Alien Land Law establishes a rule of evidence. People v. Osaki, supra. While a presumption of ineligibility for citizenship arises, under the terms of the section, from proof of certain other facts, nothing in the act operates to preclude any defendant from the right of presenting his defense to the main fact thus to be presumed. There is no vested right in particular rules of evidence, and, as a general rule, neither due process of law nor equal protection of the law is denied by a statute which makes one fact presumptive evidence of another fact. Virginia & West Virginia Coal Co. v. Charles (C. C. A.) 254 F. 379; People v. Mallon, 222 N. Y. 456, 119 N. E. 102, 4 A. L. R. 463; Fong Yue Ting v. United States, 149 U. S. 698, 13 S. Ct. 1016, 37 L. Ed. 905. The rule is thus stated in 51 A. L. R. at page 1141: "The general rule is well established that it is competent for the legislative body to provide by statute or ordinance that certain facts shall be prima facie or presumptive evidence of other facts, if there is a natural and rational evidentiary relation between the facts proved and those presumed; such statutes or ordinances are within the well-settled powers of a legislative body to change the rules of evidence and do not infringe upon the rights of the judiciary or violate any other provisions of the Federal or State Constitution."

In Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Ellis, 165 U. S. 150, 17 S. Ct. 255, 261, 41 L. Ed. 666, it is said: "The mere fact of classification is not sufficient to relieve a statute from the reach of the equality clause of the fourteenth amendment, and that in all cases it must appear not merely that a classification has been made, but also that it is one based upon some reasonable ground,—some difference which bears a just and proper relation to the attempted classification,—and is not a mere arbitrary selection."

In Truax v. Corrigan, 257 U. S. 312, 42 S. Ct. 124, 131, 66 L. Ed. 254, 27 A. L. R. 375, the court said: "In adjusting legislation to the need of the people of a state, the Legislature has a wide discretion, and it may be fully conceded that perfect uniformity of treatment of all persons is neither practical nor desirable, that classification of persons is constantly necessary. * * * Classification is the most inveterate of our reasoning processes. We can scarcely think or speak without consciously or unconsciously exercising it. It must therefore obtain in and determine legislation; but it must regard real resemblances and real differences between things, and persons, and class them in accordance with their pertinence to the purpose in hand."

[3] We are unable to see how it can be maintained that such a classification as the one resulting from the statute here attacked is not a natural and reasonable one. In Terrace v. Thompson, 263 U. S. 197, 44 S. Ct. 15, 19, 68 L. Ed. 255, a case involving the Alien Land Law of the state of Washington, the court said: "The rights, privileges and duties of aliens differ widely from those of citizens; and those of alien declarants differ substantially from those of nondeclarants. * * * Two classes of aliens inevitably result from the naturalization laws—those who may and those who may not become citizens. The rule established by Congress on this subject, in and of itself, furnishes a reasonable basis for classification in a state law withholding from aliens the privilege of land ownership as defined in the act." In Porterfield v. Webb, 263 U. S. 225, 44 S. Ct. 21, 22, 68 L. Ed. 278, where the Alien Land Law of this state was attacked as denying to ineligible aliens the equal protection of the law, the court said: "This case is similar to Terrace et al. v. Thompson, supra. In that case the grounds upon which the Washington Alien Land Law (Laws Wash. 1921, c. 50) was attacked included those on which the California act is assailed in this case. There the prohibited class was made up of aliens who had not in good faith declared intention to become citizens. The class necessarily includes all ineligible aliens, and in addition thereto all eligible aliens who have failed so to declare. In the case now before us the prohibited class includes ineligible aliens only. In the matter of classification, the states have wide discretion. Each has its own problems, depending on circumstances existing there. It is not always practical or desirable that legislation shall be the same in different states. We cannot say that the failure of the California Legislature to extend the prohibited class, so as to include eligible aliens who have failed to declare their intention to become citizens of the United States, was arbitrary or unreasonable."

In Cockrill v. People of State of California, 268 U. S. 258, 45 S. Ct. 490, 491, 69 L. Ed. 944, in discussing the presumptions created by section 9 of our Alien Land Law (St. 1921, p. lxxxv), the court said: "The statute is not repugnant to the equal protection clause. The rule of evidence applies equally and without discrimination to all persons—to citizens and eligible aliens as well as to the ineligible. In the application of the law at the trial, no distinction was made between the citizen and the Japanese. Plaintiffs in error maintain that invalidity results from the fact that, where payment of the purchase price is made by an ineligible alien, the law creates a presumption of a purpose to prevent, evade, or avoid escheat, while no such presumption arises where such payment is made by a citizen or eligible alien. But there are reasonable grounds for the distinction. Conveyances to ineligible Japanese are void as to the state and the lands conveyed escheat. Payment by such aliens for agricultural lands taken in the names of persons not of that class reasonably may be given a significance as evidence of intent to avoid escheat not attributable to like acts of persons who have the privilege of owning such lands. The equal protection clause does not require absolute uniformity, or prohibit every distinction in the laws of the state between ineligible aliens and other persons within its jurisdiction. The state has a wide discretion and may classify persons on bases that are reasonable and germane having regard to the purpose of the legislation. [Citing cases.] The fact that in California all privileges in respect of the acquisition, use, and control of the land for agricultural purposes are withheld from ineligible Japanese constitutes a reasonable and valid basis for the rule of evidence."

There seems to be no substantial difference between the prima facie presumption created by section 9b of this act and the presumption created by section 9 thereof, which was under consideration in the case last cited, and we are unable to see why most of the reasoning there employed as applicable to said section 9 is not equally pertinent to the question now before us.

Not only is the classification of persons according to their eligibility or noneligibility to citizenship, which is ultimately involved in the operation of section 9b, a reasonable and natural one, having regard to real differences between two classes of persons whose rights and obligations are essentially unlike, but these differences have a real pertinence to the purpose of the statute.

Not only does the statute in question present to every defendant a fair opportunity to repel the presumption created thereby, but, as a matter of fact, the burden of meeting such a presumption is placed upon all defendants alike, whether they are citizens or not, and whether or not they are eligible to citizenship. When a prima facie presumption arises, under the terms of the statute, from a sufficient allegation and evidence of certain facts, the burden of meeting the same is placed upon any defendant regardless of his citizenship or his eligibility to citizenship. The fact that some defendants may be able to meet and overcome the presumption created, while other defendants may not, is inherent in the nature of the case, and has no relation to the question of equal protection of the law.

In our opinion, this statute is not in conflict with the equal protection clause of section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Federal Constitution.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

The defendants were jointly accused by indictment of the crime of conspiring to violate the Alien Land Law of this state. Stats. 1921, p. lxxxiii; Stats. 1923, p. 1020; Stats. 1927, p. 881. The indictment alleged that the defendants willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously combined and conspired by unlawful means and devices to bring about and accomplish the possession, enjoyment, use, cultivation, and occupancy for agricultural purposes, by the defendant Doi and for his use and benefit, of certain described real property situated in the county of San Diego, which real property is alleged to be agricultural in character. It is alleged that the defendant Doi was and is an alien ineligible to citizenship under the laws of the United States, and that he is a citizen and subject of the empire of Japan, and not authorized by law or treaty to acquire, enjoy, occupy, or to have any beneficial interest in any real property in this state for agricultural purposes. It is also alleged that in furtherance of said conspiracy, and for the purpose of accomplishing and effecting the purposes and objects thereof, the defendant Morrison put the defendant Doi into possession of the agricultural land described, and permitted, aided, and encouraged him to take possession thereof, and to use, enjoy, cultivate, and occupy the same, and that the defendant Doi took possession of said land, used, enjoyed, cultivated, and occupied the same, and raised and harvested crops thereon for his own use and benefit.

Trial by jury was waived, and the action was tried before the court. The only evidence introduced consisted of the following stipulation: "It is stipulated that the defendant George Morrison is, and was, at all times mentioned in the indictment, a native born citizen of the United States of America, and lessee of the land described in the said amended indictment; that said land is agricultural land, and at all times mentioned in said amended indictment has been used exclusively for agricultural purposes; that on or about the 27th day of August, 1931, the said George Morrison did knowingly and wilfully combine, confederate and agree with one H. Doi, to bring about and accomplish the possession, enjoyment, use, cultivation and occupancy for agricultural purposes by said H. Doi, and thereafter to continuously keep and maintain the said H. Doi in such possession, enjoyment, use, cultivation and occupancy, for agricultural purposes, and to the use and beneficial interest of the said H. Doi, of all of the said land, and thereafter, and pursuant to said confederation, combination and agreement, and as a result thereof, and in furtherance of, and to accomplish and effect the purposes and objects thereof, the said George Morrison did put the said H. Doi into possession of, and did permit, aid and encourage the said H. Doi to go into possession of, and to use, enjoy, cultivate and occupy the said land, and said H. Doi did go into possession of said land, and did use, enjoy, cultivate and occupy the same, and did raise and harvest crops thereon, for the use and benefit of said defendants and each of them."

The defendants were found guilty and released on probation. This appeal is from the judgment and from an order denying a motion for a new trial.

The only point raised is that section 9a of the Alien Land Law as adopted in 1927 (Stats. 1927, p. 881, § 1), and section 1983 of the Code of Civil Procedure, also adopted in 1927 (St. 1927, p. 434), are unconstitutional as violating the due process of law clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Section 9a of this act thus attacked reads as follows: "In any action or proceeding, civil or criminal, by the State of California, or the people thereof, under any of the provisions of this act, when the proof introduced by the state, or the people thereof, establishes the acquisition, possession, enjoyment, use, cultivation, occupation, or transferring of real property or any interest therein, or the having in whole or in part the beneficial use thereof by any defendant, or any of such fact, and the complaint, indictment or information alleges the alienage and ineligibility to United States citizenship of such defendant, the burden of proving citizenship or eligibility to citizenship shall thereupon devolve upon such defendant."

Section 1983 of the Code of Civil Procedure need not be here quoted, but in brief, and so far as here material, it provides that the burden of proving his citizenship or eligibility to citizenship shall rest upon a defendant in such a case as this, when it is alleged that a right or privilege forbidden by the Alien Land Act has been exercised by the defendant, and that he is not a citizen of the United States and not eligible to become such a citizen, and when it has been established that the defendant in question has exercised such a forbidden right or privilege.

This case is presented as being one in all respects similar to the case of People v. Osaki, 209 Cal. 169, 286 P. 1025, 1026, with the exception that this action relates only to the validity of section 9a of this act. The only argument made is to the effect that the decision in the case just mentioned is erroneous.

In the case before us there is neither evidence as to the nationality or race of the defendant Doi nor evidence that he was an alien ineligible to citizenship. To that extent this case may differ from the case of People v. Osaki, as the court there pointed out that the defendant therein was apparently conceded by his counsel to be of the Japanese race, and, in passing upon a certain instruction, the court remarked that the case was apparently tried on the theory that the defendant was of alien, ineligible blood. However, in passing upon the main question there involved, as to whether the 1927 amendments to the Alien Land Law were unconstitutional as violating the due process clause of the state and Federal Constitutions, the court said: "No evidence was offered by either side pointedly directed to the citizenship of said alleged alien. If the Alien Land Acts, which cast upon said alleged alien the burden of proving his citizenship or eligibility to citizenship under the naturalization laws of this country as a prerequisite to the enjoyment of the rights which the evidence shows he undoubtedly exercised, are not in conflict with the due process provisions of the state and federal Constitutions, the judgments of conviction must stand."

The question thus stated is the same question now raised in this case, although here limited to section 9a of this act. While the court in the case just referred to considered sections 9a and 9b together, it discussed the question now before us at considerable length, and, as we take it, arrived at the conclusion that neither section 9a nor section 9b of this act (as added by St. 1927, p. 881, § 2) is in conflict with the due process clause of the Constitution.

We regard the decision in the case referred to as controlling in the instant case, and upon that authority the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

BARNARD, P. J.

This is an appeal from a judgment in a proceeding brought by the Attorney General of the state of California and the district attorney of San Diego county, for the purpose of establishing an escheat as to certain agricultural lands in accordance with the provisions of the Alien Land Law (St. 1921, p. lxxxiii, as amended).

Among other things, the complaint alleges that the defendant Nakamura is of the Japanese race, and born in the territory of Hawaii; that the defendants Miyada, Ono, Oku, Kurokua, and Nagahiro are of the Japanese race, natives of the empire of Japan, subjects of the Emperor of Japan, and ineligible to citizenship in the United States; that the above-named defendants purchased certain described agricultural land situated in the county of San Diego, and on June 16, 1926, said land was conveyed by deed to the defendant Nakamura; that on that day the other defendants above named paid to the defendant Delpy $6,000 on account of the purchase price of said land; that on two subsequent dates the said Japanese defendants, except Nakamura, made further payments on account of the purchase price of said land; that all of said land has been used for agricultural purposes; that on or about June 16, 1926, the defendants Miyada, Ono, Oku, Kurokua, and Nagahiro entered into possession of said real property, and ever since said date have occupied the same, using, enjoying, and cultivating the said land as their own and in their own right for agricultural purposes; that the taking of the title to the said land in the name of Nakamura was a mere subterfuge and to conceal the real purpose of the transfer; that all of said acts were done by the defendants Nakamura, Miyada, Ono, Oku, Kurokua, and Nagahiro with intent to violate and evade the Alien Land Law; that by means thereof these defendants have unlawfully obtained possession, use, occupancy, and enjoyment of this agricultural land; and that all of said land has escheated to the state of California. The complaint also alleges that there is no treaty existing between the United States and Japan by which citizens or subjects of the Emperor of Japan are permitted to acquire, possess, enjoy, use, and cultivate land for agricultural purposes in the state of California.

In addition to an answer generally and specifically denying each and every allegation of the complaint, the first six defendants above named filed a supplemental answer setting up, first, a plea of not guilty; second, former jeopardy; and, third, that all matters herein had been previously adjudicated in a former criminal action in which these defendants had been acquitted of a violation of section 10 of the Alien Land Law. A demurrer was sustained as to the first of these last three defenses, but overruled as to the other two.

The court found that the land in question had been deeded to the defendant Nakamura; that upon the execution and delivery of this deed the defendants Miyada, Ono, Kurokua, and Nagahiro moved on to different portions of said property, placed cottages thereon, have ever since resided thereon, purchased seed for use thereon, and busied themselves in the cultivation thereof as agricultural land; that the defendant Oku has never occupied any part of said property; and that Kurokua advanced $2,000 to Nakamura, which was used in making the first payment on the property. However, the court found, "by reason of the want of competent proof in support" of certain allegations of the complaint, that it is not true that certain further payments on the purchase price of the land were made by the defendants alleged to be occupying the premises; that, "no competent evidence sufficient to support the allegations of the complaint in that behalf having been adduced," it is not true that any acts were done by the defendants with the intent to violate and evade the law in question or to avoid escheat; and that, "no competent evidence having been adduced or received in support" of the corresponding allegations of the complaint, it is not true that the defendants alleged to be occupying and farming the property were foreign-born Japanese owing allegiance to the Emperor of Japan. Judgment was entered for the defendants, from which this appeal is taken.

Shortly after the trial began, an attempt was made by the plaintiff to call the defendants alleged to be in possession of the land as witnesses under the provisions of section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Objection was made to the effect that this is a criminal proceeding, and that under constitutional provisions these defendants cannot be compelled to become witnesses against themselves. These objections were sustained, and this presents what is conceded by all parties to be the principal point to be considered upon this appeal; namely, whether this proceeding is, in substance, civil or criminal.

The respondents rely especially upon the cases of Boyd v. United States, 116 U. S. 616, 6 S. Ct. 524, 534, 29 L. Ed. 746, and Thurston v. Clark, 107 Cal. 285, 40 P. 435, 437. In Boyd v. United States, the court was dealing with a somewhat similar question, but in a proceeding to declare a forfeiture of certain property because of the evasion of a certain revenue law. The court points out that the act under which the proceeding was brought made an evasion thereof a criminal offense punishable by fine and imprisonment, with the additional punishment that the merchandise involved should be forfeited. The court said: "These are the penalties affixed to the criminal acts, the forfeiture sought by this suit being one of them. If an indictment had been presented against the claimants, upon conviction the forfeiture of the goods could have been included in the judgment. If the government prosecutor elects to waive an indictment, and to file a civil information against the claimants,—that is, civil in form,—can he by this device take from the proceeding its criminal aspect and deprive the claimants of their immunities as citizens, and extort from them a production of their private papers, or, as an alternative, a confession of guilt? This cannot be. The information, though technically a civil proceeding, is in substance and effect a criminal one."

It was therefore held that suits for penalties and forfeitures incurred by the commission of offenses against the law are of a quasi criminal nature, and that they are within the reason of criminal proceedings for all the purposes of that portion of the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States which declares that no person shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself. In Thurston v. Clark, a proceeding for the removal of an officer, the action was held to be, in substance, criminal; it being held that this portion of the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution applies "to all cases in which the action prosecuted is not to establish, recover, or redress private and civil rights, but to try and punish persons charged with the commission of public offenses." In its opinion, the court thus defines a criminal case: "A criminal case is an action, suit, or cause instituted to punish an infraction of the criminal laws, and, with this object in view, it matters not in what form a statute may clothe it; it is still a criminal case. * * *"

On the other hand, in Stone v. United States, 167 U. S. 178, 17 S. Ct. 778, 782, 42 L. Ed. 127, the Supreme Court has pointed out that the rule thus referred to has no application in a case turning wholly upon an issue as to the ownership of property. In that case the court said: "In the present case the action against Stone is purely civil. It depends entirely upon the ownership of certain personal property. The rule established in Coffey's Case [116 U. S. 436, 6 S. Ct. 437, 29 L. Ed. 684] can have no application in a civil case not involving any question of criminal intent, or of forfeiture for prohibited acts, but turning wholly upon an issue as to the ownership of property. In the criminal case the government sought to punish a criminal offense, while in the civil case it only seeks, in its capacity as owner of property illegally converted, to recover its value. * * *"

The decision of the question now before us seems to depend largely upon whether such an escheat as we are considering is a punishment for the infraction of a criminal law, involving criminal intent and being by way of a forfeiture as a penalty for an offense committed, or whether it is a rule of property turning wholly upon an issue as to ownership thereof and title thereto. It may first be observed that, under the statute here in question, neither the acceptance of a deed to agricultural lands nor the occupancy and use thereof is made a crime or a public offense. In re Akado, 188 Cal. 739, 207 P. 245, 246, the court said: "The act forbids such transfer, and this makes it impossible for any person to convey land to an alien ineligible to citizenship by any transfer that would be valid as against the state of California, although it might be valid with respect to all other persons. We must assume that the people in adopting this statute believed that the state of California could protect itself against the alien who had received a conveyance of such land whenever its officers became advised of the fact, without any provision making the execution of the conveyance itself a crime."

In Mott v. Cline, 200 Cal. 434, 253 P. 718, 724, in speaking of another provision of the Alien Land Law not herein involved, the court said: "This is the only act that is made a public offense and penalized by imprisonment or fine or by both. In re Akado, 188 Cal. 739, 207 P. 245. The exaction imposed for all other violations of the act inhibiting transfers is that the conveyance is rendered void as to the state and the real property escheats to the state upon action brought by the Attorney General or district attorney of the county in which the violation occurs. Cockrill v. People of State of California, 268 U. S. 258, 69 L. Ed. 944, 45 S. Ct. 490."

In the case last cited the court also said: "Our statute follows the common law as to the escheat proceedings." The respondents take this statement as holding that complete proceedings for such an escheat are not provided by our statute, and that we must therefore look to the common law and be guided by its procedure in case of a similar escheat. While we think our statute does establish the procedure to be followed, we also think that this procedure is essentially like that which prevailed under the common law under somewhat similar circumstances, and that it is in this sense that the Supreme Court made the statement referred to.

In State v. Savings Union Bank & Trust Co., 186 Cal. 294, 199 P. 26, the court points out that there were two kinds of escheats at common law. The first was based upon a theoretical failure in the line of descent; the theory being that the land reverts to the sovereign because of the technical nonexistence of any heirs. The other form of escheat at common law arose by way of penalty or forfeiture and as a part of the punishment for felony or treason. In that case the court held that an escheat under subdivision 9 of section 1386 of the Civil Code is of the kind first mentioned, and does not imply or require a forfeiture as a condition precedent. It was then held that an escheat under section 1273 of the Code of Civil Procedure is one of the second kind, and therefore in the nature of a statutory forfeiture, and subject to the rules applying to forfeitures. It will be noted that an escheat under subdivision 9 of section 1386 is thus held to be one of the first kind, and not dependent upon a forfeiture, although it does not take effect until the end of the statutory period, and although a form of judicial action is necessary to declare the existence of the escheat. Both at common law and under our decisions some judicial procedure is necessary to perfect the escheat, under either of the classes of escheat referred to. An escheat under this portion of section 1386 applies to any alien, even though he may be eligible to citizenship and even though such an alien may hold real estate against every one, including the state, until office found.

While the court in the case last referred to was considering the two statutes named in connection with the rights of aliens eligible to citizenship, in the statute now before us we are concerned with a consideration of the rights of aliens ineligible to citizenship. If we look to the common law, the form of escheat now before us is analogous to that form which arose from the theoretical failure of competent heirs and is one of the first kind above referred to, which did not imply or require a forfeiture as a condition precedent. Under the statute here in question, a conveyance to an ineligible alien is absolutely void, and such an alien may not take title at all, unless by virtue of an existing treaty, an exception which has no application here. While a transfer to such an alien is forbidden, neither the act of making nor the act of receiving a conveyance is made a criminal offense. The attempted transfer is merely void for the want of anyone competent to take. Section 2 of the act (as amended by St. 1923, p. 1021, § 2) provides that an ineligible alien may acquire, possess, enjoy, use, cultivate, occupy, transfer, and have the beneficial use of real property only in accordance with an existing treaty, and not otherwise. Section 7 (as amended by St. 1923, p. 1022, § 6) provides that any real property acquired in fee by such an alien in violation of the provisions of the act shall escheat to the state of California as of the date of such acquiring. It also provides that the Attorney General or district attorney of the proper county shall institute proceedings to have the escheat of such property adjudged and enforced, and that, upon the entry of final judgment, the title to such property shall pass to the state as of the date of such acquisition in violation of the provisions of the act. Section 8 (as amended by St. 1923, p. 1023, § 7) makes similar provisions to cover any interest in real property less than a fee. Section 9 (as amended by St. 1923, p. 1024, § 8) provides that such transfer of real property or of an interest therein shall be void as to the state, and that the interest conveyed or sought to be conveyed shall escheat to the state as of the date of the transfer, if it be agricultural land and if the conveyance is made with intent to evade or avoid the provisions of the statute.

It seems to us that this act does not require a forfeiture as a condition precedent to an escheat. It is not a case where an ineligible alien may lawfully hold title to the property until it is later taken away from him by way of penalty. Such an alien may not legally take title in the first place, and there is, therefore, no forfeiture in the sense of taking away a right already accrued, by way of penalty or otherwise. In passing upon a contract with an ineligible alien relating to the use of agricultural land and in considering the Alien Land Law of this state, the court said in Webb v. O'Brien, 263 U. S. 313, 44 S. Ct. 112, 114, 68 L. Ed. 318: "The act as a whole evidences legislative intention that ineligible aliens shall not be permitted to have or enjoy any privilege in respect of the use or the benefit of land for agricultural purposes. * * * The question in this case is not whether the proposed contract is prohibited by section 10, but it is whether appellees have shown that they have a right under the Constitution or treaty to make and carry out the contract." In effect, and by way of historical analogy, this case is similar to a case arising under subdivision 9 of section 1386 of the Civil Code and to cases under the common law where there was a theoretical failure of competent heirs. The present proceeding, provided for by the statute, is only necessary to establish what has already occurred, and is neither necessary as a condition precedent to the working of a forfeiture nor for the purpose of ending a right which has theretofore existed. It is necessary only as a similar proceeding was necessary under the first kind of escheat, above referred to, at common law.

The purpose of this proceeding is to establish that the defendants never had any title or right to the use and benefit of the lands in question if they are within the inhibitions of this statute. Under the common law aliens could acquire real property and retain title to the same until the sovereign power took away their title thereto. Even that was done because of a theoretical absence of heirs and upon the theory that no one existed who was competent to take, and as an escheat of the first kind above referred to, and not of the second kind by way of forfeiture.

Similar questions to the ones now before us were before the court in Rose Duplessis v. Attorney-General, reported in Brown's Parliament Case, 415, English Reports, House of Lords, vol. 1, Full Reprint at page 658—2 Vesey 286. In that case the court said:

"From this order the appellant appealed, and on her behalf it was argued (A. Hume Campbell, E. Starkie, R. Ord, C. Perrot), that every person taking by devise, in law a purchaser; and the incapacity of an alien to hold an estate which he hath purchased, is in the nature of a penalty upon him, or a forfeiture of his interest; and by the known laws of the land, no man can be examined to, nor is bound to disclose, what will subject him to a penalty or forfeiture. That his Majesty having no title or estate in the premises, at the time the information in the Exchequer was exhibited, no act to be done by the Court could give him any estate therein; and therefore the information was premature, and the order for overruling the demurrer ought for these reasons to be reversed.

"On behalf of the Crown it was contended (D. Ryder, T. Bootle), that by the known law of the land, no alien born can take by grant, devise, or other purchase, any freehold, or chattels real, for his own benefit; but can and does, in such cases, take for the benefit of the Crown. That the known method of recovering such estates for the Crown, is by a commission under the great seal to inquire into the facts; and on the inquest finding them, to seize the estate into the King's hands. And, that in order to prove the facts on which it is founded, the King has the same right to a discovery by the assistance of a Court of Equity, as the subject has, and founded on the same principle of justice, viz. that it is in general against conscience for any one to enjoy the property of another by concealing his right."

In discussing the matter, the court said: "The exception is admitted, but is not applicable to the present case. Here is no crime, unless the being born in a foreign dominion be so; and there can be no punishment where there is no guilt, no command neglected, no prohibition broken. Here is no act of parliament to impute it as a crime, with respect to the public; no prohibition, no condition annexed to a gift, to impute it as a contravention of the private law of the donor. Here is no loss, no forfeiture, no right to be divested; for the appellant took nothing originally, but for the benefit of the Crown. * * *"

The court's conclusion is thus set forth: "After hearing counsel on this appeal, the following question was put to the judges, viz. 'Whether the legal disability of an alien to hold lands, be a penalty or forfeiture?' And the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas having delivered the opinion of the judges in the negative, it was thereupon ordered and adjudged, that the appeal should be dismissed, and the order of the Court of Exchequer therein complained of, affirmed. (Jour. vol. 28, p. 49)."

[1] How, then, can it be said that under our statute the enforcing of the escheat is by way of forfeiture, making the proceeding criminal in substance, when no right has ever been vested in an ineligible alien, when the purported transfer conveyed no title or interest to him, and when no infraction of the criminal laws is involved? The proceeding is neither to punish for crime nor to forfeit a right previously existing, but is to enforce a rule of property and to place the real property involved in hands competent to hold it and in a proper channel of alienation. The right of the state to limit the ownership, use, occupancy, and benefit of agricultural lands to citizens and those eligible to become citizens has been many times upheld, and the portions of this particular act which are here involved are merely for the purpose of enforcing that right. They are neither criminal in substance nor do they involve penalties or forfeitures for offenses against the law.

In such a situation, the statute not only provides the procedure to be followed, but fixes it as that of a civil case. The statute (section 7 of the act) provides that such a proceeding as this shall be instituted "to have the escheat of such real property adjudged and enforced in the manner provided by section four hundred seventy-four of the Political Code and title eight, part three of the Code of Civil Procedure." That title of the Code of Civil Procedure contains the following provision: "But if any person appears and denies the title set up by the state, or traverses any material fact set forth in the information, the issue of fact must be tried as issues of fact are tried in civil actions." Section 1271. We think that this proceeding is neither criminal in substance nor that it involves such a forfeiture as is declared in Boyd v. United States to be essentially a forfeiture for crime, and so falling within the constitutional provision that a person may not be compelled to testify against himself. There is no criminal intent involved here. The land escheats to the state upon certain conditions, but regardless of the intentions of the parties involved. These defendants could not have been indicted for anything involved in this action. The making of such a deed or the acquiring of any such interest as is here involved is not made a crime under the statute. The title to the property in question will not be forfeited by any decree which might be entered, but such decree can only establish that title passed to the state when the attempted conveyance took place. Such a situation is neither criminal nor quasi criminal, since it seeks to forfeit nothing, but seeks only to declare a situation that previously existed.

[2] For the reasons given, we think the court erred in refusing to permit the examination of the defendants under section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[3] The point is also urged by the appellant that the court erred in refusing to receive in evidence the depositions of several witnesses. It developed that these depositions were taken in accordance with the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure and not in accordance with the requirements of the Penal Code for the taking of depositions in a criminal case. In particular, it appeared that the depositions were not taken in accordance with section 13 of article 1 of the Constitution of California, which provides that depositions to be used in a criminal prosecution shall be taken in the presence of the party accused. While these depositions were taken in the presence of counsel for the defendants, the provision of the Constitution just referred to was not complied with. Upon that ground, and in accordance with its conclusion that this proceeding is criminal in substance, the trial court refused to allow the plaintiff to use the depositions. The correctness of this ruling depends upon the answer to the question we have heretofore been considering, and the decision of the point now raised naturally follows the other.

[4] The next point raised is that the court erred in refusing to allow a witness to testify as to a conversation with certain of the defendants alleged to be of the Japanese race and ineligible to citizenship, and as to certain declarations and admissions by them made.

Before objection was made, this witness testified that in a conversation with one of these defendants, in reply to a question as to how he was working the land, this defendant stated that he was receiving half of the crop and a salary of $200 a month. Thereupon the answer was stricken out for the purpose of permitting an objection. The objection was then made that no testimony could be received as to any declarations or admissions on the part of the defendants at that stage of the case, for the reason that the corpus delicti had not then been established. This objection was sustained, the court stating: "Up to this moment there is no evidence before the Court at all of the foreign nationality of any of these defendants that I know of. There is evidence that they are of the Japanese race." If we are correct in our conclusion that this is not a criminal proceeding, this ruling was erroneous. Even if this were held to be a proceeding of a criminal nature, we think the same result obtains. At the time this evidence was offered, the plaintiff had proved that the lands in question were agricultural in character; that the land had been conveyed to the defendant Nakamura; that the other defendants, alleged to be of the Japanese race and ineligible to citizenship, were occupying the land, and had built five houses thereon, having themselves paid for the lumber; and that they had purchased and paid for seed, and were farming the land. The complaint alleged that they were aliens, subjects of the Emperor of Japan and ineligible to citizenship in the United States, and these defendants had offered no proof to the contrary. While it is somewhat difficult to tell what the corpus delicti is, if this is to be considered a criminal proceeding, we think this evidence, with the presumptions that apply (see People v. Osaki, 209 Cal. 169, 286 P. 1025), would in any event be sufficient to furnish such proof of the corpus delicti as is necessary under our decisions, as a foundation for the admission of statements and admissions on the part of the defendants involved.

[5] The last point raised is that the court erred in denying to the plaintiff the benefit of the presumptions created by sections 9a and 9b of the Alien Land Law as adopted in 1927 (Stats. 1927, pp. 880, 881, §§ 1, 2), and the shifting of the burden of proof as provided for under section 1983 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as adopted in 1927 (Stats. 1927, p. 434). At the time this action was tried, the case of People v. Osaki, supra, had been reversed by the District Court of Appeal, but had not been decided by the Supreme Court. Largely on the authority of the opinion of the District Court of Appeal in reversing that case, the trial court held that the provisions of sections 9a and 9b of the Alien Land Law, as adopted in 1927, were in conflict with the due process clause and the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Federal Constitution. Subsequently the case of People v. Osaki was affirmed by the Supreme Court, it being specifically held that the provisions of these amendments were not in conflict with the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States. The respondents now contend that these amendments to the Alien Land Law are unconstitutional as violating the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Federal Constitution. The only argument presented is that these amendments are discriminatory, in that a citizen who is of one color and appearance is forced to establish his citizenship, while another citizen who happens to be of a different color or possessed of different features is not required to make such proof.

In the first place, we see nothing discriminatory in the amendments complained of. The rule of evidence created by these sections applies to all persons, citizens, eligible aliens, and noneligible aliens alike. Whatever his status, any defendant must proceed to overcome any prima facie case that may be made out by meeting the conditions of the statute. The mere fact that some defendants may not, because of the facts, be able to overcome such a prima facie case against them, is not controlling.

Not only do the provisions of these amendments apply equally to all persons, including citizens of this country, but the classification of persons, ultimately involved through the operation of these amendments, is a reasonable and natural one. In the case of People v. Morrison and Ozaki, 13 P.(2d) 800, this day decided, we have so held upon reasoning which need not be here repeated and upon the authority of such cases as Truax v. Corrigan, 257 U. S. 312, 42 S. Ct. 124, 66 L. Ed. 254, 27 A. L. R. 375; Terrace v. Thompson, 263 U. S. 197, 44 S. Ct. 15, 68 L. Ed. 255; Porterfield v. Webb, 263 U. S. 225, 44 S. Ct. 21, 68 L. Ed. 278, and Cockrill v. People of State of California, 268 U. S. 258, 45 S. Ct. 490, 69 L. Ed. 944.

In our opinion, sections 9a and 9b of the act under consideration are not in conflict with the equal protection clause of section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

For the reasons given, the judgment appealed from is reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William S. Baird, Judge.

Action by Leslie S. Bowden, trustee of the estate of Earl Wooden, bankrupt, against Earl Wooden and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Ben F. Griffith, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Voltaire Perkins, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PER CURIAM.

This is an action by the trustee in bankruptcy of the estate of defendant Earl Wooden to set aside certain transfers of real and personal property made by Wooden to his wife, upon the ground that the same were made in fraud of creditors; and to have it decreed that certain other real property acquired by Mrs. Wooden in her name was held by her in fraud of her husband's creditors. The trial court found adversely on the charges of fraud, and judgment was entered accordingly in favor of defendants, from which plaintiff appeals, urging as grounds for reversal insufficiency of evidence to sustain the findings.

The creditor claimants in the bankruptcy proceeding were Arthur Huston and his wife, whose respective claims were based on judgments for damages which they obtained against Wooden on account of personal injuries sustained by them in a collision between an automobile driven by Huston and one driven by Wooden. The accident occurred on November 9, 1926; the actions for damages were instituted on February 4, 1927, and tried on February 23, 1928. Judgments for the total sum of $6,649.40 were entered in favor of the Hustons on March 19, 1928, and thereafter executions were issued and returned unsatisfied. On April 24, 1928, Wooden was declared bankrupt.

The property involved consisted of a lot in Burbank, two lots in Los Angeles, and two automobiles. The Burbank property was acquired by Mrs. Wooden under an installment contract which she entered into in May, 1924, a year prior to her marriage to Wooden. The purchase price was $1,300 and the monthly payments of $26 were completed in April, 1928, at which time the property was conveyed to her. The evidence adduced on the part of the Woodens shows that the entire purchase price was paid by Mrs. Wooden out of her separate funds consisting of money earned by her prior to her marriage and certain sums given to her subsequently by her father, and that her husband contributed nothing toward the purchase price and that title to said property was never vested in his name.

The Los Angeles lots were acquired by Wooden in February and August, 1926; and on December 1, 1927, he conveyed them by grant deed to his wife. In February, 1928, Mrs. Wooden conveyed the lots to defendant Granger by grant deed which was recorded the following month. All of these transactions took place prior to the entry of the judgments in the damage suits. With reference to the foregoing property the evidence adduced by defendants in support of their case shows that Mrs. Wooden paid her husband $750 for said lots, and that she afterwards sold them to Granger for $800. In this regard the testimony of Mrs. Wooden was to the effect that she had saved much of the money earned by her prior to her marriage and that her father had given her considerable money from time to time thereafter; that her husband made a practice of borrowing from her to meet his personal obligations, and that she had become discouraged because her separate funds were thus being dissipated with no return, and she felt that, if she gave him more money, there would be slight possibility of getting it back because he was out of work and unable to pay his rent; that therefore when he asked her for more money to meet outstanding obligations she consented to let him have $750 provided he would deed the lots to her, which he did. Mrs. Wooden's testimony was substantiated in the main by that of Wooden, who testified further that he made an effort first to dispose of the lots through a real estate firm, but was unable to do so. The fact that Mrs. Wooden's father sent her money subsequent to her marriage was more or less corroborated by certain documentary proof; and the fact that Granger paid Mrs. Wooden $800 for the property was shown by the testimony of both, Granger having stated that he believed the property was worth $1,200 and that he willingly paid $800 in cash therefor. It was also shown that prior to such sale Mrs. Wooden endeavored for over a month to dispose of the property through real estate agents; that Granger heard of the property through such an agent and inspected the same before making the purchase.

As to the automobiles, the testimony shows that the same were purchased by Mrs. Wooden from second-hand dealers after she had visited several such places; that she signed the contracts for the purchase thereof and that the installment payments were made with her money; however, the certificates of ownership of the automobiles were carried in Wooden's name until final payment was made thereon, at which time, to wit, in January, 1928, they were transferred to Mrs. Wooden.

[1, 2] Section 3442 of the Civil Code provides that "* * * the question of fraudulent intent is one of fact and not of law; nor can any transfer or charge be adjudged fraudulent solely on the ground that it was not made for a valuable consideration; provided, however, that any transfer or encumbrance of property made or given voluntarily, or without a valuable consideration, by a party while insolvent or in contemplation of insolvency, shall be fraudulent, and void as to existing creditors." And in this connection it has been held that, in an action by a judgment creditor to set aside transfers of property by a judgment debtor upon the ground of fraud, the findings of the trial court cannot be successfully assailed on appeal unless they are contrary to the undisputed evidence read in the light of all legitimate inferences to be drawn therefrom. Atkinson v. Western D. Syndicate, 170 Cal. 503, 150 P. 360. In the present case, therefore, the trial court's finding that there was no fraud cannot be disturbed unless the evidence as a whole is undisputed and proves to the contrary; and it is apparent that such is not the case, for, as will be observed, the testimony above narrated, if true, is legally sufficient to sustain the trial court's findings.

[3, 4] The attack plaintiff makes upon the testimony is that it is equivocal, uncertain, improbable, contradictory, and unworthy of belief. It is evident that the points thus made go merely to the weight of the testimony and the credibility of the witnesses, and, of course, such matters must necessarily be left to the determination of the trial court. The rule by which reviewing courts must be guided in passing upon the question of whether findings of fact are sufficiently supported by the evidence is this: That, if the evidence is such that different conclusions upon the matter can be rationally drawn from the evidence, then the case presented is one for the trial court, if the questions of fact be submitted to its arbitrament. Hatzakorzian v. Rucker-Fuller Desk Co., 197 Cal. 82, 239 P. 709, 41 A. L. R. 1027. While the facts shown by the record in the present case are such as to justify a grave suspicion of the transactions complained of, the showing made by the plaintiff has not established such a case as would justify this court in overthrowing the findings of the trial court. As said in Atkinson v. Western D. Syndicate, supra, in this class of cases, as in any other, the determination of the questions of fact must rest with the trial court. There is nothing inherently improbable in the testimony adduced on the part of the defendants, and, since the trial court accepted the same as true, its decision in the matter is controlling on appeal.

An examination of the facts in Allee v. Shay, 92 Cal. App. 749, 268 P. 962, which is strongly relied on by plaintiff in support of his contention that the conveyance of the Los Angeles lots was fraudulent, shows that there it was admitted that the transfer was made without consideration; where as here there is a sharp conflict on that issue. The case relied upon is therefore not in point.

Since, as shown, the decision of the trial court herein upon the determinative issue in the case is based upon a conflict of evidence, it is beyond the power of this court to interfere therewith.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

Application by J. O. Bray for a writ of habeas corpus against the Sheriff of Fresno County to test the validity of an order of the railroad commission adjudging petitioner guilty of contempt and committing him to the county jail.

Writ discharged, and petitioner remanded to custody.

Lindsay & Gearhart, of Fresno, for petitioner.

Arthur T. George, Ira H. Rowell, and Roderick B. Cassidy, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

This is a proceeding in habeas corpus to test the validity of an order of the railroad commission made February 23, 1932, adjudging petitioner guilty of contempt and committing him to the county jail of Fresno county. Said order grew out of proceedings before said commission in connection with the operation by petitioner of an automobile truck line as a common carrier of property, for compensation, over the public highways between Los Angeles and Fresno, without having received a certificate of public convenience and necessity therefor. After a hearing before said commission a "cease and desist" order, dated February 16, 1931, was made by the commission whereby petitioner was ordered to discontinue the operation of said truck line. Said order did not direct that it be served upon petitioner herein. It was made effective by its own terms twenty days from the date thereof. The commission found that petitioner had personal knowledge of said order and its contents prior to April 7, 1931, and that he violated its provisions by the operation of said truck line on the 6th, 15th, and 17th days of April, 1931. The commitment was issued pursuant to said findings. Application was made by petitioner to the Supreme Court for writ of certiorari to test the validity of said order. Said application was denied May 18, 1931. Bray v. Railroad Commission, May 18, 1931. Petitioner was served with a copy of said order on but not before September 15, 1931.

No question is raised as to the jurisdiction of the railroad commission to punish for contempt. Van Hoosear v. Railroad Commission, 189 Cal. 228, 207 P. 903.

[1, 2] It is contended that the imprisonment imposed is illegal because of the fact that petitioner was not served with a copy of said order before the time when it was found that he violated the provisions thereof.

Section 61, Public Utilities Act (St. 1915, pp. 115, 158), provides in respect to such an order: "A copy of such order, certified under the seal of the commission, shall be served upon the corporation or person complained of, or his or its attorney. Said order shall, of its own force, take effect and become operative twenty days after the service thereof, except as otherwise provided. * * *" It will be seen that while the statute provides that a certified copy of the order shall be served, it is further provided in effect that the order may become operative without service thereof if so ordered by the commission. Such was the view of the court in People v. Hadley, 66 Cal. App. 370, 226 P. 836. It was there said, at page 378 of the decision in 66 Cal. App., 226 P. 836, 840: "There is nothing in the act itself which requires service upon any person of any order of the Commission before it shall become operative." We think the clause "except as otherwise provided" refers to a provision to be incorporated into the order of the commission as to the effective date thereof and not to any exception otherwise provided in the statute. We find no exception otherwise provided in the statute. It was stated in Clemmons v. Railroad Commission, 173 Cal. 254, 159 P. 713, 714: "In the absence of any provision to the contrary in the statute, we see no reason to doubt that the Commission may provide in its discretion for the time when its orders shall take effect."

The commission had jurisdiction to provide in said order that it should become effective twenty days from its date; and we hold that said order was effective twenty days from its date without service thereof upon petitioner.

In said case of People v. Hadley, supra, the defendant was accused by information with the violation of an order of the railroad commission. There was neither allegation of service of the order nor of previous knowledge on the part of the defendant of its provisions, although the order of the commission, set forth at length in the information, directed that a certified copy thereof be served upon the respondent (Hadley) by registered mail. A demurrer to the information was sustained and the order upheld on appeal. The court held that, under such circumstances, service of the order upon the defendant was necessary. Petitioner relies upon the following language quoted from the opinion in said case: "* * * It would appear that in this matter an allegation of service upon the defendant of a certified copy of the order of the Commission prior to the date of the alleged disobedience of such order is absolutely essential to the maintenance of the action against him. It is a part of the foundation of the statement of the offense, and without proof of such service the court is without jurisdiction." Said language is not applicable here for the reason that the order of the commission did not direct service thereof upon petitioner. Said decision recognizes and cites several California cases in support of the rule that, before one may be punished for contempt because of the violation of an order of court, it is essential that it be shown that such person had actual knowledge of the order or that service thereof had been made upon him. In each of the cases of Mitchell v. Superior Court, 163 Cal. 423, 125 P. 1061; In re Grigoris, 99 Cal. App. 455, 278 P. 873; Ex parte Brown, 66 Cal. App. 534, 226 P. 650; Berger v. Superior Court, 175 Cal. 719, 167 P. 143, 15 A. L. R. 373; and In re Mason, 69 Cal. App. 598, 232 P. 157, a judgment of guilt of contempt of court was upheld upon proof of previous knowledge of the provisions of the order of court, in the absence of proof of service thereof.

[3, 4] Petitioner also cites and relies upon a line of cases holding that a party to an action is entitled to written notice of entry of judgment in order to set in motion the period within which a notice of intention to move for a new trial may be served and filed. Such cases are not in point. The statute requires service of written notice of entry of judgment to set said period in motion. Section 659, Code Civ. Proc. But said notice need not be given to start the running of the period within which an appeal may be taken. Lawson v. Guild (Cal.Sup.) 10 P.(2d) 459.

[5] While the question of whether an order has been served is involved sometimes as a matter of evidence in establishing knowledge of the provisions thereof, except in cases where service is required by order or statute, it becomes unimportant whether such order has or has not been served if knowledge thereof is established otherwise. The object of service of an order being to give knowledge of its contents, ordinarily proof of knowledge of the provisions thereof will suffice for proof of service.

Since the order involved herein did not direct that it be served upon petitioner, but was made effective by its own terms twenty days from its date, we hold that the railroad commission had jurisdiction to adjudge petitioner guilty of contempt upon proof of his previous knowledge of the provisions thereof and of its violation, notwithstanding said order had not been previously served upon him.

We have examined the other points raised by petitioner and find no merit in any of them.

The writ is discharged, and petitioner is remanded to the custody of the sheriff of Fresno county.

HAMMOND LUMBER CO. v. GOLDBERG et al.

AMERICAN SYSTEM OF REINFORCING v. SAME.

Civ. 8267.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California.

July 27, 1932.

Rehearing Denied Aug. 26, 1932. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 22, 1932.

I. Mechanics' liens ⇨252.

"Automobile laundry," consisting of three buildings and appurtenances situated on adjoining lots leased from different owners, held single "structure" subject to materialmen's liens without necessity for segregation as to particular buildings or ownership of land for which materials were used (Code Civ. Proc. § 1183).

Filing of single lien claim by each materialman, without segregation of materials with respect to buildings or separate ownership of land, was proper since the buildings were not only connected by concrete flooring and communicating wires, pipes, and conduits essential to their use, but more especially by the purpose and object for which they were erected and exclusively adapted, and as a group constituted one harmonious and useful development, while considered independently they would lose their usefulness and value, and fail to a large extent to enhance value of land it was sought to improve.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Structure," see Words and Phrases.]

2. Mechanics' liens ⇐78.

Notice of nonresponsibility by owner of land contract, making no reference to contract, lease, or lessee, held insufficient to relieve estate of materialmen's liens, especially where neither land contract nor lease were recorded (Code Civ. Proc. § 1192, as amended by St. 1925, p. 304).

It appeared that person giving notice, who was a purchaser under contract, and had demised the property affected and knew name of lessee, made no mention in notice of any of such facts, notice reciting merely that person giving notice was owner of property.

3. Mechanics' liens ⇐78.

Act or provision by which landowner may escape liability for mechanics' liens must be strictly construed (Code Civ. Proc. § 1192, as amended by St. 1925, p. 304).

4. Mechanics' liens ⇐78.

Tenant's construction of "automobile laundry," composed of separate buildings on adjoining lots, but constituting single "structure" under statute, held single "construction," so that beginning of first building on one lot required adjoining landowner to post notice of nonresponsibility within ten days after knowledge thereof (Code Civ. Proc. § 1183, and § 1192 as amended by St. 1925, p. 304).

Since construction of entire "automobile laundry" constituted single "structure" or entity subject to materialmen's liens under Code Civ. Proc. § 1183, adjoining landowner's notice of nonresponsibility, posted and filed within ten days after obtaining knowledge of building operations on his property, but more than ten days after knowledge of building operations on other lot, was not timely in view of fact that section 1192, as amended by St. 1925, p. 304, requiring such notice of nonresponsibility, refers to but one "construction," and must be construed as intending thereby construction of structure on which lien in absence of notice would attach, and as starting the ten-day period from time of obtaining knowledge of construction, not from time of obtaining knowledge of any part or stage thereof.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Construct; Construction," see Words and Phrases.]

5. Mechanics' liens ⇐75(4).

Adjoining landowners, knowing that properties were leased to be used jointly for "automobile laundry," and that improvements connected therewith were contemplated by lessee, held to have constructive knowledge of character and location of improvements with respect to different properties, as regards time for filing notice of nonresponsibility (Code Civ. Proc. § 1192, as amended by St. 1925, p. 304).

6. Mechanics' liens ⇐197.

Where purchaser under contract executed lease authorizing construction of building to which materialmen's liens attached, subsequent delivery of deed by legal owner having no notice of construction held not to extinguish liens (Code Civ. Proc. § 1183, and § 1192 as amended by St. 1925, p. 304).

Perfection of purchaser's equitable estate to legal one could not operate to extinguish liens of materialmen which had previously accrued, though legal estate of grantor was not subject to the lien rights of materialmen, since purchaser exercised all of privileges of legal owner, held herself out to be such, and executed lease of premises which authorized construction which gave rise to liens of materialmen.

Appeals from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William Hazlett, Judge.

Two actions, one by the Hammond Lumber Company, and the other by the American System of Reinforcing, against Sam B. Goldberg, Henry Richardi and wife, and others. From judgments in favor of plaintiffs, defendant Richardi and others appeal.

Affirmed.

Hill, Morgan & Bledsoe, Benjamin F. Bledsoe and George B. Ross, all of Los Angeles, for appellants Henry and Gertrude Richardi.

C. A. Ballreich, G. C. De Garmo, and W. M. Crane, all of Los Angeles, for appellants Elizabeth G. Crowell and Title Guarantee & Trust Co.

Holbrook, Taylor, Tarr & Horton and Joseph K. Horton, all of Los Angeles, for respondent Hammond Lumber Co.

O'Melveny, Tuller & Myers, of Los Angeles, for respondent American System of Reinforcing.

OGDEN, Justice pro tem.

The above actions, consolidated for trial, were instituted by the respondents to foreclose their respective mechanic's liens for the unpaid balance due on account of materials furnished in the construction of certain buildings and improvements constituting an "automobile laundry."

Respondent Hammond Lumber Company was awarded judgment against defendant Sam B. Goldberg in the sum of $7,967.03, and respondent American System of Reinforcing was awarded judgment against the same defendant in the sum of $434.51. Both judgments further decree, in the usual form, that respondents have respective liens on the three lots herein involved for the amount of their judgments and for the foreclosure thereof; said liens extending to the interest and estate of these appellants in and to said property. The defendant Goldberg has not appealed, and the sole question presented is whether the respective estates of these appellants should be held subject to said liens.

The liens involve three adjoining lots situated in the city of Los Angeles and described as lots 1, 7 and 8 of tract 6780. During the time in which the materials were furnished, the legal title to lot 1 stood in the Title Guarantee & Trust Company; appellant Crowell being the owner of a contract to purchase the same. Subsequent to the construction and the filing of the claims of lien, but prior to the trial of the actions, the latter became the legal owner by virtue of a deed executed pursuant to the terms of her contract. Why the defendant Title Guarantee & Trust Company joins in this appeal is not made clear, as it does not appear, nor is it asserted in the briefs, that it has any further interest in the property. During all of the time with which we are here concerned, the appellants Richardi who are husband and wife, were the owners in fee of lots 7 and 8.

Lot 1 is situated on the southeast corner of Beverly boulevard and Juanita avenue, having a frontage of 106 feet on the former and 125 feet on the latter. The easterly boundary line slants westerly so that the southerly boundary line is only approximately 95 feet in length. Lots 7 and 8 lie adjacent to lot 1 on the south, the two together having a frontage of 50 feet on Juanita avenue with a depth of 125 feet.

On May 17, 1927, the appellant Crowell executed a written lease of lot 1 in favor of defendants Goldberg and Rosenfeld for a term of ten years, with the privilege to renew for a like term, together with an option to purchase. By the terms of this lease, the lessees were obligated to commence within thirty, and to complete within ninety, days from the date thereof the erection of a building on the premises, said building to cost not less than $15,000. It was also provided therein that the lessees have the right to erect such other buildings as they might desire, subject only to certain building restrictions. The building which was required by the lease to be erected was to become the property of the lessor, as were any other buildings erected by the lessees, unless the latter were removed prior to the expiration of the lease.

On May 20, 1927, but as the result of independent negotiations, the appellants Richardi likewise, by written instrument, leased for a similar term, and gave an option to purchase therewith, lots 7 and 8 to the same defendants. This lease also obligated the lessees to construct upon the leased premises, within ninety days from the date thereof, a building to cost not less than $5,000, and contained similar authority for the erection of others by the lessees, and provision for the ownership of the building so required to be erected in the lessors upon the termination thereof. Neither lease contained any reference to the other, nor were they recorded.

Subsequent to the execution of both leases, the defendant Goldberg took out in his own name as owner of the property a building permit for a "Class C reinforced auto laundry and service station," and commenced the construction here involved and in connection with which the materials of respondents were furnished. Three separate buildings were erected, all of which were of steel and cement construction. One building, 36 feet by 125 feet in size, was built entirely upon lot 1, across the easterly portion thereof. This building was designed for washing automobiles therein. Through this building and extending beyond it to the south upon lots 7 and 8 ran a movable runway or wash rack resting upon a concrete foundation. Another building, 26 feet by 94 feet in size, adapted for use in greasing and polishing automobiles, and one end as an office, was erected across the westerly portion of lots 7 and 8 and extending into and upon lot one for about 50 feet. The third, designed for use in cleaning automobile chassis and housing the necessary boilers and machinery, extended across the easterly portions of lots 7 and 8, being 50 feet by 29 feet in size. The three buildings were inter-connected by underground air and water pipes and electric conduits required in the operation of the various machinery therein. The ground space between the buildings was entirely covered by a cement pavement and used for driveways and for storage of automobiles not in the actual process of renovation. The materials used in the construction were ordered and purchased by the defendant Goldberg as needed, no segregation being made, either by him or by respondents, with respect to the particular building for which they were used.

Defendants Goldberg and Rosenfeld failed to pay the balance due respondents for materials furnished and used in the construction of the buildings, and each respondent filed a single claim of lien therefor against the entire property, and in due course initiated these foreclosure proceedings. Neither claim of lien contains any segregation of materials with respect to buildings or separate ownership of the land, the claim of respondent American System of Reinforcing reciting that its materials were furnished for a "two story auto laundry and service station on Lots 1, 7 & 8 of Tract 6780," and the claim of respondent Hammond Lumber Company reciting that its materials were furnished for and used in the construction of "a building" located on said lots.

On June 7, 1927, construction work was started; the initial operations being in connection with the erection of the building first described herein, and situated exclusively upon lot 1. Three days thereafter the appellant Crowell posted on her property and filed for record, pursuant to the provisions of section 1192 of the Code of Civil Procedure, a verified notice by which she attempted to avoid responsibility, but in which notice she recited that she was the owner of the premises, and failed to make any reference to the contract of purchase, lease, or lessee. It appears from the evidence that on July 5, 1927, construction operations were extended to and commenced upon lots 7 and 8, and on that date the appellants Richardi posted on their property and filed for record a notice, in proper form, of nonresponsibility. The trial court held, and we think correctly as will hereinafter appear, both of these notices to be ineffective.

[1] Appellants contend that the trial court erred in allowing single liens upon the two separate parcels of real property, owned by separate owners and by them separately and independently leased, since such decree unjustly renders each parcel liable for improvements placed upon the other, and that, there having been no joint action or authority of the owners for the joint construction, no joint responsibility or liability can result.

The Supreme Court in Harmon Lumber Co. v. Brown, 165 Cal. 193, 131 P. 368, having under consideration a very similar state of facts, decided that such a single lien should be allowed upon both parcels without segregation. The main, if not the only, distinction, except as to the purported notices of nonresponsibility which will be discussed later, between that case and the case at bar, lies in the fact that in the former a single building was involved, whereas here we have a group of buildings.

The trial court here found "that said buildings and structures so erected and the whole of said parcels of real property were to be used by the lessees as an auto laundry, and operated as one business and one structure. Said structure was commenced June 7, 1927."

Section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure, at the time with which we are here concerned, provided in part: "Mechanics, materialmen, * * * performing labor upon, * * * or furnishing materials to be used or consumed in * * * the construction, alteration, addition to or repair, either in whole or in part, of any building, wharf, bridge, ditch, flume, aqueduct, well, tunnel, fence, machinery, railroad, wagon road or other structure, shall have a lien upon the property upon which they have bestowed labor or furnished materials for the value of such labor done and materials furnished." (Italics ours.)

The question then which must be first determined is, Do the improvements here involved constitute but one structure within the meaning of the foregoing section? We believe that the trial court was justified in so determining. The three buildings were so situated upon the lots, were so designed and constructed, and were so intended, that the value and usefulness of each was dependent upon the design, location, and use of each of the others. They were connected by a concrete flooring and communicating wires, pipes, and conduits essential to their use, but more by the purpose and object for which they were erected and exclusively adapted. As a group, they constituted one harmonious and useful development. Considered independently, they lose their usefulness and value, and fail to a large extent to enhance the value of the land it was sought to improve. That they were not physically joined together by common walls or roof, made unnecessary solely by virtue of those ideal climatic conditions with which our entire state is blessed, makes them no less a single development and structure within the intent of the section. Such conclusion is amply supported by, and in accord with the authorities of this state.

In Williams v. Mountaineer G. M. Co., 102 Cal. 134, 34 P. 702, 704, 36 P. 388, it was held that a claim of lien for materials furnished for the construction of a mill, tramway, boarding house, and reduction works upon a mining claim should be filed against the claim as a whole, and not against the specific structures. The court there said: "One who has built a chimney in a house, or a porch, or a doorstep, has helped to build a structure, to wit, a chimney, a porch, or doorstep; but he cannot acquire a lien upon these specific structures, and by detached sales destroy the value of the claims depending upon liens upon the whole house. A structure may be a part of another larger structure, and in reference to it constitute but a part of a structure. In such cases it is well settled the lien must cover the entire structure. It was so held in Cox v. Western Pacific R. R., 44 Cal. 28." And: "One contributing labor or materials to a structure must be held to have anticipated its future use. It is necessary to do this in many cases in order to determine what the structure is upon which he is entitled to a lien. A drain to a house may be an appurtenance before either is used. I think the statute would cover a thing as an incident which was exclusively adapted to the use of the principal before actually used."

In Hamilton v. Delhi Mining Co., 118 Cal. 148, 50 P. 378, it was held that a single lien should be extended to two adjacent but separately owned mining claims where the respective owners had leased them to the same lessee and were cognizant of the fact that they were to be developed by him as one mine.

In Mendoza v. Central Forest Co., 37 Cal. App. 289, 174 P. 359, 361, it was held that a farm development, consisting of ditches, drains, embankments, and roads, constituted a structure within the meaning of the statute here under consideration, and a single lien upon the entire property was allowed for work done in connection therewith. The court there said: "The farm development here contemplated was a finished piece of work composed of integral parts, some of which the statute expressly designates as structures, and when completed, consisted of ditches, drains, embankments, roads, so correlated as to form one harmonious entity, designed to accomplish a particular object, and constituting a permanent and valuable improvement to the land, and necessary to its highest and most profitable uses. When finished, it stood out as obvious and visible in its usefulness and its purpose as would a house, or barn, or any other of the structures enumerated in the statute. Viewing the statute with that liberality with which we are not only authorized, but by the statute itself we are enjoined, to regard it, we feel no hesitancy in holding with the learned trial court that the work to which plaintiffs contributed, as shown, constituted a structure."

The case of Western Elec. Co., Inc., v. Colley, 79 Cal. App. 770, 251 P. 331, holding that an electric power line, consisting of poles, wires, and other materials necessarily entering into the construction thereof, is such a structure, contains an exhaustive reference to the many authorities upon this subject.

Applying the principles enunciated in the foregoing to the case at bar, it is apparent that the development here, consisting of three buildings and appurtenances, constituted but one structure within the meaning of the statute, and is therefore as a single entity subject to respondents' liens, without necessity for segregation as to the particular buildings, or ownership of land, for which their materials were used.

[2, 3] Turning now our attention to the notices of nonresponsibility, we again must agree with the trial court that neither of them were in sufficient compliance with the statute to exempt the respective appellants from liability.

In 1925 (St. 1925, p. 304) the Legislature amended section 1192 of the Code of Civil Procedure by inserting therein the requirement that the notice shall contain, in addition to a description of the property affected thereby, with the name and nature of the title or interest of the person giving the same, the "name of purchaser under contract, if any, or lessee if known." Notwithstanding that the appellant Crowell was a purchaser under contract, had leased the property affected, and knew the name of the lessees, no mention of any of these facts was contained in her notice; it reciting in this regard merely that she was the owner of the property. It must be assumed that the Legislature considered the inclusion of such information to be material and essential to the notice, with the intent and purpose that any person furnishing labor or material to the occupant of the premises might ascertain therefrom what, if any, title he possessed, and be furnished with the means of obtaining the information in relation thereto. Otherwise the Legislature would not have deemed the amendment worthy of its attention. And the reason for the requirement is particularly applicable here, where the lessees in possession held themselves out to be the owners, and neither the contract of purchase nor the lease appeared of record.

The courts, having adopted a rule of liberal construction relative to mechanic's liens, must follow a strict construction of any act or provision by which the owner of property upon which improvements are made may relieve himself from, or escape, liability therefor. See Pasqualetti v. Hilson, 43 Cal. App. 718, 185 P. 693, where such a notice, otherwise sufficient, was held ineffectual because acknowledged instead of verified.

[4, 5] The notice of the appellants Richardi was posted on July 5, 1927, and filed for record the next day, July 6th. The statute requires the owner, in order to exempt his estate from the operation of the lien, to post and file the notice for record "within ten days after he shall have obtained knowledge of such construction." These appellants contend that, although their notice was not given within ten days after commencement of construction on the Crowell lot, it was in time, since it was given within ten days of the commencement of building operations upon their property. But, by virtue of our conclusion heretofore reached that the entire construction constituted that of one structure, it must follow that such notice was not timely. The statute starts the ten-day period from the time of obtaining knowledge of the construction, not from the time of obtaining knowledge of any part or stage of it. It being but one structure that was under construction, it must be said that its construction commenced on June 7th, and it is immaterial upon which lot operations were first initiated. The statute refers to but one construction, and must be construed as intending thereby the construction of the structure upon which the lien, in the absence of the notice, would attach.

It therefore becomes pertinent to determine when the appellants obtained knowledge of the construction. It is apparent from the evidence that they all had actual knowledge of the commencement of operations on lot 1, the appellant Crowell at least on June 10th when her notice was posted, and the appellants Richardi at least more than ten days prior to the posting of their notice. The Richardi notice was prepared on and dated June 13, 1927; Mr. Richardi testifying that he kept track of the lots to be prepared to post the notice as soon as work was actually commenced upon his property.

Appellants contend that their knowledge was limited to that of construction upon their own properties as authorized by their respective leases. Both the appellant Crowell and the appellants Richardi knew that their respective properties were leased to the defendants Goldberg and Rosenfeld to be used jointly for purposes of an automobile laundry, and that improvements in connection therewith were contemplated by the lessees. Even though it be true, as they contend, that they had no actual knowledge of the exact character of these improvements nor as to their location with respect to their different properties, such actual knowledge was not essential to liability. They must be held to have had constructive knowledge of these facts.

Appellants' contention in this regard is completely answered in Harmon Lumber Co. v. Brown, supra, which case, in view of our conclusions that the construction here was that of but one structure, is determinative of the case at bar. The facts there were significantly similar to the situation with which we are here concerned. The defendant in that case, Brown, was the owner of a lot in the city and county of San Francisco, having a frontage of 110 feet on Mission street. Adjoining this property to the south was a lot, fronting 50 feet on the same street, owned by the defendant Doran. On July 17, 1906, Brown leased his lot to the defendant Samuels for a term of five years, which was subsequently extended for another eight years. In the lease Samuels covenanted that he would, with all reasonable dispatch, erect building improvements upon the demised premises; it being agreed that all such improvements should, upon the determination of the lease, become the property of the lessor. Samuels, on July 29, 1906, sublet the premises to the defendants Davis by a lease containing the same provisions with reference to improvements. On January 21, 1907, the defendant Doran leased her premises to the same defendants Davis for a term of eight years. By the terms of this lease, the lessees agreed to pay all taxes on the value of all improvements that might be erected upon the premises by them. The lessees were given authority to remove any buildings or other improvements they erected on the land, but, if not removed within a stipulated time, the same were to become the property of the lessor. After the execution of the leases to the defendants Davis, the latter caused the construction of a building occupying all of the Brown lot and the northerly 10 feet of the Doran lot. Neither of the defendants Brown or Doran posted the notice of nonresponsibility contemplated by section 1192 of the Code of Civil Procedure, nor did either have actual knowledge of the construction in time to have done so.

The Supreme Court, through Mr. Justice Sloss, in a well-reasoned opinion, from which it would be but to unduly lengthen this opinion to quote the authorities and logic therein relied upon, held that both the defendants Brown and Doran were chargeable with constructive notice, not only of the construction of improvements upon their respective properties, but of the erection of a single building upon ground comprising both lots, and concluded that the land necessary for the convenient use and occupation of the building was subject, as a whole, and without regard to the separate ownerships, to mechanics' liens arising out of such construction.

It should, perhaps, be here noted that, in order to avoid any possible inequities which might result as a consequence of the above rule, the Legislature has provided that, in a situation such as here exists, the trial court may, where it deems it equitable so to do, distribute the lien equitably as between the several parcels involved. Section 1188, Code Civ. Proc. This provision, however, was not added until the 1929 session (St. 1929, p. 1929, § 2), and did not become effective until after the present lien rights accrued.

[6] There remains undisposed of but one other contention, made by the appellant Crowell. The trial court found that the defendant and appellant Title Guarantee & Trust Company had no notice of the construction until February 6, 1928, when it deeded lot 1 to appellant Crowell pursuant to her compliance with her contract of purchase. She contends that, since the legal estate of the former was not subject to the lien rights of respondents, when she acquired that interest her former interest became merged therein to constitute an estate superior to the liens. We see no merit in this contention. This appellant exercised all of the privileges of the legal owner of the property, held herself out to be such, and executed the lease of the premises which authorized the construction which gave rise to the liens of respondents. That her equitable estate, which was subject to the liens, has now become perfected into a legal one, cannot operate to extinguish the liens of respondents which had previously accrued.

In Bender v. Palmer, 1 Cal. Unrep. 601, a similar situation was presented. There, one Calderwood, the person in possession and at whose instance the materials were furnished, did not, at the time of the accrual of the lien, have title to the property; the same being then vested in the United States government. It was held that the subsequent acquisition of the legal title from the United States by the successors in interest of Calderwood did not operate to displace the lien which otherwise existed. And the court, appropriately to the case at bar, said: "And especially would this appear to be so, when, as here, the better title has been acquired because and as a consequence of the possession and claim of title held in the first instance."

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: TYLER, P. J.; KNIGHT, J.

GROSS v. CITY OF SAN DIEGO.

Civ. 930.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

Aug. 4, 1932.

1. Dedication ⇐19(5).

Delineation of beach land on recorded map of subdivision, as blank space, and conveyance of adjacent lots by reference to map, held dedication of beach land to public use (St. 1893, p. 96, § 1, and § 3 as amended by St. 1901, p. 288).

Owner of parcel of real property prepared and recorded a map subdividing the realty into lots and blocks and designating several streets and unnamed alleys. The map delineated a strip of land along the ocean as a blank space without any lot or block number or street name, and such strip did not correspond in shape or dimensions to any lot in subdivision. Subsequently, adjacent lots were sold and conveyed and deeds made describing property by references to the map.

2. Dedication ⇐35(1).

Certificate of common council of town attached to recorded map of subdivision held sufficient acceptance of dedication of beach land, whether unnamed alley or extension of named lane (St. 1893, p. 96, § 3 as amended by St. 1901, p. 288).

Certificate of common council of city attached to recorded map of subdivision stated that the common council "hereby accepts on behalf of the public" certain named streets, roads, alleys, and highways and also unnamed alleys shown on the map and plat.

3. Dedication ⇐35(2).

Ordinance declaring strip of beach land open public street held not to demonstrate previous nonacceptance of beach as public way (St. 1893, p. 96, § 3, as amended by St. 1901, p. 288).

4. Dedication ⇐38.

Owner cannot withdraw offer of dedication after acceptance thereof.

5. Adverse possession ⇐8(2).
Dedication ⇐63(1).

Public cannot lose right in dedicated street or alley through adverse possession, nor by delay in using or improving property.

6. Dedication ⇐44.

Payment of taxes by former owner held not conclusive evidence against prior dedication of beach land.

7. Appeal and error ⇐877(3).

Alleged owner of strip of beach land, where without interest in abutting property, cannot complain of judgment decreeing city to be owner and entitled to possession notwithstanding it only had easement (Pol. Code, § 2631).

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; S. M. Marsh, Judge.

Action by Dorothy Gross, as executrix of the will of Kate Maxwell, deceased, against the City of San Diego. Judgment for the defendant, and the plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

John C. Packard, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

M. W. Conkling, City Atty., and H. C. Hopkins, Deputy City Atty., both of San Diego, for respondent.

MARKS, J.

This is an action to quiet title to a strip of beach land in the town of La Jolla which the city of San Diego claimed had been dedicated by the owner, and accepted by the city, as a public way. Judgment was rendered in favor of the city, and plaintiff has taken this appeal therefrom.

In 1900, Kate Maxwell was the owner of a parcel of real property in the northerly portion of Pueblo lot No. 1260 in the city of San Diego, shown on a map of La Jolla Beach. This map was prepared for her, approved by her, and recorded at her request on April 28, 1903. It divided the real estate into lots and blocks and several named streets and unnamed alleys. It was approved by the board of public works of the city of San Diego and bears the following certificate: "City of San Diego, County of San Diego, State of California, ss. The Common Council of the City of San Diego, California, hereby accepts on behalf of the Public, the following named streets, roads, alleys and highways (and also unnamed alleys) shown on this map and plat viz: Marine Ave., Shore Ave., Bluff St., Vine St., Sea Lane, La Jolla Boulevard, Unnamed alleys. April 28th, 1903. By order of the Common Council of the City of San Diego, California. Geo. D. Goldman, City Clerk of the City of San Diego, California, and Ex-officio Clerk of the Common Council of the said City of San Diego." Blocks 4 and 5 form the westerly portion of the subdivided property. On the extreme westerly portion of the map appears what is designated as the Pacific Ocean, with what we assume to be the line of the mean high tide delineated by waving lines drawn generally parallel to and between about twenty and twenty-six feet westerly from the westerly lines of blocks 4 and 5. As the land between the line of the mean high tide and the westerly lines of blocks 4 and 5 constitutes the property in controversy here, we will hereafter refer to it as the "Beach" for want of a better name. It bears no name or number on the map, and does not correspond in shape or dimensions to any lot in the subdivision. Golden Vista street runs in an easterly and westerly direction from the east end of the subdivision to the ocean, its southerly line forming the northerly boundary of block 4. The north line of this block is produced westerly to the ocean forming the southerly line of Golden Vista street, separating it from the Beach. While Golden Vista street is shown on the subdivision map of La Jolla beach, we cannot definitely determine whether the ground it occupies is a portion of the property subdivided by Kate Maxwell or whether the southerly street line forms the northerly boundary line of this property. Marine avenue parallels Golden Vista street and runs from the easterly end of the subdivision to the westerly lines of blocks 4 and 5, separating these blocks. Sea lane parallels the other streets and runs from the east end of the subdivision to the Pacific Ocean, its northerly line forming the southerly lines of the southerly tier of blocks in the subdivision. The southerly line of Sea lane is drawn westerly to the line of the Pacific Ocean. Its north line has its western terminus at the southwest corner of block 5 leaving nothing on the map separating the westerly end of Sea lane from the Beach. The southerly tier of blocks in the subdivision is numbered from west to east, 5, 6, 7 and 8. Unnamed alleys, fifteen feet in width, bisect blocks 6, 7, and 8, running northerly and southerly in block 6 and easterly and westerly in blocks 7 and 8. Block 5 is bounded, northerly by Marine avenue, easterly by Shore avenue, southerly by Sea lane, and westerly by the "Beach." Lots 1 to 8 in block 5 extend from the Beach to Shore avenue. Lot 9 extends from the Beach to the westerly line of lot 13 with fifteen feet of the easterly end of its southerly line touching the northerly end of a blind unnamed alley fifteen feet wide extending northerly seventy-five feet from Sea lane to the southerly line of lot 9. Lots 10, 11, and 12 extend from the Beach to the westerly line of the alley just mentioned. Lots 1 to 12, inclusive, have their greater dimensions from east to west and all, excepting lot 1, are twenty-five feet in width. Lots 13, 14, 15, and 16, in block 5, are each twenty-five by one hundred feet in dimension and front on Sea lane. Lots 9, 10, and 11 in block 5 have no means of ingress or egress except through the fifteen-foot blind alley unless the Beach in front of them and to Sea lane is a public street or alley. It was stipulated that all the lots in blocks 4 and 5 had been sold by Kate Maxwell.

The greater portion of La Jolla Beach, shown on the map in question, lies on land elevated above the ocean. This upland ends on the ocean side in an irregular bluff which descends sharply to the sand. The westerly lines of blocks 4 and 5, for at least part of their lengths, run over the sand westerly from the bluffs. It is impossible for us to determine from the evidence how far the block lines are from the bluffs, or from the actual line of mean high tide. Respondent suggests that the west line of blocks 4 and 5 is the line of mean high tide and that there is no beach between them. If this should be true, all questions here presented would be moot as appellant could not own tidelands extending seaward from the line of mean high tide. Respondent presented no definite or satisfactory evidence on the question and the trial court evidently concluded that there was a beach of an undetermined width between the line of mean high tide and the westerly lines of blocks 4 and 5. Appellant in her testimony described the Beach as follows: "The strip of land in question consists of part beach and part sandstone cliffs worn away a great deal and very rough, worn away by the water. These cliffs come out at different portions; sometimes very high and sometimes lower; but very awkward to get up and down them until, of course, the city built the steps. * * * The water line has remained practically the same. Of course, it varies very much from season to season. I have reference to the season of the tide and the season of the year. At some seasons of the year the water comes up with a different sort of rush and the whole beach is washed out until there is nothing but rocks there and by 'the whole beach' I have reference to the property in question here." Neither counsel paid any attention to the questions of erosions and accretions suggested by this evidence (26 Cal. Juris. 304, and cases cited), and it did not become an issue in the trial court; the sole question considered and decided being whether or not the Beach was ever dedicated by the owner and accepted by the city of San Diego as a public street or alley. The trial court held such dedication complete and gave judgment for the respondent.

[1] Appellant urges there is no evidence that the owner dedicated the Beach as a public way, and no evidence of an acceptance on behalf of the public of an offer to dedicate it, if one were made. She maintains that the mere delineation on the subdivision map of La Jolla Beach, of the Beach as a blank space without any lot or block number or street name or anything to indicate that it was to be a street or alley, showed no intention on her part to dedicate it to a public use and that the certificate of the common council of San Diego on the map was not an acceptance of the offer to dedicate, if one were made by her.

In Elliott on Streets, § 30, the following general rule is given concerning the interpretation of uncertain offers to dedicate property for public use: "Dedication by maps and plats are sometimes so made as to render it difficult to determine their nature and extent. * * * Naturally the presumption is that one who records a plat, and marks upon it spaces that appear to form no part of any platted lots, dedicated the land represented by the spaces thus excluded to a public use."

The rule in California is summarized in 9 California Jurisprudence, 15, as follows: "Dedication is the joint effect of an offer by the owner to dedicate land and an acceptance of the offer by the public; and to constitute a valid and complete dedication two things must generally concur, to-wit: An intention by the owner, clearly indicated by his words or acts, to dedicate the lands to public use, and an acceptance by the public of the dedication. Whatever the manner in which a dedication is effectuated, the animus dedicandi is paramount. It is the soul of the very act of dedication, and must expressly appear, or be fairly inferable from the donor's acts. It has been said that dedication is, in each case, a question of intention. 'The vital principle of the dedication is the intention to dedicate; and whenever this is unequivocally manifested, the dedication, so far as the owner of the soil is concerned, has been made.' "

Section 1 of an act regulating the preparation and recordation of maps of subdivisions in effect at the time the map in question was prepared and recorded provided as follows: "Whenever any city, town, or subdivision of land into lots, or any addition to any city, town, or such subdivision, shall be laid out into lots for the purposes of sale, the proprietor or proprietors thereof shall cause to be made out an accurate map or plat thereof, particularly setting forth and describing: First—All the parcels of ground within such city, town, addition, or subdivision, reserved for public purposes, by their boundaries, courses, and extent, whether they be intended for avenues, streets, lanes, alleys, courts, commons, or other public uses; and, Second—All lots intended for sale, either by number or letter, and their precise length and width." Stats. of 1893, p. 96.

Section 3 of the same act as amended, provided in part as follows: "The map or plat so made, acknowledged, and certified shall be presented to the governing body having control of the streets, roads, alleys, and highways in the territory shown on the map or plat, and said governing body shall indorse thereon which streets, roads, alleys, and highways, offered by said map or plat, they accept on behalf of the public, and thereupon such streets, roads, alleys, and highways, only as have been thus accepted, shall be and become dedicated to public use." Stats. of 1901, p. 288.

From a study of these sections it would seem that in the preparation of the map in question the only things which the owner should cause to be shown upon it were: (1) Streets and alleys, and (2) the lots intended for sale with their designating numbers and dimensions. From this it would follow that there is a strong intimation of an intention on the part of the owner to offer to the public for use as a street or alley an unnumbered or unlettered parcel of ground that did not conform in either shape or dimensions to any of the lots or blocks delineated. The fact that no means of ingress or egress was provided the three lots in block 5 of the subdivision other than over the "Beach," except through a narrow blind alley fifteen feet in width and seventy-five feet in length, would indicate that it was the intention of the owner to dedicate the property for use as a public way. "Maps and plats are frequently admitted in evidence in cases involving dedication. When made by the dedicator they are admissible against him and his grantees. * * * Where a recorded map is relied on as showing an intent to dedicate a street, the situation of the strip of land in connection with the contiguous blocks, the conduct of the parties when the map was made or adopted, the recording of it and acting upon it, and references made to it in subsequent conveyances, are all to be weighed and considered, and the court has the undoubted right to draw inferences therefrom." 9 Cal. Juris. 71.

Cases bearing upon the question before us are clearly summarized in 9 California Jurisprudence, 40, as follows: "The dedication of land for streets by the making or adopting and recording of a map by the owner may take place whether or not the land is so designated on the map. Accordingly, if there is any space corresponding to a street on such a map which does not constitute any part of the platted blocks, it is necessarily dedicated to public use, whether it be lettered as a street or not. (London & S. F. Bank v. City of Oakland, 90 F. 691, 33 C. C. A. 237.) And the delineation of a street on a map by parallel lines running through the blocks, is sufficient for purposes of dedication, though it is not named as a street. This is true even though the space is not a prolongation of any existing street (San Francisco v. Burr, 108 Cal. 460, 41 P. 482; Schmitt v. San Francisco, 100 Cal. 302, 34 P. 961) and even though it is so marked as to form a cul de sac. (City of Los Angeles v. McCollum, 156 Cal. 148, 23 L. R. A. [N. S.] 378, 103 P. 914.) And even where a strip of land dividing two tiers of lots in a subdivision is marked with a lot number, a dedication is shown where representations are made to purchasers of lots fronting on it that it is to be used as a street, and it is in fact improved, known and continuously used as a public way, to the knowledge of the owners of the tract. (City of Venice v. Short Line Beach Land Co., 180 Cal. 447, 181 P. 658.)"

It was stipulated at the trial that Kate Maxwell had sold and conveyed title to all the lots in blocks 4 and 5 and in making her deeds had described the property sold by references to the map. In the case of Larkey v. City of Los Angeles, 70 Cal. App. 635, 233 P. 991, 992, where the effect of such deeds was discussed, the court said: "The mere filing of the map of record, designating certain portions of the tract as streets and alleys, is simply an offer to dedicate the spaces designated on said map as streets and alleys to the public for highway purposes. Elliott v. McIntosh, 41 Cal. App. 763, 766, 183 P. 692. But when the owner, after recording such a map, sells lots designated thereon by reference to said recorded map, he thereby irrevocably dedicates the streets and alleys shown thereon to the use of the public. San Leandro v. Le Breton, 72 Cal. 170, 13 P. 405; Archer v. Salinas City, 93 Cal. 43, 16 L. R. A. 145, 28 P. 839; Davidow v. Griswold, 23 Cal. App. 188, 137 P. 619; Daly City v. Holbrook, 39 Cal. App. 326, 178 P. 725; Elliott v. McIntosh, 41 Cal. App. 763, 183 P. 692; Berton v. All Persons, etc., 176 Cal. 610, 170 P. 151. Therefore, when the original owners of Arlington heights tract filed for record the map of this tract and sold said lots in said tract according to said map, the streets and alleys designated thereon became dedicated to the public, and no further action was necessary either upon the part of the public authorities or upon the public in the use of said streets and alleys in order to constitute the streets and alleys of said tract public highways. As we have already seen, said map was filed for record on May 19, 1887, and 3 of the lots of said tract abutting on said alleys and lying immediately opposite to, and to the north of, plaintiff's said lot 22 were sold by the original owner by the 10th day of December, 1888. Accordingly said alley became irrevocably dedicated as a public alley on December 10, 1888. Therefore no title to any portion of said alley could be acquired by plaintiff or her predecessors in interest by adverse possession subsequent to said last-named date. As was said by the court in a similar case: 'The property dedicated has become public property, impressed with the use for which it was dedicated, and neither can the public divert it from that use nor can it be lost by adverse possession. Nor is the effect of such dedication impaired by any delay in the use of the land for which it was set apart. Such failure to make use of the land does not authorize the owner to resume possession. The public can thereafter appropriate the land to the use for which it was dedicated whenever convenience or necessity may suggest.' Davidow v. Griswold, supra."

[2] Appellant maintains that there was no acceptance by the public authorities of the city of San Diego of the offer of dedication, if one were made. We think the certificate of the action of the common council on April 28, 1903, attached to the map of the subdivision, if we consider the Beach either an unnamed alley or an extension of Sea lane, either of which would be justified from the map itself, was a sufficient acceptance on behalf of the public of the offer to dedicate. Section 3, Stats. 1901, p. 288.

[3-5] On July 21, 1924, the common council of the city of San Diego passed an ordinance, whereby it declared that the Beach (describing it by metes and bounds) "be and the same is hereby declared to be an open public street of said city, and is hereby named 'Neptune Place'." Appellant maintains that the passage of this ordinance demonstrates that the property had not previously been accepted as a public way. We cannot put such a construction upon its language. The dedication was complete many years before the ordinance was passed. The property became a public way and the city could not divest itself of its easement except by appropriate proceedings taken in accordance with law. An owner cannot withdraw an offer of dedication when it has been completed by acceptance. The public cannot lose its right in a street or alley through adverse possession nor by delay in using or improving the property. Archer v. Salinas City, 93 Cal. 43, 28 P. 839, 16 L. R. A. 145; Fitzgerald v. Smith, 94 Cal. App. 480, 271 P. 507; Daly City v. Holbrook, 39 Cal. App. 326, 178 P. 725.

[6] Kate Maxwell paid taxes upon the property in question from 1917 to 1929. Appellant urges that this is a strong argument against the theory that the property was ever dedicated and accepted as a street. In Venice v. Short Line, etc., Co., 180 Cal. 447, 181 P. 658, it was held that payment of taxes is not conclusive evidence against the dedication of a street. In this connection it should be observed that Kate Maxwell did not pay taxes upon the property between 1903, when her map was recorded, and 1917. Even though the property were not assessed during this period, this might well indicate the existence of a belief in her mind during these fourteen years that she did not own the property and is a circumstance showing that she intended to dedicate it to public use and that she entertained a belief that it had become free from assessment by reason of the acceptance by the city of San Diego of her offer of dedication.

[7] The judgment decreed that "the City of San Diego is the owner, in possession and entitled to possession" of the property in question, when, as a matter of fact, it owned only an easement over it (section 2631, Pol. Code; 13 Cal. Jur. 364), the fee remaining in the abutting owners. Kate Maxwell sold all abutting property years before the institution of this action. Appellant cannot complain because the judgment gave the city more than that to which it was entitled as she was not injured thereby. The owners of the abutting property are not parties to this action and are not here complaining of the judgment.

Judgment affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Franklin A. Griffin, Judge.

Action by J. R. Miller and another against the San Francisco Church Extension Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal.

Reversed.

J. E. White and Walter McGovern, both of San Francisco, for appellants.

Keyes & Erskine, of San Francisco, for respondents.

STURTEVANT, J.

This is an appeal by the defendants from a judgment of damages arising out of a transaction in which the plaintiffs, as architects, were employed. The record is very long. The facts are few and may be briefly stated.

In the conflagration of 1906 in San Francisco many churches were burned, and among others the church buildings then occupied by the congregation of each appellant except San Francisco Church Extension Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church. The latter corporation was an auxiliary organization of the denomination but never conducted a church. The congregation of each church desired the construction of a place of worship that it might call "home." The congregations, as such, and their several members, commenced to discuss ways and means. Later, on December 1, 1925, the several congregations formed a joint organization and appointed members of the Downtown Church Committee, with authority to act, but that it should act through the San Francisco Church Extension Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church as their trustee of the enterprise. Still later the Downtown Church Committee authorized the society to enter into, and it did enter into, a contract with the plaintiffs. In so far as pertinent to this action, said contract provided:

"1. This agreement, made and entered into this 1st day of December, in the year of Our Lord, one thousand nine hundred and twenty-five, by and between the San Francisco Church Extension Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, a corporation duly organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the State of California, hereinafter called the Owner, and J. R. Miller and T. L. Pflueger, doing business under the firm name of Miller and Pflueger, hereinafter called the Architects:

"2. Witnesseth: That whereas, the said Owner intends to erect and construct a church building upon that certain real property situated, lying, and being in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and more particularly described as follows:

"3. Commencing at a point of intersection of the Northerly line of McAllister Street with the Westerly line of Leavenworth Street; running thence Westerly along the said Northerly line of McAllister Street, one hundred thirty-seven (137) feet, six (6) inches; thence at right angles Northerly one hundred thirty-seven (137) feet six (6) inches; thence at right angles one hundred thirty-seven (137) feet six (6) inches to the Westerly line of Leavenworth Street; thence Southerly along the said Westerly line of Leavenworth Street, one hundred thirty-seven (137) feet six (6) inches.

"4. Now, therefore, the Owner and the Architects, for and in consideration of the mutual covenants and agreements herein contained, agree as follows:

"5. The said Architects agree to perform for the above named work, professional services as stated herein, and the Owner agrees to pay the Architects at the rate of six per cent (6%) upon the cost prices of the building as hereinafter set forth. * * *

"8. Whether the work be executed or whether its execution be suspended or abandoned in part or in whole, payments to the Architects on their fee are to be made as follows: Upon the completion of the preliminary studies, a sum equal to twenty per cent (20%) of the basic rate of six per cent (6%). Upon completion of specifications and general working drawings, exclusive of details, a sum sufficient to increase payments on the fee to 60% of the rate or rates of commission arising from this agreement, computed upon a reasonable cost estimated on such completed specifications and drawings, or if bids have been received, then computed upon the lowest bona fide bid or bids. * * *

"18. In Witness Whereof, the said parties have executed this agreement the day and year first hereinabove written."

There is no evidence that on December 1, 1925, the exact type of building had been determined on. All agreed that a house of worship was contemplated for the use of each of the said congregations. All else was left to future determination by the duly authorized agents of the interested parties. Mr. Pflueger was a member of one of the associated congregations and also a member of the plaintiff partnership. No fraud is claimed. During the trial there was no claim of corporate double, and there is no evidence thereof.

The society on March 24, 1927, wrote the plaintiffs the contract had been abandoned by the plaintiffs and therefore was abandoned by the society. More correspondence followed in which the plaintiffs stated that they had not abandoned, etc. Nevertheless, nothing more was done by either under the contract. No building of any kind was built by the defendants. However, another corporation, Leavenworth-McAllister Realty Company, was formed which negotiated a lease to the Linnard Company, and then, at a cost of about $1,677,419.69, built the William Taylor Hotel and the church as they now stand on the lot described in the contract in suit.

[1, 2] The defendants assert that a judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff and against the principals and their agent and that such a judgment is erroneous. Klinger v. Modesto Fruit Co. (Cal. App.) 286 P. 727; McDevitt v. Corriea, 70 Cal. App. 245, 233 P. 381; Ewing v. Hayward, 50 Cal. App. 708, 195 P. 970. The contention is sound, but no motion was made in the trial court requiring the plaintiffs to elect. The point may not be urged for the first time on appeal. Klinger v. Modesto Fruit Co., supra. True it is that the defendants moved that the case be dismissed as to the society, but it did not rest with the defendants nor with the trial court to select which defendant the plaintiffs should proceed against. The trial court did not err in denying the motion that was made.

[3, 4] It is next contended that the court wrongfully construed the contract. We think it did. No person connected with the transaction was confused as to the meaning of the expression "church building." No one was confused as to who had signed, or who were the parties to the contract. There was nothing to construe. In this connection the defendants object to the large amount of parol evidence introduced by the plaintiffs which brought into the record numerous declarations made prior to December 1, 1925, by numerous members of the different churches as to the opinions of such members as to the kind of a building that should be constructed. That evidence, it may be conceded, was improperly admitted, but it is difficult to see how it was prejudicial, because immediately after December 1, 1925, numerous discussions and debates arose on the same identical subject. Both the plaintiffs, the defendants, and those for whom the defendants were acting participated in those discussions. As will hereinafter appear, such discussions perhaps operated to modify the contract as written. Assuming for the purpose of this decision that they did, as will hereinafter appear, neither the plaintiffs nor the defendants were injured thereby.

As to the instructions that were given, the defendants claim several should not have been given. Many of the attacks are well founded. We will not stop to discuss each one. It will suffice to state that the attacks are but other methods of presenting the points that have been fully treated herein. The same comment may be made on the claim that the trial court refused to give certain other instructions.

[5] The next point made by the defendants is that the court erred in excluding certain evidence which they tendered. They offered to prove that Mr. Hobart, the architect of the William Taylor Hotel, never used any of the sketches or plans made by the plaintiffs. The objections of the plaintiffs were sustained. These defendants were not prejudiced. If the defendants, or any of them, had used the sketches or plans a different question would have been presented. But the offered evidence was not addressed to what these defendants received or used.

[6] Finally, it is asserted that the evidence was insufficient to sustain the judgment for the plaintiffs. The point is sound, and the record discloses no conflict in the evidence. As we see the facts, the point has three different aspects which are not necessarily related.

(1) If, as the defendants assert, the building of a church building with an adjunct of income producing property was ultra vires the defendant corporations, it does not follow that the defendants are entitled to be wholly discharged. They are liable for the reasonable value of the services rendered by the plaintiffs to the extent that the defendants accepted and now retain the benefits of such services. 6a Cal. Jur. 1282. However, the record does not show specifically what those benefits were. The contract was terminated so far as the defendants are concerned on the 24th day of March, 1927. Prior to that date the record discloses that numerous conversations were held, that some sketches, drawings, plans, or models were made, but it does not show what was done prior to that date nor the value thereof.

[7-12] (2) As intimated above, there is evidence that after December 1, 1925, and prior to March 24, 1927, the contract as written was modified by the acts of both parties, and that thereafter the contract was terminated. If it was so modified, the liability of the defendants under such circumstances is settled law. Naylor v. Adams, 15 Cal. App. 548, 556, 115 P.

335. However, for the reasons just stated, the amount of that liability cannot be ascertained from the record before us.

(3) The plaintiffs' complaint contains three counts. The first pleads a written contract according to its legal effect. The second pleads the same contract in hæc verba. The third sets forth a common count in quantum meruit. Allegations are present in each count purporting to plead an unlawful discharge. There was not a particle of evidence that the plaintiffs were wrongfully discharged. The evidence was without conflict that the defendants abandoned the contract. Their act of abandonment operated as a discharge. But in measuring the liability of the defendants there is a great difference between a lawful discharge or abandonment and an unlawful discharge. Paragraph 8 of the contract is as follows: "Whether the work be executed or whether its execution be suspended or abandoned in part or in whole, payments to the Architects on their fee are to be made as follows: Upon the completion of the preliminary studies, a sum equal to twenty per cent (20%) of the basic rate of six per cent (6%). Upon completion of specifications and general working drawings, exclusive of details, a sum sufficient to increase payments on the fee to 60% of the rate or rates of commission arising from this agreement, computed upon a reasonable cost estimated on such completed specifications and drawings, or if bids have been received, then computed upon the lowest bona fide bid or bids." That paragraph reserved to the employer the right to abandon the enterprise and fixed the measure of its liability. When thereafter it exercised its right of abandonment, such act on its part was not an unlawful discharge of the plaintiffs. 39 C. J. 72 and 91; 1 Labatt's Master and Servant, 633; Roberts v. Crowley, 81 Ga. 429, 7 S. E. 740; Harder v. Board of Commissioners of Marion County, 97 Ind. 455; Douglass v. Merchants' Ins. Co., 118 N. Y. 484, 23 N. E. 806, 7 L. R. A. 822; Leonard v. Sparks, 109 La. 543, 33 So. 594; Smith v. Douglass, 4 Daly (N. Y.) 191; Trumbull v. Frey, 71 Neb. 754, 99 N. W. 648; Willis v. Rose, 29 Misc. 111, 60 N. Y. S. 271; Egbert v. Sun Co. (C. C.) 126 F. 568, 571. While the foregoing authorities are applicable to employments generally, the particular rule applicable to architects is the same. That paragraph 8, as quoted, is in legal effect a reservation to the employer of the right to abandon, is clearly supported by the authorities. O'Kain v. Davis, 186 Ky. 184, 216 S. W. 354; Dittoe v. Morgan, 207 Ky. 267, 268 S. W. 1065; Orth v. Board of Public Education, 272 Pa. 411, 116 A. 366, 20 A. L. R. 1352. As stated above, that paragraph also fixed the rule for measuring the employer's liability in the event of an abandonment by it. When one of these contracts contains a covenant on the subject, it is enforced by the courts as nearly as possible according to its terms.

In the case of Orth v. Board of Public Education, supra, the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania had under consideration a case that was closely parallel in its facts. A written contract was before the court. In one paragraph there was a statement of percentages governing the apportionment of the payments to the architect. In another paragraph there was reserved to the owner the right to terminate the contract. When the bids were received, the lowest bid was prohibitory. The enterprise was abandoned. The architects sued for the balance remaining unpaid. There they attempted to recover on the cost as portrayed by the lowest bid. On page 367 of 116 A. the court said: "It was also erroneous to estimate the 3 per cent. on the excessive cost, arising out of the unusual conditions prevailing when the bids were received. As already pointed out, 1 per cent. was due when 'the final preliminary study is adopted,' and an additional 2 per cent. when 'the working drawings and specifications are completed and adopted.' There was then no other 'cost of the building' except the 'estimates of cost of construction,' calculated by plaintiffs themselves, and hence the 3 per cent., if then paid, as the contract provided it should be, necessarily would have had to be computed thereon."

The case of Dittoe v. Morgan, 207 Ky. 267, 268 S. W. 1065, is another case closely parallel in its facts. It involved a business block. The owner was prepared to invest $20,000. The lowest bid was $30,000. On page 1066 of 268 S. W. the Supreme Court of Kentucky said:

"A question arises, upon what amount shall this be based? We think this also reasonably clear. The contract provides that in case the work is abandoned before completion the architects shall be reimbursed for the amount of labor performed prior to such abandonment in accordance with rates established by this contract; 'that until a definite estimate is furnished, the architects' charges shall be based upon the proposed cost of the work.' In this case the work was abandoned and no definite estimate was furnished. The lowest bid cannot be arbitrarily fixed as a definite estimate because it was rejected as being too high. The contract clearly contemplates that under such circumstances the charges shall be based upon the proposed cost of the work. The evidence indicates that this was $20,000, and such was the amount upon which the architects based their first charge.

"Accepting this as a basis, plaintiffs were entitled to recover 4½ per cent. of $20,000, or $900, subject to a credit of $600, and the court should have peremptorily instructed the jury to find a verdict in their favor for $300."

As stated by Judge Dallas in the case of Egbert v. Sun Co., supra, "The corporation had no justification for its termination of the employment of Egbert when and as it terminated it other than that which it derived from the letter of its president, and it cannot be permitted to take a benefit under that letter, and at the same time disown the obligation it imposed. McHose v. Earnshaw, 5 C. C. A. 210, 55 F. 587." Sustaining the latter proposition, see, also, Hecht v. Brandus, 4 Misc. 58, 23 N. Y. S. 1004; Caulfield v. Yazoo & M. V. R. Co., 170 La. 155, 127 So. 585; McGehee v. Cunningham, 181 Ark. 148, 25 S.W.(2d) 449, 451.

[13, 14] When, however, no building has been constructed, there is no cost price, and the architect may not base his claim on the lowest bid, for that was not the language of the contract. Orth v. Board of Public Education, supra. When the actual cost far exceeds the estimated cost the architect may not claim compensation on the excessive cost, for that was brought about by his error. Edwards v. Hall, 293 Pa. 97, 141 A. 638; Saad v. Bates, 208 Ky. 542, 271 S. W. 568; Headlund v. Daniels, 50 Utah, 381, 167 P. 1170. If the excessive cost is brought about by changes involving extras, the rule is altered by reason of the owner's acts. Blackhall v. Duthie-Strachan, 258 Mass. 551, 155 N. E. 604. In the instant case the building was not constructed, and there was therefore no cost price. As stated above, there was no estimated price. Therefore the courts cannot enforce the covenant contained in paragraph 8 as it is written. Be that as it may, the plaintiffs were entitled to prove by competent witnesses the reasonable value of their services. Shipman v. State, 42 Wis. 377, is in part closely applicable to the instant case. Shipman, an architect, was employed by the building commissioners to make plans and specifications for a hospital to be located at Oshkosh, Wis. The hospital was to be of the same capacity as the one then located at Madison. It was to be composed of several buildings—an administration building, a north wing, a south wing, and some other outbuildings. The commissioners entered into a contract with the plaintiff by the terms of which he was to be paid "* * * the sum of 5% on the cost of construction." The first statute appropriated moneys to build one of the buildings; a subsequent statute appropriated moneys to build another building; finally, moneys were appropriated to build the south wing. Before the latter building was commenced, the plaintiff was lawfully discharged. Before being discharged, he had made plans and specifications for all of the buildings and had superintended the construction of all except the south wing. In suing for compensation, he pleaded his contract as to all except the south wing. As to services rendered in preparing plans on that wing, he sued in quantum meruit. On page 389 of 42 Wis., the Supreme Court of Wisconsin says: "The question is, What is he entitled to recover? So far as the contract was executed, there is no difficulty. The plaintiff can recover the contract price for his plans and specifications and services as superintendent up to the time of his discharge. He may further recover the value of his plans and specifications for that portion of the work which he did not superintend, on a quantum meruit. His discharge was within the lawful authority of the trustees under chapter 176, Laws of 1872. The contract affords no means or data, it is true, by which the relative value of the plans, etc., as distinguished from the value of superintending the work, can be ascertained. If, instead of fixing an entire sum for both services, the contract had stated what was to be paid for all the plans and specifications furnished, and what to be paid as compensation for services as superintendent, the amount of recovery could readily be ascertained. But as it is, the value of the plans, etc., for that part of the work which the plaintiff did not superintend, must be a subject of proof; but in no event would he be permitted to recover more than the contract price for both services."

Counsel have not cited to us, and we have not found any authority at variance with the rule as stated by the Supreme Court of Wisconsin.

[15] As stated above, paragraph 8 of the contract clearly contemplated that at the date of the abandonment, if any, by the defendants, the plaintiffs should be compensated for services rendered prior to that date. In their letter of abandonment on March 24, 1927, the defendant society admitted that liability. The first payment actually payable to the plaintiffs as stated in the contract was "* * * upon the completion of the preliminary studies. * * *" There is evidence that the preliminary studies were prepared; but, except that piece of evidence which will next be discussed, there was no evidence introduced as to the value of the plaintiffs' services. Over the objection of the defendants, the court received in evidence the cost of constructing the William Taylor Hotel as it now stands. That building was built by a different corporation. The evidence was res inter alios. It should not have been received. In asking that the evidence be admitted it was claimed that the evidence cast some light on the value to be set on the services rendered by the plaintiffs. But, as we have shown, it was not admissible for that purpose.

The judgment is reversed.

Robert M. Bradley, Jr., of Redlands, for respondent Sarah D. Allen.

HARDEN, Justice pro tem.

Some time prior to January 24, 1928, Mrs. Sarah D. Allen was appointed by the county of San Bernardino as deputy registrar of voters of said county. She was of the age of about seventy-five years at that time. Joseph C. P. Hook, deputy city clerk of Redlands in said county, administered the oath of office. No particular term of employment was fixed in her appointment, but it was contemplated that she would act until thirty days prior to the presidential primary election on May 1, 1928. It was stipulated by the parties hereto that the relation existing between Mrs. Allen and the county could have been terminated at any time without liability to either party. While she had the legal right to register any qualified elector in the county, she was assigned by said deputy city clerk to a certain district in the city of Redlands, definitely marked by reference to designated streets, for the purpose of securing registrations. Other persons were engaged by the county to perform similar services in districts assigned to them. Mrs. Allen was not required to work any particular number of hours, nor on any particular days. Aside from the assignment to the particular district, the only instructions given her were printed on a pad of registration blanks and covered the law upon the subject of the registration of electors. She had had previous experience in the same work. In securing registrations she followed her own methods and furnished her own transportation. Payment for services rendered was at the rate of eight cents per capita for registrations secured; and up to the time of the accident involved herein she had earned an average of about $1.50 per day for the time devoted to the work, amounting in all to $28. On January 24, 1928, while engaged in securing registrations within her district, a question arose as to whether she should register certain school teachers who resided within the district but were employed at the time at a point beyond the boundaries thereof. Being uncertain as to her rights and duties under the circumstances, Mrs. Allen proceeded toward the office of said deputy city clerk to secure advice and directions from him upon the subject. While walking upon the sidewalk within the boundaries of the district assigned en route to consult said deputy city clerk for said purpose, she was struck by colliding automobiles, with the result that she sustained serious injuries. The county had no connection with either automobile involved in the collision. No action was filed to recover damages for the injuries sustained. On July 20, 1928, Mrs. Allen effected a settlement and was paid $3,500 by an insurance company in behalf of one of the parties involved in the collision, in consideration of which payment she signed a full release of said party from all claims and causes of action on account of injuries sustained by her and damage to her property. The settlement was made without the knowledge or consent of the county; neither did the Industrial Accident Commission nor any court consent thereto.

Pursuant to proceedings instituted by Mrs. Allen before the Industrial Accident Commission on January 10, 1929, for compensation for said injuries, a final decision was rendered by the commission in favor of the petitioner therein on March 7, 1932. It was found by the commission that, at the time of the injury, Mrs. Allen was employed as a deputy registrar of voters by the county of San Bernardino; that the injuries sustained arose out of and in the course of her employment; that the employer was uninsured, and that both employer and employee were subject to the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act (St. 1917, p. 831, as amended); that Mrs. Allen was entitled under the provisions of said act to $675.54 for permanent disability and to $2,225.70 for her reasonable medical expenses, making a total of $2,901.24; and an award was made against the county of San Bernardino for that amount, less $75 payable to her attorney. The decision further recites: "The said applicant received the sum of $3,500.00 under a settlement with the third party causing the injury, no part of which sum has been received by the defendant herein, (the County of San Bernardino). Testimony was duly presented to this Commission tending to establish that of the said amount of $3,500.00 the sum of $1,000.00 represented, under agreement of the parties to said settlement, the element of pain and suffering caused by said injury as distinguished from compensable disability and expenses." The commission held, however, that it had no jurisdiction to make a judgment segregating any portion of the amount received in the settlement, nor to grant any credit to the county upon its liability. The county has not paid Mrs. Allen anything as compensation under said act.

[1, 2] The first point raised in this proceeding is that at the time of the injury Mrs. Allen was not an employee within the meaning of that term as defined by the Compensation Act; that, on the contrary, she was an independent contractor. By the terms of section 8(a) of said act (St. 1917, p. 835) the term "employee" is defined to mean: "* * * all elected and appointed paid public officers, * * * but excluding any person whose employment is both casual and not in the course of the trade, business, profession or occupation of his employer." An "independent contractor" within the meaning of said act is held in Fidelity & Casualty Co. v. Industrial Acc. Com., 191 Cal. 404, 407, 216 P. 578, 579, 43 A. L. R. 1304, to be: "One who renders service for a specified recompense for a specified result, under the control of his principal as to the result of his work only, and not as to the means by which such result is accomplished." There is no claim that Mrs. Allen's employment was casual. We think the language of the statute is a complete answer to the contention that she was not an employee. At that time a deputy registrar of voters of said county was a deputy county clerk and was an appointed, paid public officer. Section 4237, Pol. Code, amended by St. 1927, p. 1075. If more need be said upon this phase of the case, we think that, aside from the fact that an appointed, paid public officer is declared to be an employee, the nature of the relationship existing between Mrs. Allen and the county would prevent a holding that she was an independent contractor. Ordinarily, unless but one inference can reasonably be drawn from the facts, the question whether a workman is an employee within the meaning of the act is one of fact for the commission, upon which its finding is conclusive. Roman Catholic Archbishop v. Industrial Acc. Com., 194 Cal. 660, 230 P. 1. Stress is laid upon the mode of payment adopted as indicating that Mrs. Allen was not an employee. "A workman who is paid wages by the piece or quantity comes within the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act the same as one who is paid by the day. Wages may be measured by time, by the piece, or by any other standard. * * * One of the best tests to determine whether the relation is that of an independent contractor or that of employer and employee is the right of control. It is not the fact of actual interference with the control, but the right to interfere, that makes the difference between an independent contractor and a servant or agent. * * * Coincident with the right of control is the right of either the employer or the employee to terminate the relation without liability. This is but another way of stating the rule, for the right to immediately discharge involves the right of control." Hillen v. Industrial Acc. Com., 199 Cal. 577, 581, 250 P. 570, 571. The mode of payment did not make Mrs. Allen an independent contractor, and the fact that the county retained the right to discharge her at any time was inconsistent with the creation of that relation. The commission has found that she was an employee and not an independent contractor. The finding is proper.

[3-6] The second point raised is that Mrs. Allen was not engaged in the course of her employment at the time she was injured. Whether an injury arose in the course of the employment is primarily a question for the commission to determine, and its findings on such question will not be disturbed when there is substantial evidence to support them. Myers v. Industrial Acc. Com., 191 Cal. 673, 218 P. 11; Crockett v. Industrial Acc. Com., 190 Cal. 583, 213 P. 969. As stated, at the time of the injury Mrs. Allen was within the district assigned her en route to consult the deputy city clerk of Redlands, who had sworn her to the performance of her duties and who had assigned her to duty in her district. It is claimed she had no lawful right to look to Mr. Hook for advice or instructions; that he had no connection with the county of San Bernardino. While no legal relation existed between him and the county of San Bernardino, so far as the record discloses, still Mr. Hook was not a total stranger to the county. The county either authorized or permitted him to assign Mrs. Allen to her district. She might naturally have been expected to look to him for directions under the circumstances. We see nothing in the fact that Mr. Hook was not a county official. There is no claim that Mrs. Allen was loitering along the street when injured. The nature of her employment would naturally take her upon the streets, and it may be assumed that it was within the contemplation of both parties that she would go upon the streets to secure registrations. The risks common to travel upon the streets are recognized as incidental to many kinds of employment. The cases of messengers and solicitors furnish close analogies. Frigidaire Corp. v. Industrial Acc. Com., 103 Cal. App. 27, 283 P. 974; Real Silk Hosiery Mills, Inc., v. Industrial Acc. Com., 86 Cal. App. 189, 260 P. 807; Makins v. Industrial Acc. Com., 198 Cal. 698, 247 P. 202, 49 A. L. R. 411. In the last-mentioned case the district assigned to a carrier of newspapers was held to be the employee's place of employment within the meaning of the Compensation Act. Ordinarily, the purpose of the act of the employee out of which the injury arose, rather than the method of its performance, determines whether he was injured while within the course of his employment, unless the act, even though intended to forward the purpose of the employer, was of such an exceptional and unusual nature that it could not reasonably be said to be within the scope of the employment. Standard L. Co. v. Industrial Acc. Com., 60 Cal. App. 331, 212 P. 720. In this case we may inquire whether the trip undertaken by Mrs. Allen was personal to her or in behalf of her employer. In view of her assignment to a particular district by the deputy city clerk, the restriction thereby put upon her in the matter of registering electors, and the particular question that arose as to the registration of the teachers, we think there was nothing personal about the inquiry she proposed to make of the deputy city clerk and the trip undertaken for that purpose. It had to do only with the employment and was in behalf of the employer. "An employee is in the 'course of his employment' when he does those reasonable things which his contract with his employer expressly or impliedly permits him to do." Hartford A. & I. Co. v. Industrial Acc. Com., 202 Cal. 688, 691, 692, 262 P. 309, 310, 58 A. L. R. 1392. On what we regard as sufficient evidence the commission has determined in effect that the employee was engaged in the performance of an act impliedly permitted by her employer, and has concluded that she was then in the course of her employment. With that decision of the commission we cannot interfere.

[7, 8] The next point made arises from the contention that the county should have been credited by the commission with a portion of the award received by the employee in her settlement. Although the finding thereon is indefinite, seemingly the evidence was sufficient to satisfy the commission that there was an agreement between the parties to the settlement to the effect that the sum of $1,000 was allowed and accepted on account of pain and suffering caused by the injury as distinguished from compensable disability and expenses. The decision of the commission denying the county the credit claimed turns upon the position taken by the commission that, under the facts, viewed in the light of the case of Ansbach v. Dept. Ind.

Rel., 99 Cal. App. 677, 279 P. 224, it had no jurisdiction to grant the credit. Reliance is also placed by the commission upon the cases of Jacobsen v. Industrial Acc. Com., 212 Cal. 441, 299 P. 66, and Zurich, etc., Co. v. Industrial Acc. Com. and Lidberg, 212 Cal. 451, 299 P. 70. The settlement made by Mrs. Allen was invalid for the reason that the county did not consent thereto. Section 26 of the act (as amended by St. 1927, p. 1213) provides: "When any injury or death shall have been suffered by an employee, no release or settlement of any claim for damages by reason of such injury or death and no satisfaction of judgment in such proceedings, shall be valid without the written consent of either both employer and employee, or one of them, together with the consent of the commission or the court in which any such action may be pending, after notice to and opportunity of all parties to the action to be heard by such court."

Inasmuch as the liability to pay compensation is created by statute and not by the award of the commission, the right of an employer to sue for damages is not dependent upon the making of an award by the commission. Moreno v. Los Angeles Transfer Co., 44 Cal. App. 551, 186 P. 800; Sacramento v. Central California Traction Company, 78 Cal. App. 215, 248 P. 307. In Papineau v. Industrial Acc. Com., 45 Cal. App. 181, 187 P. 108, it was held that a settlement with an employee, without the consent of the employer and before the filing of claim with the Industrial Accident Commission, could not prejudice the right of the employer to recover from the third party for liability created on account of the award made by the commission in favor of the injured employee and against such employer. The settlement made herein being invalid, the county may not claim any part of the amount received thereon as a credit upon its liability to pay compensation under the award made by the commission.

[9, 10] The last point raised is that in the making of the award the commission erroneously allowed certain charges made by physicians and nurses for care and treatment of the employee. The commission found that Mrs. Allen was totally temporarily disabled as the result of her injury from January 24, 1928, to and including January 1, 1931. No attack is made upon this finding. Particular objection is made to bills rendered and allowed in connection with the treatment of a malignant condition which developed in the roof of Mrs. Allen's mouth. The contention that there was no proof of any injury to Mrs. Allen's mouth which could necessitate said treatment is without foundation. She testified that at the time of the accident her false teeth punctured her palate and made an incision there. It is also claimed that duplicate charges were made and allowed for nursing. Twenty-three bills were presented and allowed, either in whole or in part, by the commission. As to many of said bills, express approval was given by the district attorney, as the legal representative of the county. As to other bills, objection was made by him upon the ground that the services rendered were too remote from the injury to be the subject of proper charges against the county. Some of the bills presented had been paid at the time of the hearing, and as to said bills, such fact was legal evidence of the reasonableness of the charges made therein. Dewhirst v. Leopold, 194 Cal. 424, 229 P. 30; Townsend v. Keith, 34 Cal. App. 564, 565, 168 P. 402; Latky v. Wolfe, 85 Cal. App. 332, 259 P. 470. Other bills were submitted to the commission by consent for allowance in full or in part in accordance with the schedule of the commission. All of the questions raised as to the amount of the award for medical expenses were for determination by the commission. In the reception and consideration of the evidence the commission was not held to the strict rules applicable in the courts. It is provided in section 60(a) of the Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 871) that "neither the commission nor any member thereof, nor any referee appointed thereby, shall be bound by the common law or statutory rules of evidence; * * * nor shall any order, award, rule or regulation be invalidated because of the admission into the record, and use as proof of any fact in dispute, of any evidence not admissible under the said common law or statutory rules of evidence and procedure." Western Pipe & Steel Co. v. Industrial Acc. Com., 194 Cal. 379, 381, 228 P. 859; Pacific Gas & Electric Co. v. Industrial Acc. Com., 180 Cal. 497, 181 P. 788. The power of this court on certiorari to consider the questions raised in respect to the amount allowed for medical expenses in the award goes only to the determination of whether or not the commission had jurisdiction, and not as to whether in the exercise of that jurisdiction errors were committed. Maryland Casualty Co. v. Industrial Acc. Com., 178 Cal. 491, 173 P. 993. The commission had jurisdiction to allow all the bills and charges for medical expenses included in the award.

The award is affirmed.

Action by F. A. Stahmer against Herman A. Stahmer. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Montgomery Flynn, of Oakland, for appellant.

Owen D. Richardson and Donald B. Richardson, both of San Jose, for respondent.

NOURSE, J.

Plaintiff sued to quiet title to certain real property and defendant had judgment. Plaintiff appeals on typewritten transcripts.

The parties are both sons of Mrs. Auguste Stahmer, deceased, who, in August, 1918, executed her deed of gift conveying her property to plaintiff. This deed she delivered to a third person with written instructions to deliver it to plaintiff upon her death. In October, 1926, the mother executed another deed conveying the same property to defendant in consideration of a written contract wherein defendant undertook to care for his mother during the remainder of her life and to pay a fixed sum monthly to another brother. This deed was recorded on the day of its execution. Mrs. Stahmer died April 15, 1929, and thereafter plaintiff recorded his deed.

When the cause was called for hearing each counsel stated his version of the issues —the plaintiff predicating his case on whether the defendant was an innocent purchaser for value and whether plaintiff was estopped to assert his rights under his deed; the defendant adding that the knowledge of the defendant and the consideration he paid the grantor were also in issue. The trial court found that the plaintiff was estopped to claim any rights under his deed, but failed to find explicitly that the defendant was an innocent purchaser or that the consideration paid was of value.

On this appeal the appellant bases his attack upon the finding of estoppel. In this we are in accord with his contention that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding, and we may assume that respondent is also in accord as he makes no effort to defend the finding. The record is void of any evidence tending to prove any one of the essential elements of an estoppel as defined in section 1962, Code of Civil Procedure. See, generally, vol. 10, Cal. Jur., p. 627.

Appellant also argues that respondent at all times had knowledge of the deed of gift to appellant and that he was not therefore an innocent purchaser. In this respect the evidence is conflicting. The appellant and another witness testified to conversations had with respondent regarding the deed of gift. The respondent denied these conversations in toto. The trial court, having all witnesses before it, had to decide which was entitled to belief, and we do not find in the respondent's testimony such inherent improbability that we could say as a matter of law that his testimony should be rejected. Though the findings are inaptly drawn, it seems to have been the intention to find that respondent executed the contract with his mother in ignorance of the prior deed to appellant; that he faithfully performed his contract with her; and that he was an innocent purchaser for value.

[1-4] The real question on this appeal is whether, in the absence of an estoppel, respondent may have his title quieted upon the showing that he was an innocent purchaser for value. The answer to this question depends upon whether the grantor intended to part with title when she delivered the deed of gift to a third party in 1918. If she did not and that deed was testamentary, she retained the right to revoke it and hence respondent's title is clear. The written instructions to the escrow holder being incomplete, the grantor's intention is a question of fact. Bury v. Young, 98 Cal. 446, 33 P. 338, 35 Am. St. Rep. 186; Williams v. Kidd, 170 Cal. 631, 151 P. 1, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 703; Kimbro v. Kimbro, 199 Cal. 344, 350, 249 P. 180; Manwell v. Board of Home Missions, etc. (Cal. App.) 10 P.(2d) 787. As an issue of fact it was an essential element of plaintiff's case and the burden was upon him to prove it in support of his allegation that the deed of gift was delivered to a third party for his benefit "without reservations or exceptions." No proof having been offered we must assume, in support of the judgment, that, if evidence had been tendered and findings made, these findings would have been adverse to appellant.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; J. D. Murphey, Judge.

Action by John Dickey against A. Kuhn and wife. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Ramsey Probasco and Clarence De Lancey, both of Oakland, for appellant.

Clark, Nichols & Eltse, of Berkeley, for respondents.

PER CURIAM.

The litigation between the above parties, of which this action is a part, arose out of an agreement relating to the sale of a restaurant in Berkeley on or about July 24, 1922. The plaintiff executed to the defendant A. Kuhn (who will be hereinafter referred to as the defendant) the following instrument:

"Sold this day to A. Kuhn the following described property: the certain lease, fixtures and equipment and stock on hand on the date of consummation of sale, located at 2242 Telegraph avenue, Berkeley, California, for $5,000. Terms, $1,500 cash; balance in six months without interest; sale of the above fixtures and lease to be clear of indebtedness and perfectly clear title. Possession to be given July 29, 1922. Six days allowed to take up this option or forfeit the payment of one hundred dollars.

"[Signed] John Dickey."

The defendant accepted the offer contained therein and paid on account the said sum of $100.

On or about July 31, 1922, their agreement was modified as to the terms of sale, pursuant to which defendant, being credited with the sum of $100, paid the sum of $400 in cash, and he and Lilian Kuhn, his wife, who is joined as a defendant in the present action, executed three promissory notes for the balance of the purchase price, one for $500, payable August 10, 1922, the second for the same amount, payable August 20, 1922, and the third for $3,500, payable six months after July 31, 1922. Defendant thereupon took possession of the restaurant and paid the first note when it became due. Before the maturity of the second note defendant brought an action to cancel the remaining notes upon the grounds of fraud and failure of consideration. Plaintiff denied the allegations of the complaint, and cross-complained upon the second note, which was then due. A judgment was entered in favor of the latter, which was affirmed on appeal. Kuhn v. Dickey, 66 Cal. App. 227, 225 P. 867.

Subsequently Dickey brought suit upon the $3,500 note, and defendant Kuhn as a defense alleged the same facts constituting fraud and failure of consideration which were contained in his complaint in the action first mentioned. It was alleged therein as a further ground for the claimed failure of consideration that Dickey failed to procure the written consent of the landlord to the transfer of the lease of the restaurant. Evidence supporting these defensive allegations was admitted over objection, and a jury returned a verdict for defendant Kuhn. Judgment was entered accordingly, but upon appeal, was reversed (Dickey v. Kuhn, 85 Cal. App. 8, 259 P. 93, 95); the Appellate Court holding that upon the allegations of fraud and failure of consideration the judgment in the first action was res adjudicata. On the same appeal the Supreme Court, in denying a petition for a hearing in that court, held that the former judgment was not res adjudicata as to whether defendant Kuhn "would have had the right to show that upon the due date of the note sued upon herein he had offered or was prepared to pay the same, but that the plaintiff was then unable to procure the assent of the original landlord to a transfer of the lease, and that for that reason the consideration of said note had failed." The Supreme Court further said: "Having, however, abandoned the premises prior to the due date of said note, and having never offered to pay the same upon the above conditions, he was no longer entitled to defend against its payment upon that ground."

The action was again tried, this time by the court, which found that by reason of the abandonment of the restaurant by defendant Kuhn before the due date of the note Dickey was at no time in default; that the only part of the equipment to which Dickey did not have complete title was a certain cash register, but that he was at all times ready, willing, and able to transfer the fixtures and equipment upon payment of the note, which payment had not been made; and "that all matters in relation to the abandonment of said contract, to the formal tender of title and to the formal assignment of the lease from plaintiff to defendant, have been fully adjudicated in the case of Kuhn v. Dickey, 66 Cal. App. 227, [225 P. 867]." A judgment was accordingly entered for the amount of the note with interest and attorney's fees.

From this judgment Kuhn appealed. On this appeal it was held that the judgment in Kuhn v. Dickey, 66 Cal. App. 227, 225 P. 867, did not involve Dickey's obligation upon the final payment under the contract, which was represented by the $3,500 note, and was not res adjudicata on the question of his readiness, willingness, and ability to perform; further, that while under section 1440 of the Civil Code a seller was not required to perform or offer to perform after the purchaser had refused performance, the section did not dispense with the ability of the seller to perform when he sought to enforce the obligation, and that a finding to the effect that Dickey had been ready, able, and willing to perform was not sustained by the evidence. The judgment was accordingly reversed, and a petition to have the case heard by the Supreme Court was denied. Dickey v. Kuhn, 106 Cal. App. 300, 289 P. 242.

The present appeal was taken from a judgment entered upon a verdict in favor of defendant Kuhn. Plaintiff claims that the implied finding that he was not ready, able, and willing to perform is unsupported; that the admission of certain evidence was erroneous, as were several instructions to the jury; further, that defendant was not entitled to a jury trial.

[1, 2] As to the first ground for the appeal, we have examined the testimony and are of the opinion that it was amply sufficient to sustain the finding. The evidence was conflicting in many respects, and the credibility of the witnesses who testified in this regard was a question for the jury, who were not bound to find in accordance with the testimony of even uncontradicted witnesses, as the most positive testimony may contain inherent improbabilities as to its accuracy, or the manner of the witness in testifying may impress the jury with doubts as to his truthfulness. Davis v. Judson, 159 Cal. 121, 113 P. 147; 27 Cal. Jur., Witnesses, § 156, p. 184.

As to the second ground, the evidence complained of was relevant upon the above issue, and its admission was not error.

The instructions to which plaintiff excepts were fair and accurate statements of the law as applied to the evidence and admitted facts of the case. Furthermore, the jury was fully advised by other instructions in these respects, and we find no ground for the complaint that the same were erroneous or prejudicial.

[3] The last contention, namely, that the defendant was not entitled to have the cause tried by a jury, is based upon the following facts: The first trial was by a jury. At the second trial a jury was waived, and the last trial was had before a jury over the objection of the plaintiff, who claimed that by the previous waiver the right to a jury in any subsequent trial was also waived.

The decisions on the question in other jurisdictions are conflicting (35 Cor. Jur., Juries, § 141, p. 223), and no California case has been called to our attention; but whatever the right of a party under such circumstances, it is the rule that notwithstanding a jury has been waived in the statutory manner, it is within the discretion of the trial court to disregard the waiver and try the case by a jury. 2 Bancroft's Code Practice and Remedies, § 1120, p. 1580, and cases there cited; 35 Cor. Jur., Juries, § 139, p. 222; Doll v. Anderson, 27 Cal. 248; Bullock v. Consumers' Lumber Co., 3 Cal. Unrep. 609, 31 P. 367, 369; Harmon v. Hopkins, 116 Cal. App. 184, 2 P.(2d) 540. The court did not abuse its discretion in so doing; and after an examination of the entire record we are convinced that the verdict was fully sustained, and that no error has been shown which can reasonably be said to have resulted in a miscarriage of justice.

The judgment is affirmed.

The ordinance imposing tax on dealers in oleomargarine, irrespective of amount of sales, was void because clearly excessive and prohibitory, and because tax was apparently imposed either for purpose of revenue or for purpose of indirectly prohibiting sale of oleomargarine, not for purpose of regulation.

SPENCE, J.

Petitioner was arrested upon a charge of violating a county ordinance passed by the supervisors of the county of Marin and known as Ordinance No. 206. He seeks his release upon habeas corpus.

The ordinance was passed on March 15, 1932, and took effect thirty days thereafter. In its entirety it reads as follows:

"Ordinance No. 206.

"An ordinance defining the terms 'Substitute for Butter,' and requiring persons, firms and corporations manufacturing, buying, selling, dealing in or furnishing or having in possession for any purpose other than consumption in his own family a substitute for butter to obtain a license authorizing them to do so and to pay a license fee; and providing penalties for the violation of this ordinance.

"The Board of Supervisors of the County of Marin, State of California, do ordain as follows:

"Section 1. It shall be unlawful for any person, firm or corporation, whether as principal, clerk, servant, agent or employee, outside of the limits of any incorporated city of the County of Marin, to manufacture, buy, sell, deal in, or furnish to his, its or their patrons, or to have in possession for any purpose whatsoever other than for consumption in his own family, or for transportation in case of a common carrier, any oleomargarine or other substitute for butter without first having procured a license so to do as in this ordinance provided.

"Section 2. For the purposes of this ordinance, a substitute for butter is defined as any article, product or compound made wholly or partly out of any fat, oil or oleaginous substance or compound thereof, not produced directly and wholly (except for the addition of small quantities of salt and coloring matter) and at the time of manufacture from unadulterated milk or cream from the same, and the moisture content of which exceeds 2% by weight of finished product.

"Section 3. Such licenses shall be issued by the Tax Collector of the County of Marin, State of California, upon the payment to him of a license fee of two hundred dollars ($200.00) per year, payable in advance. All money received in payment of such license fees shall be paid into the General Fund of the County of Marin by the Tax Collector.

"Section 4. No license issued under this ordinance shall be assignable or transferable, nor shall it authorize any person, firm, or corporation other than the one named in the license to do business, nor shall it authorize the business therein named to be transacted at any place other than is therein mentioned or named without permission of the Tax Collector endorsed on said license; provided, that licensees having more than one place of business shall obtain a license for each of said places of business. Every license issued under this ordinance shall bear on its face in black-faced type at least twice as large as any other type appearing on its face the words 'Dealer in Butter Substitutes.'

"Section 5. Every person, firm or corporation having a license as herein provided for shall keep said license continuously and conspicuously on display in that part of his or its place of business frequented by those buying butter substitute from him or it. Every person, firm or corporation having a license as herein provided for shall also keep the state license to deal in substitutes for butter or cheese continuously and conspicuously on display in that part of his or its place of business frequented by those buying from him or it. The posting or possession of said state license shall be prima facie evidence of a violation of this ordinance unless the possessor thereof shall have procured a license as in this ordinance provided.

"Section 6. Each separate act in violation of any provision of this ordinance shall constitute a separate offense and every person, firm or corporation violating any of the provisions of this ordinance shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be punished by a fine not exceeding five hundred dollars ($500.-00), or by imprisonment in the County Jail of the County of Marin for not exceeding six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

"Section 7. This ordinance is hereby declared to be enacted in the exercise of the police power of the County of Marin, State of California, and for the purpose of preventing fraud in the sale of substitutes for butter. If any section, sentence, clause or phrase of this ordinance shall be declared invalid, such decision shall not affect the validity of the remaining portions of this ordinance. The Board of Supervisors hereby declares that it would have passed this ordinance and each section, sentence, clause and phrase thereof irrespective of the fact that any one or more sections, sentences, clauses or phrases is declared unconstitutional or otherwise invalid.

"Section 8. This ordinance shall take effect thirty (30) days after its passage, and before the expiration of fifteen (15) days from the passage hereof, it shall be published for at least one week in the San Rafael Independent, a newspaper published in the County of Marin."

Petitioner was engaged in the business of selling oleomargarine and had some of the product in his possession for the purpose of sale. He failed to obtain the license referred to in the ordinance and his arrest followed.

In this proceeding petitioner contends that the ordinance is invalid, urging constitutional and other grounds in support of his contention. Most of the legal principles relied upon by petitioner are not disputed by respondent, but the latter contends that these principles have no application here. It is conceded that the ordinance must stand or fall as a regulatory measure for a county can impose a license tax for the purpose of regulation only and cannot impose such tax for the purpose of revenue. Pol. Code, § 3366; County of Plumas v. Wheeler, 149 Cal. 758, 87 P. 909. It is further conceded that an ordinance purporting to prohibit the manufacture or sale of oleomargarine would be unconstitutional (Jelke Co. v. Emery, 193 Wis. 311, 214 N. W. 369, 53 A. L. R. 463; People v. Marx, 99 N. Y. 377, 2 N. E. 29, 52 Am. Rep. 34; see, also, Weaver v. Palmer Bros. Co., 270 U. S. 402, 46 S. Ct. 320, 70 L. Ed. 654), and that any ordinance indirectly accomplishing that result by means of imposing a tax in such amount as to be prohibitory would likewise be unconstitutional. In re Dees, 50 Cal. App. 11, 194 P. 717; Merced County v. Fleming, 111 Cal. 46, 43 P. 392.

The foregoing principles have been enunciated in County of Plumas v. Wheeler, supra. At page 762 of 149 Cal., 87 P. 909, 910, the court there said: "The principles affecting the right of legislative bodies in the exercise of what is known as the 'police power,' to place restrictions upon the conduct of lawful pursuits and occupations, are well settled, although there is often great difficulty in applying these principles to a given state of facts. It is within the legislative discretion to place such restrictions upon the use of any property or the conduct of any business as may be reasonably necessary for the public safety, comfort or health. * * * The manner and extent of such regulation are primarily legislative questions, and the courts will not interfere unless it clearly appears that the Legislature has, under the guise of regulation, imposed an arbitrary or unreasonable burden upon the use of property or the pursuit of an occupation. But the legislative determination is not conclusive. As this court said, in Re Smith, 143 Cal. 368, 77 P. 180: 'The law will not allow the rights of property or business to be invaded under the guise of police regulation for the benefit of the public health or good order, when it is manifest that such is not the object or purpose of the enactment or by-law.' 'The question in each case,' says the Supreme Court of the United States, 'is whether the Legislature has adopted the statute in exercise of a reasonable discretion, or whether its action be a mere excuse for an unjust discrimination or the oppression, or spoliation of a particular class.' Holden v. Hardy, 169 U. S. 366, 18 S. Ct. 383, 42 L. Ed. 780."

In Re Dees, supra, the court said at page 16 of 50 Cal. App., 194 P. 717, 719: "Even though the power to license for revenue be upheld, it is not a power to prohibit. The question of whether or not the ordinance is so unreasonable in character as to transcend the proper exercise of the law-making power is one to be determined by the court."

Again, in Merced County v. Fleming, supra, the court said at page 50 of 111 Cal., 43 P. 392, 393: "It is perfectly true that the power to [license and] regulate for the purposes of revenue is not the power to prohibit, and that an attempt to accomplish the latter object under a pretense of regulation cannot be upheld."

In the early case of Ex parte Frank, 52 Cal. 606, 28 Am. Rep. 642, the court expressed the general rule as follows: "An ordinance passed under a general authority of this nature must be, first, 'reasonable, consonant with the general powers and purposes of the corporation, and not inconsistent with the laws or policy of the State'; second, it must not be oppressive; third, it must be impartial, fair, and general; fourth, it may regulate but must not restrain trade. (Dillon on Municipal Corporations, secs. 253 to 257 inclusive, and authorities there cited.)"

The rule as stated in Ruling Case Law, vol. 26, p. 238, is as follows: "In most of the states, however, it is regarded as the law that an excise upon the performance of an act which the legislature could not constitutionally prohibit must be reasonable in amount, and must not amount to the suppression of any useful or legitimate occupation or the deprivation of any natural and inalienable right. It is generally recognized that among the inalienable and inherent rights guaranteed by our constitution to every law abiding citizen is the right to live and enjoy life, and the right to acquire property; and that these rights necessarily carry with them the right to gain a livelihood and acquire property by following any useful or legitimate occupation, the pursuit of which is not injurious to the public weal. If you deprive a man of the means of livelihood, you necessarily deprive him of the right to live and enjoy his life. Great as is the taxing power, it can never rise superior to the inalienable rights guaranteed by the constitution."

[1] The ordinance in question upon its face purports to be a regulatory measure expressly declaring that it was enacted "for the purpose of preventing fraud in the sale of substitutes for butter" (section 7, supra); but the court is not bound by the face of the ordinance, and it is within its power to take evidence relating to the purpose and effect of the ordinance in order to determine the validity thereof. In re McCoy, 10 Cal. App. 116, 101 P. 419. It was petitioner's main contention that the ordinance was invalid because the license tax prescribed was prohibitory in amount and upon that issue certain evidence was taken before this court to supplement the stipulations of facts entered into by the parties.

[2] Before discussing the facts developed in the stipulations and testimony, we first desire to call attention to section 12½ of the General Dairy Law of the State of California (St. 1931, p. 459, General Laws, Act 1945), in effect at the present time as well as at the time of the passage of said ordinance. A reading of the provisions of the state law, not to mention the federal laws and regulations on the subject, shows that a complete scheme for the regulation of the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine had been provided requiring, among other things, the payment of license taxes. Comparing the ordinance with the provisions of the General Dairy Law it is at once apparent that the ordinance added nothing thereto by way of regulation except to provide that every person engaged in the business in the county of Marin should obtain and post another license and pay therefor another license tax in the sum of $200 per annum. In the case of retailers the county tax provided by the ordinance is forty times as large as the $5 tax imposed by the state law.

Coming to a consideration of the evidence before us, it appears that at the time the ordinance was enacted there were approximately ten persons, firms, or corporations engaged in the sale of oleomargarine in the county of Marin outside the limits of incorporated cities to whom said ordinances would apply; that said number included both wholesalers, distributing to the retail dealers from trucks, and the retail dealers; that there were but four retail dealers in the county outside of the limits of incorporated cities who sold oleomargarine to the general public; that during the twelve months' period before the ordinance took effect three of said four retail dealers sold less than 1,000 pounds each of oleomargarine and the fourth sold approximately 1,200 pounds; that the profit to said retail dealers on said sales was approximately 3½ cents per pound, varying from 2 cents to 4 cents per pound; that certain distributers had no established places of business in Marin county, but sold from trucks in which they visited the retailers and solicited sales; that the entire sales of oleomargarine of one of the larger distributers in the county of Marin in 1931, including sales to retailers within incorporated cities and towns, was 15,600 pounds; that the distributer's profit upon said sales varied from 2 to 3 cents per pound; that since the passage of said ordinance no licenses required thereby have been applied for or issued; that no expense has been incurred by the county by reason of said ordinance except the nominal cost of printing and publishing the same; that none of the county officers has expended or planned to expend any money or to incur any additional expense on behalf of the county by reason of the adoption of said ordinance. It further appears that oleomargarine is a wholesome product having a definite food value; that it is a product of vegetable oils emulsified in ripened skim-milk to which salt is added; that animal fats are sometimes used, but not in the product manufactured in this state; that oleomargarine is used as a substitute for butter and sold as a competitor thereof, selling for approximately one-half the price; that butter and oleomargarine have been selling side by side over a period of time with no appreciable change in the ratio of price and that the sale of butter in the county of Marin and throughout the state of California exceeds the sale of oleomargarine.

With the foregoing facts before us we have no hesitancy in declaring that in our opinion the ordinance in question is invalid. Its title discloses its sole and only purpose, to wit, to require a license and the payment of a license tax. The only semblance of a regulatory provision is the one requiring that the county license as well as the state license be conspicuously displayed. In view of the provisions of section 12½ of the General Dairy Law we cannot but conclude that this purported added regulation was but a pretense inserted in an attempt to justify the imposition of a tax. It was in effect no regulation at all and the prospective cost of enforcing this purported regulation would be negligible. The $200 tax imposed upon every retailer irrespective of the amount of sales is clearly excessive and prohibitory. It cannot be justified upon the theory that it bears any relation to the cost of enforcement of the purported regulation and its effect is to entirely suppress the sale of oleomargarine in the unincorporated territory within the county. The conclusion is inescapable that the tax was imposed either for the purpose of revenue or for the purpose of indirectly prohibiting the sale of oleomargarine. Whatever may have been its purpose, its effect is obvious and the ordinance must fall under the authorities above cited.

In view of the conclusions which we have reached, we deem it unnecessary to discuss petitioner's further contention that the ordinance is inconsistent with section 12½ of the General Dairy Law and therefore unconstitutional under section 11 of article 11 of the Constitution.

It is ordered that the petitioner be discharged.

2. Automobiles ⇐305(1).

In suit by motorist colliding with schoolhouse moved along street, city ordinance and charter provisions relating to permits for moving buildings and permit for moving schoolhouse in question held admissible.

Such evidence was properly admitted as showing the obstruction was not unlawful because, in the absence thereof, it might well have been contended that the placing of a building in the street constituted a nuisance within the meaning of Civ. This is so because it is provided by St. 1923, p. 540, § 83, as amended by St. 1929, p. 526, § 29, that the general provisions limiting the maximum width of vehicles and their loads shall not apply to special mobile equipment, and because under St. 1923, p. 517, § 7½, added by St. 1927, p. 1421, § 2, as amended by St. 1929, p. 509, § 1, dollies used in moving are classified as special mobile equipment.

Action by Frederick Klopper against the D. J. & T. Sullivan Company and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals.

Vincent W. Hallinan, Michael Riordan, and James J. Roach, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Daniel W. Burbank, C. F. Laumeister, William M. Abbott, K. W. Cannon, Cyril Appel, and Ivores R. Dains, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

SPENCE, J.

Following a trial by jury, judgment upon the verdict was entered in favor of defendants, from which judgment plaintiff appeals.

The action was brought to recover for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained by plaintiff as a result of negligence upon the part of defendants. The accident occurred at about 1 o'clock on the morning of November 5, 1929, on Mission street near Ocean avenue, in San Francisco. Pursuant to a permit granted by the board of public works, defendants were engaged in moving a schoolhouse twenty-four feet in width along Mission street. At the time in question the schoolhouse was not in motion, but was temporarily standing in the middle of the street. There were lighted red lanterns hanging close to the ground at the four corners of the schoolhouse. Plaintiff collided therewith while operating his automobile in a northerly direction along Mission street. Both negligence and contributory negligence were issues under the pleadings and the trial court gave instructions on these issues.

[1] Appellant contends that the trial court erred in admitting certain evidence and in the giving and refusing of certain instructions. Practically all of appellant's contentions are based upon his theory that the general provisions of the California Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 517, as amended) relating to the width of vehicles and their loads, the parking of vehicles, and the required lights on vehicles and their loads, were applicable to this schoolhouse. While it is true that the schoolhouse had been moved to the point where it was situated by placing it on three small dollies and drawing it with a truck, we find nothing in the Vehicle Act which leads to the conclusion that the above-mentioned general provisions relating to ordinary mobile equipment and loads were applicable under the circumstances. On the other hand, we believe that the regulations relating to the moving of buildings under permit governed.

[2, 3] The evidence which appellant claimed was erroneously admitted consisted of article VI, chapter I, section 9, subdivision 1, of the charter of the city and county of San Francisco, giving the board of public works the general control of public streets and specific authority to prescribe rules and grant permits "for the moving of buildings through the streets"; also a certain ordinance of the city and county of San Francisco relating to permits for moving buildings; and also the particular permit issued to the respondent corporation by the board of public works granting permission to move the schoolhouse in question. All of this evidence was properly admitted. In the absence thereof it might well have been contended that the placing of a building in the street constituted a nuisance within the meaning of section 3479 of the Civil Code, which covers the "unlawful obstruction" of the free use of a public street. The evidence was proper to show that obstruction was not unlawful. Appellant's contention that the charter provisions mentioned conflict with and were superseded by section 83 of the California Vehicle Act (as amended by St. 1929, p. 526, § 29) cannot be sustained. It would be sufficient to point out that it is provided by subdivision b of that section that the general provisions of subdivision a limiting "the maximum width of vehicles and their loads shall not apply to * * * special mobile equipment" and that under section 7½ of said act (added by St. 1927, p. 1421, § 2, as amended by St. 1929, p. 509, § 1), dollies are classified as special mobile equipment. But in addition we believe that a reading of said section 83 and other general sections of the act claimed to be applicable shows that these sections were never intended to apply under the circumstances before us. To construe the general provisions of those sections of the act relating to width of ordinary vehicles and their loads, to the parking of ordinary vehicles, and to the lights required on such vehicles and their loads as applicable to a schoolhouse merely because of the fact that it is in the street mounted upon several units of special mobile equipment, would in our opinion lead to absurd results.

[4-6] From what has been said it follows that the trial court properly instructed the jury that respondents had the right under the permit from the board of public works to occupy such portion of the street as was necessary to move the school building. It further follows that it was proper to give the instruction to the effect that if the jury found that lights were maintained on said building which under the conditions prevailing were visible for a sufficient distance to apprise persons using the street of the presence of the building and enable them to avoid the danger, the respondents were not negligent. The only objection raised by appellant to the last-mentioned instruction is that it ignored the general provisions of the Vehicle Act relating to lights on vehicles and their loads, but as above indicated, those general provisions were inapplicable. The refusal of the trial court to read to the jury the general provisions of the act relating to lights and to parking of vehicles was not error.

[7] It appears that respondents had removed a lighted red lantern from the rear of the truck and placed it between the lighted headlights on the front of the truck which was standing in front of the schoolhouse and facing in the direction from which appellant was approaching. Appellant strenuously insists that this constituted a violation of sections 100 and 111 of the Vehicle Act (as amended by St. 1929, pp. 531, 536, §§ 39, 42), prohibiting more than two headlights and prohibiting driving on the highway with a red light in front. He thereupon contends that his requested instructions relating to these sections should have been given. Assuming, without deciding, that the placing of this red light on the front of the standing truck constituted a violation of the act, it is apparent that there was no error in refusing the proposed instruction, as the violation, if any, could not have been a proximate cause of appellant's colliding with the schoolhouse.

[8, 9] Appellant offered two further instructions which were properly refused. The first contained the provisions of section 3479 of the Civil Code, which declare the unlawful obstruction of the free use of the street to be a nuisance. The second told the jury that if they found that respondent "unlawfully obstructed" the street, then it was no defense that they were permitted to do so by the municipal authorities. These instructions were contradictory within themselves in that the permit issued by the board of public works made lawful the obstruction of the street to the extent necessary to move the building and said section 3479 could have no application.

The instructions given amply covered the remaining proposed instructions of the appellant in so far as said proposed instructions correctly stated the law applicable to the case.

We do not wish to be understood as indicating that none of the provisions of the Vehicle Act are applicable to any type of structure moved upon the highway mounted on any type of mobile equipment. We are nevertheless of the opinion, as above indicated, that none of the general provisions of the act referred to by appellant are applicable under the facts in the present case.

As in our view the judgment must be affirmed for the reasons stated, we deem it unnecessary to discuss respondents' further contention that appellant was guilty of negligence as a matter of law in running into this standing schoolhouse under the conditions existing and damaging one of the lighted red lanterns which was hanging at or about the point of impact.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. WILLIAMS.

Cr. 2208.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, California.

Aug. 18, 1932.

1. Criminal law ⇐306.

Presumption constitutes species of evidence which, unless controverted, is sufficient proof of existence of fact to which it relates.

2. Criminal law ⇐1202(3).

Introduction of record showing one with defendant's name had pleaded guilty to burglary established prima facie case against defendant with reference to former conviction (Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 25).

3. Criminal law ⇐1202(3).

Evidence establishing, prima facie, defendant's former conviction of felony authorized introduction of testimony regarding his admission of prior conviction.

4. Criminal law ⇐1200.

That prior conviction was nine years old did not preclude imposition of additional punishment, since facts relating thereto did not constitute essential ingredient of second offense (Pen. Code, § 800).

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles D. Ballard, Judge.

Spencer Williams was convicted of forgery, and of prior conviction of burglary, and he appeals.

Affirmed.

William Bronsten, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Alberta Belford, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HOUSER, J.

By an information defendant was accused of the crime of forgery. Later, by an amended information, defendant was charged with the commission of the identical offense of which he was originally charged, and, in addition thereto, in substance the information contained the allegation that theretofore, in Yuba county, within this state, said defendant had been convicted of the crime of burglary.

From a judgment of "conviction of a felony, to-wit, forgery, and prior conviction on burglary," defendant has appealed to this court.

[1-3] Appellant contends that prejudicial error was committed by the trial court in that, as related solely to the prior conviction of defendant, "the corpus delicti was not proved at the time the admission of the defendant was allowed to go into evidence." In that connection, the record discloses the fact that preceding the introduction of testimony by a witness to the effect that defendant had admitted to him all the facts relevant to the charge of prior conviction, the prosecution introduced in evidence certified copies of the record in the superior court, in and for the county of Yuba, this state, by which it appeared that theretofore in said court a man by the same name as defendant had pleaded guilty to the former commission by him of the crime of burglary; following which he had been granted probation.

Although prior to the reception in evidence of the admission of defendant which is the subject of appellant's present objection, defendant had not been identified as the person who theretofore had been convicted of a felony, it is noted that the name of the defendant who was convicted in Yuba county is identical with that of the defendant in this action. It is a rule of law that identity of person may be presumed from identity of name (subdivision 25, § 1963, Code Civ. Proc.); also that a presumption constitutes a species of evidence which, unless controverted, is sufficient proof of the existence of the fact to which it relates. 10 Cal. Jur. 746, and authorities there cited. It is therefore apparent that, in the circumstances presented by the record which preceded the admission in evidence of testimony in substance that defendant had admitted his prior conviction, at least a prima facie case had been established against him with reference to his former conviction of a felony. In the case of People v. Hettick, 126 Cal. 425, 428, 58 P. 918, 919, where a similar question was presented for the consideration of the appellate tribunal, it was said:

"In support of the charge of previous conviction of grand larceny the prosecution placed in evidence records of the superior court of San Diego county showing the conviction and sentence to one year in the state prison at San Quentin of 'George Hettick' for the crime of grand larceny in having stolen a mare, the personal property of J. C. Pelton. The testimony of Charles Bell, a witness for the prosecution, was to the effect that the defendant had admitted to him that he was sent to state prison at San Quentin for stealing a horse from John C. Pelton. * * *

"There was nothing to contradict or discredit the foregoing evidence, and we deem it sufficient to support the verdict for the people on the charge of a prior conviction of larceny."

In addition to the facts hereinbefore set forth, the record herein discloses the fact that on cross-examination defendant testified that theretofore, in the county of Yuba, he had been convicted of the crime of "larceny." It follows that, with reference to the point under consideration, defendant has no just ground for complaint.

[4] Appellant also contends that, since "the prior conviction charged in the information is nine years old and outlawed by the statute of limitation," in imposing a sentence on defendant for the commission by him of the crime of forgery, the trial court was without authority to judicially indicate any additional punishment to defendant because of the fact that theretofore he had been convicted of a felony.

The gist of appellant's contention is that, according to the information filed against him, the ultimate fact that defendant had suffered a prior conviction of a felony was an inseparable part and parcel of the main offense of forgery of which he was charged; and that, since by the provisions of section 800 of the Penal Code an information against defendant for the commisson by him of an offense of the nature of that here under consideration must be filed within three years "after its commission," it follows that as to the prior conviction of defendant, which occurred nine years preceding the filing of the information herein, defendant was not lawfully subject to criminal prosecution, and consequently that any judgment rendered by the trial court which in any way imposed, or pretended to impose, upon defendant a sentence of imprisonment greater than that which legally might be imposed for the commission of the crime of forgery (without taking into consideration a prior conviction of defendant) would be and was prejudicial of defendant's substantial rights in the premises.

It is obvious that, if for the commission of a criminal offense, the allegation in the indictment or the information therefor of the necessary facts which relate to any prior conviction of the accused person constitutes an essential ingredient of the second offense, the point presented by appellant is not to be dismissed without having given to it serious consideration; and in that connection, certain cases heretofore decided by the appellate tribunals of this state would seem to countenance, if not to lend support to, the position assumed by appellant. Perhaps originating in the case of People v. Chadwick, 4 Cal. App. 63, 73, 87 P. 384, 389, and thereafter cited and generally followed in the decisions by the courts of this state until and including the case of People v. Carrow, 207 Cal. 366, 369, 278 P. 857, the rule was broadly stated that the fact that the defendant had been previously convicted of a felony was a distinct element of the charge made against him in the indictment, and the defendant has the right to insist that the prosecution shall establish the existence of that element by competent evidence before he can be convicted thereof. But on consideration of each of such authorities it becomes clear that the legal principle there announced is inapplicable to the present situation. For example, in the Chadwick Case, as well as in the case of People v. Carrow, the decision was addressed to the question of whether the evidence received on the trial of the action was sufficient to constitute legal proof of the former conviction of the defendant. The language there respectively employed by the Court of Appeal and by the Supreme Court, the facts considered, is not capable of adaptation to a question of whether the fact of a former conviction is a part and parcel of a subsequent offense. It is not impossible that in the framing of an indictment or an information as may relate to particular offenses, the former conviction of a person accused of the commission of a subsequent offense may become an essential element of the pleading and necessary subsequent proof; but even in such a situation it does not follow that the former conviction of the defendant is a fact directly connected with the violation of the substantive law. As an illustration, a person convicted of the crime of petty larceny becomes punishable as though petty larceny were a felony when in the indictment or the information the fact has been pleaded and thereafter proved that such person theretofore has been similarly convicted and "served a term therefor." Section 666, Pen. Code. But it is obvious that the crime, by whomsoever committed, is defined and determined solely by the overt act which constitutes the criminal offense. The individuality of the person who has violated a general criminal statute is of no importance and furnishes no fact that is determinative of, or even relevant to, the question of whether an infraction of the law has occurred. In the prosecution of any general criminal cases of similar nature, irrespective of whether the respective defendants therein have or have not theretofore been convicted of a felony, wherein proper allegations are contained in the respective indictments or the informations therefor, on the trial the corpus delicti of the alleged crime should be established in the one situation identically as it should be established in the other.

In the case of People v. Wallach, 79 Cal. App. 605, 250 P. 578, 579, the defendant was accused of the crime of burglary, a felony (with a prior conviction). At the trial of the action, on motion of the district attorney, the court struck from the indictment that portion thereof which contained the allegation which related to the prior conviction of the defendant. Following his conviction, on appeal the defendant contended that the necessary result of striking said allegation of prior conviction from the indictment was that thereafter the indictment failed to state a cause of action. In ruling upon the point, in part the court said:

"* * * If this last contention be correct, it must be for the reason that the amendment had the effect of changing the offense charged. This would be so only if the fact of former conviction, as originally alleged in the indictment, is an essential part of the offense, in the sense that burglary committed by one who has suffered a former conviction of burglary is an offense different in character from burglary committed by one who has not suffered such former conviction. * * * Under such circumstances the fact of the former conviction does not change the definition or character of the second offense. It affects only the severity of the punishment. 'The object had in view in charging a previous conviction is not for the purpose of evidence as to the commission of the offense upon which the defendant is to be tried, but for the information of the court in determining the punishment to be imposed in case of conviction, as is clearly shown by sections 666 and 667 of the Penal Code.' People v. Thomas, 110 Cal. 41, 42 P. 456. Our view of the question is made yet more clear by section 1158 of the Penal Code, which requires that the jury, if they find a verdict of guilty 'of the offense with which he is charged,' must separately find whether or not the defendant has suffered the alleged previous conviction, and also, by section 1093 of the Penal Code, which provides that in cases where the indictment or information charges a previous conviction, and the defendant has confessed the same, the clerk, in reading the indictment or information at the trial, shall 'omit therefrom all that relates to such previous conviction.' Manifestly the Code would not have so provided if the charge of a previous conviction was, in legal contemplation, a part of the description of the offense for which the defendant is presently on trial."

As announcing the identical principle of law, see Rawlings v. Commonwealth, 191 Ky. 401, 230 S. W. 529; State v. Webb, 36 N. D. 235, 162 N. W. 358; Neece v. State, 62 Tex. Cr. 378, 137 S. W. 919; Howard v. State, 139 Wis. 529, 121 N. W. 133.

It follows that appellant's point with reference to the applicability of the statute of limitations to the alleged fact of the prior conviction of defendant cannot be sustained.

The judgment is affirmed.

NOURSE, P. J.

Plaintiff sued to recover money alleged to have been paid to the defendants through fraud and deceit. He had judgment for $2,503.10, and the defendant Jespersen alone has appealed.

The complaint alleged that the money was paid upon the defendants' representations that they would organize a corporation for the manufacture and sale of candy and give plaintiff one-half the stock; that the defendants were then engaged in the candy business in which they represented they had each invested $2,500; that the cash on hand of said business exceeded the liabilities; that said business was equipped to manufacture and sell 600 pounds of candy a day, and had customers ready to buy that amount; and that defendants then had in mind another man who was willing to invest $10,000 in said business. The trial court found that all these representations were untrue, that plaintiff believed and relied upon them to his injury, and that defendants knew that they were untrue.

[1, 2] On this appeal the sole ground urged by appellant is that the evidence is insufficient to support these findings. All the arguments advanced by appellant would be pertinent if addressed to the trial court, but they are of no force here because in each instance the record discloses that there is some substantial evidence in support of the finding made. This point is emphasized when we bear in mind that it is not necessary for the plaintiff to prove every item of false representations alleged but that he can recover upon proof of one. Here the evidence as to the representations relating to the amount of money invested in the business by the defendants and that relating to the financial condition of the business is so clear and so free from substantial conflict that it alone is sufficient to support the judgment.

The judgment is affirmed.

HARDEN, Justice pro tem.

John R. Reynolds died testate in San Diego county, Cal., on October 20, 1930, leaving estate therein. His will was admitted to probate in the county court of Knox county, Ill., in August, 1931. A petition for probate of said will as a foreign will was filed in the superior court of San Diego county on September 28, 1931. Objection thereto was filed by Maude Gertrude Jones, administratrix with the will annexed of the estate of Delilah B. Reynolds, deceased wife of said John R. Reynolds, deceased. At the hearing upon the petition, after the reception in evidence of exemplified copies of the proceedings of the Illinois court, said administratrix offered to prove that at the time of his death decedent was a resident of San Diego county. An objection to said offer to prove was sustained, and the will was ordered admitted to probate as a foreign will. Said administratrix has appealed from said order.

The point raised is that it was error to reject said proffered evidence.

No case has been called to our attention which is decisive of the question.

The authority relied upon by appellant is In re Estate of Clark, 148 Cal. 108, 82 P. 760, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 996, 113 Am. St. Rep. 197, 7 Ann. Cas. 306. In that case the decedent died in the county of Yolo, Cal., a resident thereof. Thereafter his will was admitted to probate in the state of New Hampshire. Subsequently proceedings were instituted in the superior court of Yolo county for the purpose of admitting said will as a foreign will. The subject was governed by the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure. Article 3 thereof (sections 1322–1324) was entitled "Probate of Foreign Wills." As a part of said article was section 1322, which read as follows: "All wills duly proved and allowed in any other of the United States, or in any foreign country or state, may be allowed and recorded in the superior court of any county in which the testator shall have left any estate." The court held that said statute applied to foreign wills only and that the will in question could not be admitted as such. In 1911, after the rendition of said decision said section of the Code was amended by adding thereto a concluding clause reading as follows: "* * * Or shall have been a resident, at the time of his death."

Said statute, as amended, was considered in In re Estate of Sankey, 199 Cal. 391, 249 P. 517. In that case the testator died in Texas. His will was admitted to probate in that state, and afterwards ancillary letters were issued thereon as a foreign will by the superior court of Los Angeles county. A petition to revoke the probate thereof as a foreign will on the ground that the testator was a resident of Los Angeles county, Cal., at the time of his death was granted by the trial court. The order was reversed on appeal. There the attack upon the order was collateral, and the court held it not subject thereto. However, the court stated that under the provisions of section 1322, Code of Civil Procedure, upon proper ancillary proceedings, the superior court of Los Angeles county had jurisdiction to admit the will in question as a foreign will, and also remarked that apparently the amendment of said section in 1911 was intended to overcome the effect of the decision in Re Estate of Clark, supra.

Our question is controlled by the provisions of the Probate Code. Section 360 thereof provides: "A will admitted to probate in any other state or country may be offered for probate in the superior court having jurisdiction as determined by section 301 of this code." Section 301 thereof provides: "Wills must be proved, and letters testamentary or of administration granted and administration of estates of decedents had, in the superior court: (1) Of the county of which the decedent was a resident at the time of his death, wherever he may have died; (2) Of the county in which the decedent died, leaving estate therein, he not being a resident of the state. * * *" Section 361 of said Code authorizes the production of an authenticated copy of such a will and covers the procedure of its admission to probate as a foreign will. Section 362 thereof then provides: "If it appears from such authenticated order or decree or otherwise that the will has been admitted to probate in another state or country, and that it was valid according to the law of the place in which the testator was domiciled at the time of his death, or according to the law of this state, it shall be admitted to probate and have the same force and effect as a will first admitted to probate in this state. * * *" No question is raised herein as to the validity of decedent's will.

As applied to this case the provisions of said sections of the Probate Code may not be distinguished from the provisions of section 1322, Code of Civil Procedure, after its amendment in 1911 (St. 1911, p. 88).

Said sections of the Probate Code require the superior court of the county whereof a testator was a resident at the time of his death to admit his will to probate as a foreign will, upon proof of its validity according to the laws of the place in which the testator was domiciled at the time of his death or according to the law of this state and of its prior admission to probate in another state. To hold otherwise would be to disregard the plain provisions of the statute. The evidence offered was immaterial, and it was not error to reject it.

The order is affirmed.

Action by Barbara A. Tasker against Harry C. Phelps in which the A. H. Busch Company intervened. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant and intervener appeals.

YORK, J.

Both of the appeals really depend upon the objection that there is not sufficient evidence to support the findings. An examination of the evidence shows that, with the exceptions hereinafter noted, each and every of the findings necessary to support the judgment is fully supported by direct evidence. It is true that there was evidence that would support different findings, but the findings of the trial court, under such a record as we have here, are binding upon this appellate tribunal. The exceptions above mentioned are covered by amendments, which are hereby made in order to conform to the evidence, as follows:

Finding II is amended to read as follows: "That on the 12th day of July, 1928, and for some time prior thereto and at all times thereafter, said corporation had subscribed and outstanding a total of 500 shares of its capital stock."

Finding III is amended to read as follows: "That on July 12, 1928, the defendant Harry C. Phelps was a stockholder of said Wilmont Auto Livery, and had 249 shares of its subscribed, issued and outstanding capital stock, and at the time of delivery of the promissory note set out in the complaint, said defendant was the owner of 498 shares of said stock, including said original 249 shares owned by him. That said promissory note, although dated July 12, 1928, was not delivered until on or about August 2, 1928."

Finding V, which sets forth the fact of execution and delivery of said promissory note, is amended by striking out the words, "that for the purpose of evidencing said obligation," and by substituting therefor the words, "that in full payment of said prior obligation."

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

CONREY, P. J.

I concur in the judgment. The action is brought to recover upon the statutory liability of defendant Phelps as a stockholder, to pay a proportionate part of money due on a promissory note executed by Wilmont Auto Livery, a corporation, in favor of Wilmont Auto Works & Garage Company, a corporation, which note passed by assignment through successive holders, until it came into the hands of the plaintiff. The intervener, claiming prior rights by assignment of the note, seeks to enforce the same obligation.

The note was dated July 12, 1928. At the trial, defendant admitted that on that day he was the owner of 249 shares of the 500 shares of subscribed stock of the maker of the note, and admitted his liability to the extent measured by that ownership. He claimed, however, and it appears to be the fact, that he did not become the owner of the additional 249 shares charged against him, until after the date of the note. He also contends that the note was given only as evidence of prior indebtedness, and that there is no evidence of the amount of stock owned by him at the time when the indebtedness was originally incurred.

[1] The court should have found as a fact that the note was given in full payment of the prior obligation. This is required by the uncontradicted evidence of the two men who represented the corporation in the transaction, one of them being the defendant Phelps himself. Reporter's Transc., pp. 47 and 44. The decisions are to the effect that, "where there is no understanding that a note shall be accepted in payment and satisfaction of the indebtedness, the liability of the corporation upon the original indebtedness and the derivative liability of those who were stockholders at the time of the creation of the original indebtedness continues." Tierney & Lawford, Inc., v. Wilshire Café Co., 209 Cal. 605, 608, 289 P. 621, 622. Inferentially, it would appear that, if there be such an understanding, whereby the first indebtedness is extinguished, then a new liability arises.

[2] The evidence also proves that the note, although dated July 12th, was not delivered until August on a date subsequent to the transfer to the defendant of the aforesaid additional 249 shares. The defendant himself testified that these additional shares were transferred to him on August 1st, and that the note was actually made on or about August 1st and delivered "perhaps the day after."

[3] As between the intervener and the plaintiff, I think that the court was justified in finding in favor of the plaintiff. The note was assigned and delivered for value, and prior to maturity, to plaintiff's assignor and without notice of the adverse claim of the intervener. There is some evidence that, prior to such assignment, there had been an agreement between the intervener and the payee of the note by which agreement the payee had promised to assign and deliver the note to the intervener, but that the intervener never acquired possession of the note. Under these circumstances, the court was justified in holding that the note became the property of the plaintiff. This being so, the incidental stockholder's liability was a liability to the plaintiff and not to the intervener.

HOUSER, J.

Defendants appeal from a judgment rendered by the superior court in favor of plaintiff in an action to recover a commission alleged to have been earned by plaintiff in performing services for defendants in effecting a sale of certain real property.

[1, 2] It is first contended by appellants that the evidence was insufficient "to show that plaintiff procured purchasers ready, able and willing to purchase the property of the defendants." In that connection, stress is laid upon the point that, although plaintiff was present and assisted in the negotiations between the interested parties on each of several occasions, at which times the sale of the property in question was under consideration, he never appeared to be acting in the capacity of agent for defendants, but rather seemed to be a person who was taking merely a friendly interest in the matter. But the record discloses the fact that plaintiff had a written agreement with defendants regarding his agency and the compensation to which he would become entitled in case he were to make a sale of the property, and that at least he materially aided in inducing the purchasers to enter into a contract with defendants to purchase the property. In such circumstances, together with other dependent facts with relation thereto which were before the trial court, it is manifest that the conclusion reached by the trial court thereon was supported by substantial evidence, and hence that such conclusion may not be disturbed by this tribunal.

[3] As an additional objection, appellants direct attention to the asserted fact that the trial was devoid of evidence by which was established the conclusion that the purchasers were financially able to pay the price which they agreed to pay for the property. However, it is admitted that, in writing, defendants agreed to sell the property to the persons produced by plaintiff, and that by the terms of the same instrument those persons agreed to purchase it. In the case of Sobaje v. Schubert, 37 Cal. App. 709, 174 P. 364, it is said (syllabus): "Where an owner of real property accepts the offer therefor made by a person produced by the broker employed to make the sale, he thereby admits the readiness, willingness, and ability of the purchaser to consummate the sale."

In the case of Malmstedt v. Stillwell, 110 Cal. App. 393, 398, 294 P. 41, 42, it is said: "It is urged that there was no evidence that Simonsen and Fleming were able and willing to buy; but, as held in the following cases, where the owner accepts the buyer procured—which the evidence sufficiently shows was true in the present case—he thereby admits the readiness, willingness, and ability of the purchaser to consummate the sale. [Citing authorities.] * * *"

In the case of McNamara v. Steckman, 202 Cal. 569, 572, 262 P. 297, 298, it is held that: "* * * Furthermore the execution by the owner of said contract of sale is conclusive proof that he was satisfied as to the qualifications of the purchaser and his ability to carry out the terms of the contract. * * *"

To the same effect, see Wood & Tatum Co. v. Basler, 37 Cal. App. 381, 384, 173 P. 1109; Johnson v. Krier, 59 Cal. App. 330, 332, 210 P. 966; Freeman v. Creelman, 60 Cal. App. 14, 23, 212 P. 56; Contant v. Wallace, 62 Cal. App. 768, 770, 217 P. 1081; Brooks v. Gross, 106 Cal. App. 277, 281, 288 P. 1089; Vickery v. Valdez, 113 Cal. App. 135, 142, 298 P. 151.

It therefore is manifest that the position assumed by appellants in that particular is not well taken.

[4] The next legal proposition advanced by appellants is that "the evidence does not show that a sale of the defendants' property was ever consummated."

As hereinbefore has been set forth, through the efforts of plaintiff certain persons were induced to agree to purchase from the defendants, and thereupon the defendants agreed to sell to said persons the property which was the subject of the commission contract theretofore entered into between plaintiff and the defendants. Specifically, appellants contend that, because an actual transfer of title to the property from the defendants to the intending purchasers did not result from the agreement which had been executed by the respective parties, plaintiff is not entitled to his commission for effecting a sale of the property. But the law of this state has long since been settled to the contrary. The syllabus in the case of Purcell v. Firth, 175 Cal. 746, 167 P. 379, succinctly states the rule which is here applicable as follows: "Under an agreement to pay a real estate broker the regular commission on a sale of real estate 'when the same is consummated,' the commission is earned when a purchaser ready, willing, and able to buy is produced, regardless of the consummation of the sale by the passing and recording of the deed."

And in Turner v. Watkins, 36 Cal. App. 503, 172 P. 620, by the syllabus therein the law is thus declared: "Under an agreement to pay a broker a commission upon the 'consummation' of an exchange of real property within a fixed time, the broker is entitled to his commission where, within the time, he presents the other party to his principal and they enter into an agreement for the exchange, notwithstanding the deal was never completed and deeds did not pass between the parties." See, also, Radich v. Cernokus, 65 Cal. App. 452, 224 P. 124; Phelps v. Prusch, 83 Cal. 626, 23 P. 1111; Wallace v. Zinman, 200 Cal. 585, 254 P. 946, 62 A. L. R. 1341.

[5] It is also urged by appellants "that Mrs. Lewis (one of the defendants) did not sign the deed"; and consequently that no commission for the sale of the property was earned by plaintiff. However, as is shown by the record herein, the deed actually was executed by Mrs. Lewis. But the latter fact considered, appellants contend that, because the agreement by which the defendants agreed to pay a commission to plaintiff contained the provision that "in the event that Mrs. Harry L. Lewis fail to sign the deed to said property, John J. Grove (plaintiff) waives his claim for his commission," an unqualified signature to the deed by Mrs. Lewis was contemplated by the parties; and that, because on signing the deed Mrs. Lewis authorized its delivery on the condition that from the money which might be received from the sale of the property she should be paid the sum of $15,000, it should follow as a matter of law that, since no transfer of title to the property resulted, plaintiff was not entitled to any commission.

The provision in the agreement regarding the waiver by plaintiff of his commission related only to the signature by Mrs. Lewis of the deed without any condition which she might demand or impose as a consideration for her signature. It is apparent that any arrangement between the two defendants as to a division of the proceeds of the sale of the property should not have the effect of depriving plaintiff of his right to a commission to which otherwise under the law he had become entitled.

[6] Assumedly under authorization therefor, as provided by section 4¾ of article 6 of the Constitution, and section 956a of the Code of Civil Procedure, as a claimed right incident to their appeal, appellants have presented herein their application "for leave to produce additional evidence," to the end that this court "may make findings of fact contrary to, or in addition to, those made by the trial court," and thus reverse the judgment rendered by the trial court.

As set forth by appellants in their said application, "material evidence bearing on the issues in the above-entitled action has been discovered and produced * * * subsequent to the trial; * * * that said evidence, as set forth in the supporting affidavits, * * * shows that the appellants were defrauded by respondent John Grove, and that a sale of the real property on which said respondent claims a commission was never authorized or intended by the so-called purchasers thereof; that said respondent is not the real party in interest and was not the procuring cause of a sale of such real property, if any such sale took place."

Under the issues presented by the pleadings in the action, it well may be doubted whether much of the evidence of the nature of that indicated by the language contained in the application would be admissible on the trial of the action; but waiving any such objection, and considering the proposed additional evidence as admissible under the present issues, on consideration of such evidence as is outlined in the application and as is amplified by the "supporting affidavits," it is clear that the effect is identical with a condition which would appear on a motion for a new trial on the ground of "newly-discovered evidence." It is not even suggested by appellants that the evidence which they seek to introduce necessarily would result in findings of fact which would be "contrary to, or in addition to, those made by the trial court." At most, if admitted, in the main the proposed evidence would be but cumulative of that which was received on the trial of the action; and even assuming that it should not be weakened on cross-examination of the witnesses who gave testimony to the effect as indicated by the application herein, or that it would not be absolutely overcome by rebuttal which might be produced by plaintiff, on the issues presented by the pleadings it would still be within the power, authority, and discretion of the court to make findings identical with those already made. In other words, the "newly-discovered evidence" is not, nor would it be, determinative of the issues presented; it is not conclusive. Furthermore, it is offered, not for the purpose of affirming the judgment, but for the purpose of reversing it.

Considering the facts as disclosed both in the record on appeal and in the affidavits filed herein in support of the application of appellants to take said additional evidence, it would appear to be definitely settled by the authority of the appellate tribunals of this state that the resulting situation does not justify an order by this court by which the application by appellants would be granted. Tupman v. Haberkern, 208 Cal. 256, 280 P. 970; In re Estate of Wirt, 207 Cal. 106, 277 P. 118; Davis v. Chipman, 210 Cal. 609, 293 P. 40; Isenberg v. Sherman, 212 Cal. 454, 298 P. 1004; White v. Kretz (Cal. App.) 10 P.(2d) 198; Sminia v. Department of Water and Power (Cal. App.) 6 P.(2d) 561; Clough v. Allen, 115 Cal. App. 330, 1 P.(2d) 545; First Nat. Bank of Findlay v. Terry, 103 Cal. App. 501, 285 P. 336.

It is ordered that the judgment be and it is affirmed. Furthermore, that the application to take additional evidence herein be and it is denied.

Barry J. Colding, Theodore Hale, and Carroll B. Crawford, all of San Francisco, for petitioners.

A. I. Townsend, of San Francisco, for respondents.

STURTEVANT, J.

The petitioners have applied for a writ of review to annul an award made by the respondent Commission. The record is very long; however, the facts pertinent to this application are very brief.

On December 23, 1924, while employed by Larsen & Larsen, the respondent Joseph Wellde was injured. At that time the New Amsterdam Casualty Company was the insurance carrier for the employers. Thereafter, on July 27, 1927, the respondent Commission made an award in favor of the employee and on January 31, 1929, it amended its award. By the terms of the last award the liability of the insurance carrier was made as follows: "Award is made in favor of Joseph Wellde, applicant, against New Amsterdam Casualty Company of the sum of $3,974.10, payable at the rate of $20.38 a week, beginning January 31, 1925, and continuing for one hundred ninety-five weeks, until all of said award shall have been paid, less $100 payable to Alex Sheriffs, and less the further sum of $100 heretofore paid to applicant's former attorney, Joseph A. Brown, and it is ordered that the employers herein be dismissed and discharged from liability herein." No attack thereon was made, no application for a rehearing was made, and no further step was taken before the respondent Commission, and the respondent Commission did nothing else until the 3d day of September, 1929. On that date without any motion being made, without notice to the insurance carrier or to any one else, but of its own motion, the respondent Commission entered an award as follows: "Award is made in favor of Joseph Wellde, applicant, against New Amsterdam Casualty Company, defendant, of the sum of $20.38 weekly beginning January 1, 1925, and until two hundred forty weekly payments shall have been paid in the total sum of $4,891.20 and the further sum of $12.54 weekly, thereafter, for the remainder of his natural life." At this point it should be noted that the last-named award was made on the last day of the week, which was the two hundred forty-fifth week after the date of the injury. Claiming that the award last referred to was void, the insurance carrier at once applied for a rehearing; the rehearing was at once granted and thereafter the award was, by the respondent Commission, affirmed. Thereafter the insurance carrier applied to this court for a writ of review and for a judgment to the effect that the amended award dated September 3, 1929, be annulled.

In support of its petition the insurance carrier asserts that the amended award was void for two reasons: (1) No notice of an intention to make an amended award was given to the insurance carrier and therefore the amended award was void; (2) the statutory term of two hundred forty-five weeks having expired, the respondent Commission had no jurisdiction to entertain the petition for a rehearing on, or to enter any order either affirming or overruling the award made September 3, 1929. The two attacks will be considered together. The petitioners quote section 20, subdivision (d) of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act (St. 1917, p. 850) and italicize as follows:

"Sec. 20. * * * (d) The commission shall have continuing jurisdiction over all its orders, decisions and awards made and entered under the provisions of sections six to thirty-one, inclusive, of this act and may at any time, upon notice, and after opportunity to be heard is given to the parties in interest, rescind, alter or amend any such order, decision or award made by it upon good cause appearing therefor, such power including the right to review, grant or regrant, diminish, increase or terminate, within the limits prescribed by this act, any compensation awarded, upon the grounds that the disability of the person in whose favor such award was made has either recurred, increased, diminished or terminated; provided, that no award of compensation shall be rescinded, altered or amended after two hundred forty-five weeks from the date of the injury. Any order, decision or award rescinding, altering or amending a prior order, decision or award shall have the same effect as is herein provided for original orders, decisions or awards." Continuing, the petitioners cite Utah Fuel Co. v. Industrial Commission of Utah, 67 Utah, 25, 245 P. 381, 45 A. L. R. 882. The case is not absolutely in point. The statute of Utah is not an exact copy of our statute. Nevertheless, we think the case is very persuasive. In that case Thomas Pelly, Sr., and Thomas Pelly, Jr., were killed while employed by the Utah Fuel Company. The surviving wife of Thomas Pelly, Sr., in behalf of herself and children, at once applied for an award. The application was granted and an award was made in terms as applied for. That award was based on the theory of dependency on Thomas Pelly, Sr. Later Catherine Pelly and her children applied for additional compensation on the theory that they were dependents of Thomas Pelly, Jr. Thereafter the second application was granted. On the hearing on the last application, the commission, of its own motion and without notice to the employer, modified the finding made on the first application. When before the Supreme Court of Utah, the plaintiff contended that the commission exceeded its jurisdiction in modifying the first award without giving notice to the plaintiff and without giving the plaintiff an opportunity to be heard. On page 387 of 245 P., 67 Utah, 25, 45 A. L. R. 882, the court said: "The finding in this case was modified pursuant to the provisions of that section. There is no doubt respecting the continuing jurisdiction of the commission. In making modifications of orders or findings, therefore, the commission does not necessarily act without or in excess of its jurisdiction. It may, nevertheless, act in excess of its powers where, as here, it makes a change in a finding or order, which materially affects the rights of an interested party, without notice to such party, and without an opportunity to be heard. Any material change that is made in a finding of fact, or in an order touching an award, must necessarily depend upon some existing fact or facts. While it is true that the commission may possess what it deems to be ample or even conclusive evidence of such a fact or facts, yet it does not follow that the party interested must agree with the commission's conclusions, or that he may not contest or dispute the facts as claimed by it. Moreover, where the modification or change affects a substantial right of the aggrieved party, it should be given the benefit of a hearing and a right to review the decision of the commission in making the modification or change. We are of the opinion, therefore, that in making the modification in this case without notice to the plaintiff, and without giving it an opportunity to be heard, the commission exceeded its powers."

[1-5] Replying to the petitioners' attacks, the respondent Commission says: "When the commission granted the petition for rehearing in the case at bar, the lack of notice and opportunity to be heard, to which the parties were entitled under section 20 (d) was cured." That remark is not sound. The order of September 3d was void. A void order cannot confer jurisdiction. But on that date the term of two hundred forty-five weeks ended and all power to amend ceased. It necessarily follows that the subsequent order, March 3, 1932, affirming the void order was itself void. The respondent Commission next asserts: "There is a disposition to contend that the commission may rescind, alter or amend a previous decision only within two hundred forty-five weeks after date of injury. With this contention the commission agrees except where the right to petition for a rehearing from any order made within the two hundred forty-five week period itself lies beyond the two hundred forty-five week period. The case at bar is a concrete example. The final order of September 3, 1929, was made the last day of the two hundred forty-fifth week. Under such circumstances it is submitted that if any aggrieved party petitions for rehearing within twenty days thereafter, the right to rescind, alter or amend is extended for a period of time not exceeding eighty days, twenty days allowed to the parties to file petition for rehearing, thirty days after filing of said petition allowed the commission to consider same, and thirty additional if the time of consideration is extended." The respondent Commission cites no authority supporting any part of the foregoing argument. We know of none. If on the last day of the week of the two hundred forty-five week period an application for an amended award had been made, on notice duly given, and had thereupon been heard and submitted, and if the Commission ruled thereon some day subsequent to the two hundred forty-five week period, the question would be altogether different. Osmont v. All Persons, 165 Cal. 587, 133 P. 480. Again the respondent Commission asserts: "But it is earnestly contended that the failure to give notice and opportunity to be heard on the peculiar facts of this case should not be held to be fatal where the machinery is available to expeditiously and immediately remedy such lack of notice. * * * Unless the court does take this view of the present situation, which we believe is an entirely legal and valid solution of the situation, the result will be a denial of the benefits of the act to a workman who has clearly been totally and permanently disabled as the result of injury." The argument is far from satisfactory. If the award made January 31, 1929, had been void, the respondent Commission could, on its own motion, have set it aside. People v. Davis, 143 Cal. 673, 675, 77 P. 651. As that award was valid it could be set aside and a new one entered only in the manner provided by the statute. Section 20, subd. (d); 34 C. J. 220 and 258. As no notice was given and no hearing was had the order of September 3, 1929, was void. Scamman v. Bonslett, 118 Cal. 93, 99, 50 P. 272, 62 Am. St. Rep. 226; McConville v. Superior Court, 78 Cal. App. 203, 208, 248 P. 553. As that award was void the subsequent proceedings predicated thereon were also void. Woodruff v. Matheney, 55 Ill. App. 350; Kelley, Maus & Co. v. Heath & Milligan Mfg. Co., 66 Ill. App. 528. Moreover, if the award made January 31, 1929, was wrong, that error on the part of the Commission cannot be cured, and should not be cured, by another wrong decision on its part approved by a wrong decision on the part of this court. The reasoning that would support such an amended award in favor of the claimant will support an amended award terminating every award in favor of every claimant who is now receiving payments under the statute. It will suffice to remark that the time for the respondent Commission to modify an award is by the statute limited to 245 weeks, and furthermore, that before an award may be made notice must be given and an opportunity for a hearing must be had. Sec. 20, subd. (d), Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act. The terms of that statute are clearly based on the provisions of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The latter statute limits the powers not only of courts of law but of courts of equity. Those courts may not amend their judgments in matters of substance except on motion made after notice given and hearing had. 14 Cal. Jur. 1007; Scamman v. Bonslett, supra; Herd v. Tuohy, 133 Cal. 55, 58, 59, 65 P. 139; Lauchere v. Lambert, 210 Cal. 274, 278, 291 P. 412. If greater power was given to the respondent Commission than has been given to our courts, we would expect to find it expressed in clear terms in the statute. It is not so expressed or expressed at all.

The award is annulled.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Leon R. Yankwich, Judge.

Action by Isabel M. Troendle against Mostyn C. H. Clinch and others. Judgment for plaintiff, except as against defendant Frank Weadon, and defendants, except defendant Weadon, appeal.

TAPPAAN, Justice pro tem.

Plaintiff and respondent here recovered a judgment as against defendants and appellants Clinch & Thurtle, real estate brokers and copartners, and one Donnell, the mother-in-law of defendant Clinch. No judgment was had as against defendant Weadon.

The evidence as presented upon this appeal discloses the following facts: Plaintiff for some years prior to the transactions here involved was the owner of a certain house and lot in the city of Los Angeles and had attempted to sell or trade the same. She had at different times listed this property with various real estate agents for sale. Plaintiff was directed to defendants Clinch and Thurtle by a real estate firm with whom she had had some business transaction, some time between the 1st and 10th of April, 1927. On April 12, 1927, defendant Clinch first learned that a fifty-year lease of certain property situated upon Western avenue in the city of Los Angeles could be secured for the sum of $6,500, though Clinch did not succeed in contacting the owner of this lease until April 19, 1927. On April 12, 1927, the day he first learned that the Western avenue lease could be purchased, defendant Clinch called plaintiff to his office and informed her that a very rich man, who had been recently married, wished to purchase a nice home; that this man specialized in leases and wished to trade for a home a lease he had upon Western avenue; that this lease could be exchanged for her property. Plaintiff told defendant Clinch at this time, and at subsequent interviews, that she would have to rely upon him to advise her in the matter of the exchange. On April 14th defendant Clinch brought defendants Weadon and Donnell to plaintiff's home and introduced them to her as Mr. and Mrs. Weadon, and showed them the house and told plaintiff that Weadon was the owner of the Western avenue lease he had told her about. The next day Clinch told plaintiff he was mistaken about Weadon being married, but that he was engaged to Mrs. Donnell. On April 22d Clinch secured a listing of the Western avenue lease from the owner at the stated price of $6,500. On the same day, April 22d, Clinch told plaintiff that Weadon was willing to make the exchange. On April 23d at Clinch's direction plaintiff made from other persons inquiries as to the value of the lease, but was informed by them that they knew nothing as to its value and that she would have to rely upon her agent, Clinch, as to the exchange. Of this fact she informed Clinch. In the afternoon of the same day, at defendants Clinch and Thurtle's office, there being present defendant Clinch, plaintiff, and another agent who took no important part in the transaction, the exchange agreement was signed by plaintiff. Clinch read parts of the agreement to plaintiff, but it would appear, plaintiff never read, nor was the whole agreement read to her at this time. The agreement was the usual form of exchange agreement and called for the exchange of plaintiff's property for the lease. Defendant Clinch never informed plaintiff of the true value of the lease or who was the true owner, and at all times represented to her that it was of the value of $35,000, which was the valuation plaintiff placed upon her property. Clinch told plaintiff that Weadon was the owner of the lease. It is true that defendant Clinch in his testimony denied many of the statements made by plaintiff as to the transaction, though the testimony of the other witnesses who testified at the trial did not, as to the material parts of her testimony, tend to contradict her testimony. At the time of the signing of the exchange agreement plaintiff and the other agent present at the time testified that Clinch borrowed from plaintiff the sum of $2,850 and agreed to return to her $3,000 at the close of the escrow. Defendant Clinch testified that this sum was merely deposited as a proof of good faith on the part of plaintiff and that the sum of $150 returned to her in the escrow in addition to the $2,850 was in fact a reduction of his commission.

Weadon's name appears in the escrow, but it was signed by defendant Clinch in all instances. Clinch also signed Weadon's name in the acceptance of the exchange agreement. Weadon testified that he had no personal knowledge as to these matters. The evidence shows that defendant Clinch secured a loan from a bank of the sum of $5,500, which, taken with the funds secured from plaintiff, enabled him to purchase the lease of the Western avenue property from the owner and close this part of the escrow. This loan from the bank was secured by an order as against funds to be obtained from a mortgage to be secured upon plaintiff's property. In the escrow the title to plaintiff's property was directed to be taken in the name of defendant Donnell, defendant Clinch explaining to plaintiff that Weadon was making a wedding gift to Mrs. Donnell. Before the close of the escrow a loan of $12,500 was secured upon plaintiff's property. Plaintiff noticed that the assignment of the lease was from one Yanow and not Weadon. This Clinch explained was due to the fact that Weadon did not have his papers straight and that he (Clinch) had had them fixed to protect plaintiff. From the escrow, plaintiff in addition to the assignment of the lease, received $3,000 and the firm of Clinch and Thurtle the sum of $8,863.03; that latter amount being the sum remaining after deducting commissions paid to another agent and escrow and title charges. Out of the sum paid to Clinch and Thurtle was repaid the loan of $5,500 made by the bank.

On July 11, 1927, defendant Donnell sold the property she had acquired from plaintiff through the escrow for the sum of $20,000. In fixing the sum to which it found plaintiff was entitled the trial court, it would appear, deducted from the $20,000 which was obtained for the property secured from plaintiff, the sum of $6,500 paid for the lease of the Western avenue property and $875 paid in commissions to another agent, and in escrow and other charges and gave judgment for the difference, $12,625. From this judgment defendants against whom it was awarded appeal. At the trial appellants introduced testimony to the effect that some five years before the transaction here involved occurred, defendant Donnell placed in the care of defendant Clinch, her son-in-law, a sum of about $2,000 and that sum at the time of the escrow mentioned here, together with accumulations amounted to some $2,700; that this said sum was used in the acquiring of the Western avenue lease; that Mrs. Donnell and Weadon were engaged to be married, but that at some time during the transaction in which plaintiff became involved they changed their intention as to acquiring a home; that Mrs. Donnell acted in good faith throughout the transaction, and from the funds secured through the escrow at a later date purchased property of a value in excess of $10,000. The evidence as to this phase of the case as contained in the bill of exceptions is not of a very convincing nature when read as a whole, and in some instances it would appear that the testimony given by the witnesses at the time of trial differed materially from that given upon deposition prior to trial. It would seem somewhat extraordinary that a sum of $2,000 under the control of defendant Clinch required some five years to increase to $2,700, while in a few months, at most, and under the same control, and just at the time plaintiff came in contact with all of the parties, this $2,700 became something over $10,000.

[1, 2] Appellants' first contention is that there is no evidence to support the finding made by the trial court that defendants Clinch and Thurtle acted as agents for plaintiff at the time the leasehold was acquired and that their agency must be deemed to have been created as of April 23d, the day the exchange agreement was signed by plaintiff. This contention on the part of appellants is without merit. The evidence at best but shows a conflict and to any unbiased reader must clearly show a well-conceived plan on the part of defendants Clinch and Thurtle from the time of their first contact with plaintiff in reference to the lease, to represent her as her agents, in this transaction. The signing of the exchange agreement was the culmination of this representation of her by these defendants rather than the initiation of this agency relationship. As in all cases of this character, the evidence is of a more or less circumstantial nature, but it cannot be said that there is no evidence to support the findings nor that it is not of a substantial nature. "Insufficiency of the evidence, before it will justify a court of appeal in refusing to accept and follow a finding of fact, must amount to a complete absence of any substantial evidence in support of the finding. A common statement of the rule on appeal is that if the evidence is conflicting, the finding will not be disturbed." City of San Diego v. Cuyamaca Water Co., 209 Cal. 152, 167, 287 P. 496.

[3, 4] Under the circumstances present in the instant case a written authorization was not necessary to establish the agency relationship. "Wherever an agent, imperfectly authorized in the first place, performs acts in execution of the agency which are ratified by the principal, the principal is entitled to enforce his demands against the agent for anything for which the agent has received on his account." McBride v. McCartney, 53 Cal. App. 707, 709, 200 P. 756, 757. That there was a duty upon the agents Clinch and Thurtle to disclose the true value of the leasehold to their principal, the plaintiff here, and that their concealment of this material fact amounted to a fraud, are facts so well established in our law as to render it unnecessary to support them by an extended citation of authorities. McPhetridge v. Smith, 101 Cal. App. 122, 139, 140, 281 P. 419.

[5] Appellants next attack certain findings made by the trial court that defendants Clinch and Thurtle in effect made to plaintiff false representations of fact and that they concealed from her material matters, on the ground that there is no evidence to support such findings. With this contention we cannot agree. There is ample and substantial evidence to support these findings. "There is contained in the record here competent and persuasive evidence in support of the findings and judgment. As might be anticipated in a case of this character, the testimony is in conflict as to whether defendants made the representations charged against them, but there is nevertheless sufficient evidence of a tangible character to uphold the conclusions of the trial court, to meet the requirements as to the degree of proof required to support findings of fraud, and to establish the misrepresentations found by the court to have actually been made. Discussion with respect to certain immaterial findings is unnecessary." (Italics ours.) Neff v. Engler, 205 Cal. 484, 490, 271 P. 744, 747. What has already been said herein as to certain findings attacked by appellants applies with equal force to the attack made upon the findings that defendants Clinch and Thurtle, while representing themselves as her agents to plaintiff, were in fact acting as principals, and that defendant Donnell was in fact a "dummy" employed by her codefendants in the transaction. An examination of the other specifications of error made by appellants fails to disclose anything that would justify this court in reversing the judgment made and entered herein.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

HOUSER, J.

From a judgment of conviction of the crime of contributing to the delinquency of a minor, and from an order by which her motion for a new trial was denied, defendant appeals to this court.

Although appellant's brief on appeal contains several different specifications of error, upon each of which she relies for a reversal of the judgment, it is deemed necessary that but one of such assignments of error should occupy the attention of this court. It relates to the admissibility on the trial of the action of the alleged confession of defendant.

[1] With reference only to the question submitted to the trial court which related to the admissibility of such confession, it appears that on the part of defendant many facts were admitted in evidence which tended to show that the alleged confession of defendant was not made either freely or voluntarily, or without hope of immunity being extended to defendant, either by the district attorney or by the trial court. But as to such facts as were contradicted by evidence submitted by the people, in the decision herein none of them should be, nor is, taken into consideration by this court. However, the record herein discloses the following undisputed facts: At the home of defendant, in the nighttime, or "late in the evening," on February 25, 1931, without a warrant of arrest, but by means of showing their "credentials," which consisted of a "badge" worn by each of two so-called "investigators" from the office of the district attorney, against the wishes of defendant and over her objection thereto, she was "taken into custody" but "not arrested." From her home she was taken by the "investigators" to the office of the district attorney, where she was questioned. Without any criminal charge being first filed or made by any person against defendant, she was then taken to a room in a hotel where she was kept "in custody" from February 25 to March 2, under constant guard by two women "investigators" from the office of the district attorney, during which time, not only by her guards but as well by other "investigators" connected with the office of the district attorney, she was questioned "at intervals," or "from time to time," not only relative to the offense of which she was subsequently charged and convicted, but also in connection with her knowledge of facts which were presumed to be material to the prosecution of another person on a charge which was similar to the charge which a considerable time later was made against defendant. On one occasion during her confinement in the hotel, accompanied by a guard, defendant was permitted to keep an appointment with the individual to whom reference has just been had, for the purpose of obtaining evidence intended to be used on the trial of a criminal action against that individual. On another occasion, under similar restraint, she was permitted to go to her home for the purpose of obtaining for her use some personal wearing apparel. One of the "investigators" testified that "she (defendant) cried on one or two occasions a little bit."

Relative to the question of whether the confession by defendant was made freely and voluntarily, a part of the testimony given by defendant, which in no way was contradicted by any witness, included the following: "* * * I couldn't even, without permission, I couldn't go any place that I wanted to. I had my car in Long Beach, and I was forbidden to go for my car. * * * I was never alone; I was always with Miss Fairchild or Miss Six. * * * They finally let me 'phone the place where I worked, so I could tell them why I wasn't showing up to work. * * * She (one of the guards) said the district attorney's office was paying them (the hotel bills); and they would take care of me for six months, if necessary, until they got through with me as a witness; that she had had the Pringle girl there, and that it was their general place to keep witnesses. * * * Well, of course, I was scared to death. I had been there by that time, for days, and they had been after me all the time—when one of them wasn't, the other one was. One was always with me, and trying to tell me what I should do; and if I didn't do it, what was going to happen to me; and I was just scared to death. * * * Mr. White (an investigator) and I talked for a while about different things, and then he said, 'Well Kiddy, it is time we were getting down to brass tacks; we can't keep you any longer. If you don't make a statement, I have got to turn you over to the authorities. You have been in here for days, and you are either going to make this statement, or you are not.' He said, 'Of course, you know when the time comes I am going to have to say that I didn't promise you any immunity, but you can read between the lines * * *.' * * * I was scared to death; I thought they had me in their power, and all they had to do was to say the word and I would go to the federal penitentiary. I thought that, anyway. They said they had. * * * I think the ten days I spent in the district attorney's custody was the horror of my life. * * * I wanted to see one (a lawyer) the very first day I was there, but they told me not to see one; that I was going to be a witness, and that I should not see an attorney. And later on a lawyer came up and spoke to me in the court room, and Miss Fairchild (one of the guards) said (to him), 'You don't need to talk to Mrs. Day; she don't need an attorney.'"

It also appears from uncontradicted testimony given by defendant that besides the two guards, on one evening after defendant was taken to the hotel, for a considerable length of time four other persons were in the room where defendant was kept in custody, one of whom was also an "investigator" and two of the others were persons who likewise were either under arrest or who theretofore had been charged with a criminal offense in some manner connected with the particular offense of which defendant later was convicted. The defendant also testified that at no time before she made her statement or confession was she informed that any statement made by her would be used against her; that she was "very nervous and upset, and particularly worried about this federal thing"; that she was practically "beside herself" in making the statement.

In the cases of People v. Loper, 159 Cal. 6, 112 P. 720, 37 L. R. A. (N. S.) 934, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 1193; People v. Borello, 161 Cal. 367, 119 P. 500, 137 L. R. A. (N. S.) 434; People v. Clark, 55 Cal. App. 42, 203 P. 781; People v. Quan Gim Gow, 23 Cal. App. 507, 138 P. 918; and Bram v. United States, 168 U. S. 532, 18 S. Ct. 183, 42 L. Ed. 568, 578, many former adjudicated cases are reviewed, and the law is restated which relates generally to the admissibility of confessions of a defendant in a criminal action, and particularly with reference to situations which are analogous to that portrayed by the facts hereinbefore set forth. In principle, the authorities are in complete harmony one with the other that, in circumstances describing a situation even less powerful in its probable effect upon the free will of a defendant than appears prevailed in the instant case, the confession of guilt by a defendant should never be admitted in evidence. The research of industrious counsel for the people has failed to disclose any authority which would indicate that a rule to the contrary has ever obtained within either the jurisdiction of this state or of any other state in the Union. The case of People v. Dye (Cal. App.) 6 P. (2d) 313, contains the latest expression of opinion on the subject either by the Supreme Court or the Court of Appeal of this state. Therein may be found a fairly complete résumé of legal principles, accompanied by judicial precedent, which pertain to a proper discussion of such questions as may be here involved; and it is deemed unnecessary to herein restate such principles. It is enough to assert that by all authority a confession of a defendant obtained as was shown even by the uncontradicted and undisputed evidence hereinbefore set forth is inadmissible in evidence.

[2] Concerning the probable effect which the confession of guilt of defendant had upon the verdict of the jury, it is to be noted that on the part of the prosecution, aside from the testimony of the complaining witness, who was of the age of seventeen years, and whose alleged delinquency formed the foundation of the complaint against defendant, no supporting evidence of any kind or character, other than the confession of defendant, was adduced on the trial of the action. Also that the testimony of the complaining witness was not there given by such witness personally, but on an assumedly proper showing by the prosecution to the effect that, after diligent search had been made for such witness, she could not be found, nor produced at the trial, her testimony given at the preliminary examination of defendant was read in evidence. It also appeared that, like the defendant herein, preceding the giving of her testimony, the prosecuting witness had not been "arrested," but that she had been "in custody" of "investigators of the office of the district attorney," in a room in a hotel, for a period of five months, during all of which time she had paid neither board nor hotel bills, nor had she ever been requested so to do; to the contrary, that all such bills were paid by the "investigators" who had the prosecuting witness in custody. Furthermore, that during the period of her detention her custodians took her to the theater and to the movies "once in a while"; took her out riding in automobiles; and occasionally took her to the office of the district attorney.

Considering the recognized possibility of inaccuracy or falsehood in testimony relating to offenses of the character of that of which defendant was charged, in connection with the facts hereinbefore set forth which immediately preceded the date when the prosecuting witness gave her testimony, with the consequent inherent doubt regarding the truth of such testimony, it cannot be said that the confession of guilt by defendant of her criminal participation in the alleged delinquency of the prosecuting witness did not influence the jury in the rendition of its verdict; and, since it appears that on the trial of the action, by permitting the jury to consider in evidence the confession of defendant, she was prejudiced in her substantial rights in the premises, it follows that the judgment and the order by which her motion for a new trial was denied should be reversed. It is so ordered.

In action to recover value of land improperly registered under Torrens Act, demurrer asserting nonjoinder of parties defendant held sufficient to raise question of nonjoinder (St. 1915, p. 1932; p. 1949, § 105, subd. 2).

In points and authorities filed in support of demurrer, it was stated that, according to allegations of complaint, detriment suffered by plaintiffs had been caused by fraud and that person guilty thereof was necessary party defendant, and it was contended that demurrer was insufficient because it did not name such person. It appeared, however, that complaint named this person, charged him with fraud, and alleged that as direct result of his fraud, superior court had been led to order registration of land involved, which made it possible for plaintiffs to be defrauded.

2. Fraud ⇐6.

*Rehearing denied 14 P.(2d) 1017.

It appeared that landowner, by virtue of false showing of service of summons on holder of trust deed in question, obtained cancellation thereof and registration of land under Torrens Land Transfer Act (St. 1915, p. 1932); that he thereafter sold land to a purchaser, to whom registrar's certificate of title was issued; that such purchaser later sold land to subpurchasers; and that validity of trust deed was subsequently established in suit to which subpurchasers were made parties defendant.

HARDEN, Justice pro tem.

This action was brought by plaintiffs Thomas Edwin Gill and Myla Ritzinger Gill to recover from the Torrens title assurance fund in the custody of the state treasurer the value of certain land in Imperial county described in the complaint and registered pursuant to the act commonly known as the Torrens Land Transfer Act (St. 1915, p. 1932), under the claim that plaintiffs purchased said land in reliance upon a certificate of title issued by the registrar of titles of Imperial county.

On January 1, 1916, Friend J. Austin and Lettie M. Austin, his wife, were the owners of the land in question. On that day they executed and subsequently delivered to the Delta Land & Water Company, a Nevada corporation, a trust deed thereon to secure payment of $55,000 which they owed that company at that time. The trust deed was recorded in the office of the county recorder of Imperial county on March 30, 1916. On October 2, 1917, said Friend J. Austin and his wife filed in the superior court of Imperial county their petition setting forth that said trust deed had been fraudulently obtained by said Delta Land & Water Company, and praying the court to enter its decree to that effect and to order the registrar of titles of Imperial county to register the said land under said Torrens Land Transfer Act. The default of the said Delta Land & Water Company was entered therein on December 5, 1917. On December 7, 1917, said court entered its judgment canceling said trust deed and ordering the registration of said land under said act. The registrar's certificate of title was issued on December 13, 1917, to Austin and wife in accordance with said order. Said default and judgment thereon were the result of fraud practiced by Austin in that he made a false showing of service of summons upon said Delta Land & Water Company. Said company was not served with process in said action. Transfer of the land was made by Austin and wife to Jasper Thomason; and on December 14, 1917, the registrar's certificate of title was issued to Thomason.

On February 8, 1918, the plaintiffs and Thomason entered into a contract which resulted in the sale of said property to plaintiffs. On February 13, 1918, the registrar's certificate of title on the land in question was issued to plaintiffs, showing them to be the owners thereof.

Suit was instituted by the Frances Investment Company, as assignee of the Delta Land & Water Company, in the United States District Court on February 15, 1918, to establish the validity of said trust deed for $55,000. Plaintiffs herein were made parties defendant in said action. Judgment was rendered therein sustaining the validity of said trust deed, which judgment was affirmed on appeal.

On August 10, 1928, plaintiffs brought this action pursuant to the provisions of said Torrens Land Transfer Act, upon the theory that they had been damaged through the operation of the provisions of said act. Judgment was entered herein in favor of plaintiffs and against defendant for the sum of $31,400, payable out of said Torrens title assurance fund. The defendant has appealed from said judgment.

Subdivision 2 of section 105 of said act (Stats. 1915, pp. 1932, 1949) provides: "Any person who, without fraud or negligence on his part, is deprived of any interest or estate in land through the operation of any provision of this act or by reason of the fraud, forgery, negligence, omission, mistake or misfeasance of any person, and who is precluded from recovering such interest or estate, may commence an action in the superior court of the county in which the land or a part thereof is situated, to recover not over the fair market value of the interest or estate of which he has been so deprived. * * * If such deprivation has been caused either wholly or in part by any person or persons other than such registrar or deputy registrar, while acting in the official performance of duty as such, such person or persons shall be joined as defendants with said state treasurer. In any such action said court shall have jurisdiction, * * * to determine the reason of such deprivation and to render judgment therein accordingly, either against said state treasurer alone or against him and all or any of the other defendants. In any action where there are defendants other than said state treasurer against whom judgment has been rendered, execution shall first issue against such other defendants and upon the return of such execution unsatisfied, either in whole or in part and upon it appearing to the satisfaction of the court that said execution cannot be satisfied out of the property belonging to such judgment creditors [debtors] other than said state treasurer, * * * said court shall make its order directing the payment of the amount due out of the assurance fund. * * *"

[1] One ground of demurrer to the complaint was that there was a defect and nonjoinder of parties defendant. In points and authorities filed in support thereof it was pointed out that, according to the allegations of the complaint, the detriment suffered by plaintiffs had been caused by fraud and that the person guilty thereof was a necessary party defendant. The demurrer was overruled. Respondents contend that the demurrer was insufficient to raise the question of a defect of parties defendant for the reason that it did not name Austin. The complaint names him and charges him with fraud, in that he filed a false showing of service of summons upon the Delta Land & Water Company, and alleges that as a direct result thereof the superior court of Imperial county was led to enter the judgment canceling the trust deed and ordering the registration of the land. The demurrer refers to him as the person guilty of the fraud. The demurrer was sufficient to raise the question of a defect of parties defendant.

[2] It is contended further by plaintiffs that Austin was not a necessary party for the reason that plaintiffs entered into no contract with him; that plaintiffs' only dealings were directly with Thomason. It is not essential to the maintenance of an action for deceit that there should have been a contractual relation between the plaintiff and the defendant. 27 Cor. Jur. 16, citing cases. Pasley v. Freeman, 3 T. R. 51, 100 Reprint, 450, is a leading case upon the subject. Plaintiffs' present position obliges them to defend Austin and is inconsistent with the allegations of the complaint.

[3-6] The question of whether Austin was a necessary party defendant depends upon whether the plaintiffs had a cause of action against him. Where the question of who are necessary parties defendant is raised by demurrer, it is to be determined ordinarily by reference to the allegations of the complaint. However, where, as here, after the filing of a demurrer to the complaint on the ground of a defect of parties defendant appearing on the face of the complaint, the case has proceeded to trial and judgment, we may properly consider not only the allegations of the complaint but also the evidence to ascertain whether, by reason of any defect in parties defendant, the judgment is against law. In this case the evidence follows the allegations of the complaint in respect to the fraud of Austin; but it goes farther and establishes that Austin's fraud was the basis for all the grounds of complaint which plaintiffs possess.

It is provided by section 1711, Civil Code, as follows: "One who practices a deceit with intent to defraud the public, or a particular class of persons, is deemed to have intended to defraud every individual in that class, who is actually misled by the deceit."

[7] Certainly Austin owed to the public the duty to refrain from crime and fraud. If Thomason and Austin acted in concert with the intention of defrauding plaintiffs, Austin would be answerable to plaintiffs for damage proximately resulting therefrom; and if Austin's intention was to defraud Thomason or the public generally, he would be answerable to any member of the public who was actually defrauded as a proximate result of his wrongdoing. It is presumed that an unlawful act was done with an unlawful intent; and that a person intends the ordinary consequences of his own voluntary acts. Section 1963, subds. 2, 3, Code Civ. Proc. We think plaintiffs' damage was a natural and probable consequence of the wrong.

[8] Considering the proximate cause of an event to be "the efficient cause, the one that necessarily sets the other causes in operation" (Ætna Ins. Co. v. Boon, 95 U. S. 117, 130, 24 L. Ed. 395), or "that which, in a natural and continuous sequence, unbroken by any new, independent cause, produces that event, and without which that event would not have occurred" (Baillargeon v. Myers, 180 Cal. 504, 182 P. 37, Williams v. San Francisco, etc., Ry. Co., 6 Cal. App. 715, 93 P. 122, 127), we have no hesitancy in holding that the fraud on the part of Austin complained of in the complaint is shown to have been the efficient cause of the damage suffered. The allegations of the complaint and the evidence establish that it continued in an unbroken sequence to produce the event, and without which that event would not have occurred. The action of the court in entering the default judgment, in canceling the trust deed, and in ordering the registration of the land under the provisions of the Torrens Land Transfer Act, and the official acts of the registrar of titles in issuing certificates of title, first to Thomason and then to plaintiffs, were the results of Austin's initial fraud. Such acts were not new, independent causes which intervened to break the effect of the original wrong; they were harmonious consequences thereof. The false showing of service of summons and the records entered pursuant thereto constituted a continuous assertion by Austin to the public and to plaintiffs of that which was not true.

Without pursuing the question further, we hold that, according to the allegations of the complaint and the whole record, Austin owed the public and plaintiffs, as members thereof, the duty to refrain from fraud in respect to matters mentioned herein; that said duty was violated; that as a proximate result thereof plaintiffs were damaged; and that plaintiffs had a cause of action against Austin therefor. He was a necessary party defendant.

In some instances the failure to join a person as a party defendant in a suit would cause no prejudice to other defendants. Such is not the case here, where resort must be had to Austin for payment of any judgment to which plaintiffs are entitled before the assurance fund is properly chargeable with payment thereof. The record shows the judgment to be against law, for the reasons stated. The error in overruling the demurrer requires a reversal of the judgment.

The other points raised by appellant do not appear to us to be sustained. Owing to the decision reached, it is not necessary to consider them here in detail.

The judgment is reversed.

3. Criminal law ⇐655(5).

> Statements of trial judge to effect that defendant's counsel would not be allowed to read certain statements from cited cases to jury and that his continued reference to such cases after the court had ruled against him was contemptuous, and that, if counsel stated one more word not addressed to jury on the facts, court would adjudge him guilty of contempt, were not prejudicial, especially in view of instruction to effect that no prejudice should be held against defendant or against his counsel because of incident.

4. Criminal law ⇐799.

WORKS, P. J.

Defendant was convicted of robbery. He appeals from the judgment and from an order of the trial court denying his motion for a new trial.

The case, on the evidence, was one merely of conflict, the quarrel being between evidence tending to show an identification of appellant as a participant in the crime charged, several having been concerned in it, and evidence tending to prove an alibi.

While counsel for appellant at the trial—not the one now before us—was engaged in presenting his argument to the jury, something occurred which impelled him to call for the court reporter; that functionary not being in attendance at the time. When the reporter appeared, the following record was made:

"Mr. Parsons: I refer to the case of People v. Molina, 126 Cal. 505, and I am reading from page 508, 59 P. 34, 35.

"The Court: No, you are not reading from it at all; you are referring to the case.

"Mr. Parsons: May I quote a paragraph of law?

"The Court: You may not; the court will attend to all of the law in this case.

"Mr. Parsons: I appreciate that, and I desire to refer to certain cases, People v. Preston and People v. Law, and other matters in which conversations have been had on evidence, and where it was later established that those people were innocent. I wish to go into those cases and describe them to the jury.

"The Court: You will not be allowed to do so, and your continued reference to those cases after the court has ruled is contemptuous. You should know that you should confine your argument to the jury in any case to the facts, and not refer to—

"Mr. Parsons: I have.

"The Court: Are you going to argue the facts in this case or are you trying to force the court—

"Mr. Parsons: Not at all; I am trying to eliminate—

"The Court: Mr. Parsons, if there is one more word from you that is not addressed to the jury on the facts I will adjudge you guilty of contempt of court."

[1, 2] The trial judge was justified in preventing the course which counsel was endeavoring to pursue. It is generally improper for counsel to read from law books in addressing a jury (People v. Godwin, 123 Cal. 374, 55 P. 1059), although some of the authorities admit the possibility of such a course in particular cases within the discretion of the trial judge. If the point here presented may be said to resolve itself merely into a matter of discretion, we are satisfied that the discretion was not abused.

[3] The judge spoke more forcibly and dictatorially in presenting his views to counsel than was necessary, but his language was drawn out, somewhat, by the attitude of counsel. On the whole, we doubt whether what the judge said damaged appellant.

If his language was harmful to appellant, we think the injury was undone by an instruction which he gave to the jury thus: "There is one thing I want to say to you all. During the course of Mr. Parsons' argument the court had occasion to make a ruling against him regarding an incident in which counsel in his zeal on behalf of his client was attempting to argue certain matters which had no relation to the facts in this case. I don't want any of you to have the slightest feeling of prejudice against the defendant or against Mr. Parsons because of that incident. Mr. Parsons is a lawyer of unquestioned integrity, and I know he had no slightest intention of doing anything improper. Lawyers often feel that they want to do their full duty, and they advance arguments which they probably themselves recognize as not proper legitimate argument in any case in which the jury should only be addressed as to the facts in that case; but I don't want any of you to think that the court has any lack of confidence in Mr. Parsons as a lawyer or an officer of this court, or that you should in any way regard that incident as even in a slight degree prejudicial to Mr. Parsons or the client he represents. I would not have any of you think that for the world."

[4] However, there are two passages in this instruction to which appellant takes exception and upon which he bases a second charge of misconduct upon the part of the judge. One of these passages is the one in which the judge said that counsel "was attempting to argue certain matters which had no relation to the facts in this case." The second passage reads: "Lawyers often feel that they want to do their full duty, and they advance arguments which they probably themselves recognize as not proper legitimate argument in any case in which the jury should only be addressed as to the facts in that case." We think the first passage was not unjust. The second was not harmful to appellant; its only vice being that it was an unjust and gratuitous arraignment of the entire bar.

YORK, J.

This is an appeal from a judgment of dismissal entered pursuant to motion of defendants for lack of prosecution.

The action was brought to recover damages for personal injuries sustained on September 6, 1927. Complaint was filed November 29, 1927, defendant demurred thereto, demurrer was overruled, and answer was filed January 28, 1929.

On February 18, 1929, plaintiffs, pursuant to rule 1 of said court, served and filed in the action a memorandum to the effect that motion would be made in department 34 of said court on the 4th day of March, 1929, to set said cause for trial on the ground that the case was at issue. Pursuant to rule 2 of said court, the cause was by the clerk of said court placed on the civil active list, and thereafter on the 1st day of April, 1929, in the absence of the parties thereto and their respective counsel, the said cause was, pursuant to rule 3 of said court, under the supervision of the presiding judge thereof, set for trial in department 43 of said court on the 13th day of May, 1929, at the hour of 9:30 a. m.

On the 13th day of May, 1929, the cause was called for trial in the department named, defendants appearing by counsel, and no one appearing on behalf of the plaintiffs or either of them, whereupon the said counsel for defendants moved the court that said action be dismissed for lack of prosecution, which said motion was granted and the action ordered dismissed.

Plaintiffs appeal from the judgment of dismissal on the ground that the court erred in granting defendants' motion without proof being first made that plaintiffs had received five days' notice of the time of trial, as required by section 594 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

Upon the authority of the case of Hurley v. Lake County, 113 Cal. App. 291, 298 P. 123, the judgment is reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; V. N. Thompson, Judge.

Divorce action by Margaret E. Gray against Alexander J. Gray, Jr., who filed a cross-complaint. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendant appeals.

Judgment affirmed, and appeal from the order denying a motion for a new trial dismissed.

A. T. Procopio, of San Diego, for appellant.

Neal E. Dow and Spalding & Myers, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

MARKS, J.

[1] Respondent instituted this action seeking a divorce and maintenance from appellant. He answered and filed a cross-complaint in which he sought a divorce. The complaint alleged willful neglect and failure to provide in one cause of action, and desertion in another. The trial court granted respondent an interlocutory decree of divorce on both grounds and awarded her $40 per month. Appellant is here attacking the decree as being unsupported by and contrary to the evidence, and has attempted to appeal from the order denying his motion for new trial, which is not an appealable order.

The parties were married July 2, 1921, and separated March 28, 1927. From about July, 1927, to about May, 1928, appellant gave respondent $125 per month for her support. When these payments were discontinued respondent had appellant arrested for failure to provide. He furnished a bond guaranteeing the payment of $50 per month for one year beginning July 3, 1928. Twelve payments were made, with the possible exception of one. The action for divorce was instituted within one year from the time the last fifty-dollar payment was made.

[2] Appellant complains of the judgment granting the divorce for failure to provide, contending his willful neglect and failure to provide had not continued for one full year before the institution of this action. We could not agree with this contention, even if appellant had made the payments of $50 per month voluntarily.

The evidence shows that for more than a year prior to the commencement of this action respondent lived in the city of Riverside, Cal. She was in poor health. This caused her to lose several days each month from her employment which resulted in a loss of wages and bills for medical attention. Her earnings were not sufficient to furnish her with the common necessaries of life and she was forced to borrow money from her friends and call upon their charity for food and shelter. During all of this time appellant had an income out of which he could have provided her sufficient money, which, with her earnings, would have supplied her the common necessaries of life. The portions of the findings and judgment under attack find support in the evidence.

[3] Appellant further contends that respondent deserted him and that therefore he was not responsible for her support and could not be guilty of failure to provide. Section 94 of the Civil Code defines "extreme cruelty" as "the wrongful infliction of grievous bodily injury, or grievous mental suffering, upon the other by one party to the marriage." Section 98 of the same Code provides in part: "Departure or absence of one party from the family dwelling-place, caused by cruelty * * * is desertion by the other party." Where a wife leaves the family home because of the wrongful infliction upon her by her husband of grievous mental suffering amounting to extreme cruelty, he is guilty of desertion. Brandt v. Brandt, 178 Cal. 548, 174 P. 55.

[4] The evidence discloses that appellant used intoxicating liquors to excess during practically all of the time from marriage to separation; that he drank so excessively in public that on occasion he became unconscious; that on many and frequent occasions he was not able to undress and go to bed; that respondent tried to prevail upon him to cease such excessive drinking; that his drinking to excess and drunkenness, especially in public, caused respondent great humiliation and grievous mental suffering amounting to extreme cruelty. Under these circumstances respondent was justified in leaving the family home, if she did leave it before her husband, which put upon appellant the burden of the desertion and made him responsible for such support as would furnish her with the common necessaries of life; he having the ability to provide them.

[5, 6] The trial court found that appellant left, deserted, and abandoned respondent.

The evidence is conflicting and from a reading of the record it might seem that its weight is contrary to the finding. However, there is competent and material testimony supporting it. The trial judge had the witnesses before him and it was his province to pass upon their credibility and the weight and sufficiency of the evidence. We cannot upset a finding or reverse a judgment because of a conflict in the evidence.

[7] Appellant complains of the findings and that portion of the interlocutory decree of divorce wherein he is found guilty of desertion principally because of what he maintains is a variance between the pleadings and the proof. We are satisfied that the divorce was properly granted on the ground of willful neglect and failure to provide. Therefore, the judgment will not be reversed because of error, if any, committed in connection with another and separate cause of action. It becomes unnecessary to discuss these other alleged errors here.

Judgment affirmed. The appeal from the order denying motion for new trial dismissed.

TAPPAAN, Justice pro tem.

Plaintiff Boulevard Land Company instituted an action to recover certain payments alleged to be due it under the terms of a contract for the sale of real property. The contract provided for payment in monthly installments. During the trial, a supplemental complaint was filed which prayed for judgment for the entire balance remaining unpaid of the purchase price stipulated in this contract. Defendant King filed an answer to the complaint and a cross-complaint alleging fraud on the part of plaintiff and praying judgment for damages for moneys paid and loss of profits. The cross-complaint also contained a second count alleging a cause of action for moneys had and received. The trial court found against plaintiff upon the complaint and for the defendant upon the cross-complaint. From the judgment entered upon the cross-complaint in defendant's favor, plaintiff appeals.

[1, 2] Appellant's first specification of error is: "The evidence is insufficient to sustain the findings of the court." The finding to which appellant addresses this attack and parts of which are quoted in its brief set forth in effect that appellant, as vendor of a parcel of real property, as an inducement to respondent to purchase said property, agreed to resell the same for respondent within one year from date of purchase at a profit of not less than $3,000, and that this promise was made without any intention upon the part of appellant of performing the same. For a clear understanding of the point involved it is necessary to briefly summarize the evidence as contained in the record here. Defendant testified: "I told them if they could assure me of making about $3,000 which I needed, and promised it, why, I would take the lot." To which she stated plaintiff's salesman replied: "If you will take this lot, I can practically guarantee you that the lot will be sold and relieve your necessity. And he knew he could readily sell it and make me $3,000.00." On the subject of the resale of the lot "there was no doubt that in a short time * * * this was in August * * * he said January 1st, he was to be the salesman in charge. * * *" The agent of appellant who made the sale to respondent, and was a witness on appellant's behalf, testified: "Q. Did you make any statements to Dr. King (respondent) that the Boulevard Land Company (appellant) would resell the property? A. I don't recall whether I did or not. I have told that, because I had been told to tell it; that when the time was right they would have a resale office at Girard the same as they have at Walnut Acres or West Adams after it was sold out. She (respondent) said she wanted to make some money and I told her if she would hold it a reasonable length of time she would make some money; good property. I believe I answered that when I said that when the time was right we would put in the resales office and sell their property." In reference to respondent's testimony that she had to have $3,000, this witness testified: "She may have made it but I don't recall it." The record discloses more testimony similar in effect to that quoted. There is no evidence that appellant at any time attempted to resell the lot. There is evidence that some three years after the sale of the lot to respondent, and prior to the filing of this action, respondent offered to quitclaim the lot in question to appellant. There is also some evidence that respondent attempted to contact the agent of appellant who sold her that lot through appellant and that the agent was not informed of this by appellant. There is evidence in the record to support the finding attacked by appellant, though in some instance there may be present a conflict in the testimony given, a question of fact is presented, and the finding of the trial court cannot be questioned here. "So in civil cases tried without a jury where fraud is an issue, it is for the trial court to determine the weight of the evidence, and, while it cannot find fraud upon a mere suspicion, yet if there is any substantial evidence tending to prove fraud, it is for the trial court to determine whether such evidence outweighs or preponderates over that adduced in opposition thereto, and when the trial court has found that such evidence does so preponderate, its decision thereon is final, and an appellate court has no right or authority to disturb such a finding, even though the appellate court may be of a contrary opinion as to the weight of such evidence." Noll v. Baida, 202 Cal. 98, 101, 259 P. 433, 434.

[3] In the case at bar there is evidence of a substantial nature to sustain the finding of fraud and the conflicting evidence to be found in the record is not sufficient to warrant this court in holding that, under the circumstances here present, the evidence as a whole is not "clear and satisfactory." Appellant's contention that the promise to resell amounted to a mere opinion, and therefore is not actionable, is without merit when all the facts of the case are considered. The isolated statement might be so considered, but, when read in conjunction with the testimony as a whole, it is clear that the statement was made and relied upon as one of fact not opinion. The finding made by the court "said promise was made * * * without any intention upon its part of fulfilling and keeping the same" is one that as a rule cannot be supported by literal proof, but must be sustained by evidence of a circumstantial nature. In Holiday v. Tolosano, 39 Cal. App. 151, 153, 178 P. 170, 171, the court makes this statement: "It is also true that there is no direct evidence in the record before us that at the time of making the contract here involved there was any preconceived secret intention on the part of Tolosano not to perform it; but in this connection the record, in our opinion, discloses sufficient evidence from which it may be justly inferred that at the time of entering into the contract Tolosano had in fact no intention of performing his obligations thereunder. 'What a person's intent in such a matter may be is often a difficult thing to determine. It usually must be ascertained from his future conduct and speech, and the fact as to such intent is one peculiarly to be deduced by process of reasoning from the facts in evidence by the trial judge.'" The evidence in the instant case, when measured by the rule as stated in the above quotation, is ample to sustain the finding as made by the court in that regard. The court found the contract worthless and valueless to defendant. The evidence shows conclusively that in entering into the contract the respondent had a specific and disclosed reason, the securing for her necessities of the sum of $3,000. This reason, and this reason only, induced her to make the contract. She failed in the securing of the sum contemplated, and through the change in attitude of appellant was subjected to suit for a large alleged balance due it. The considerations which induced respondent to enter upon the transaction wholly failed and became valueless through appellant's dereliction.

Appellant's second specification of error, that the promise to resell was not such a promise as would constitute fraud, has been already commented upon and the view expressed that the statement was one of fact. The authorities cited by appellant, when considered in the light of the evidence existing in the instant case, fail to sustain appellant's position. 12 Cal. Jur. p. 730, where many illustrations of the rule are cited.

[4] Appellant next assigns as error the fact that the trial court admitted evidence of the alleged agreement on the part of appellant to resell the property in question for respondent's benefit. Appellant in support of this contention relies upon the so-called best evidence rule prohibiting oral testimony to vary the terms of a written contract. Though this rule is without doubt one established both by statutory enactment and judicial decision there exists to it certain well-recognized exceptions among which is the rule that parol evidence is admissible to show fraud, since it does not in fact vary or contradict the contract, but shows that no binding contract was legally made. Wiberg v. Barnum, 99 Cal. App. 323, 325, 278 P. 871. The court having found that fraud existed and that respondent entered into the contract under its influence, the instant case falls squarely within the exception just stated. What has been said in reference to the contract applies with equal force to the so-called "rider" or separate agreement attached to the contract at some time during the transaction.

[5] It is next urged that "the judgment of the court is against the law," in that the remedy sought by respondent is rescission for fraud, and that no notice of rescission was given nor was there any offer of restitution made. Under the circumstance of the instant case, formal notice and offer to restore the consideration received was unnecessary. Respondent did not institute the action, but merely asserted this right when sued by appellant. "The institution of the suit or the allowance of the amendment was sufficient notice of rescission in a case such as this. Zeller v. Milligan, 71 Cal. App. 617, 236 P. 349. This is especially true in equity, where fraud is the basis of the claim, and no legal prejudice to the defendants could have resulted." Rosemead Co. v. Shipley Co., 207 Cal. 414, 422, 278 P. 1038, 1042. The evidence shows that respondent had offered to restore the property even before appellant instituted this action. The measure of damages adopted by the court, though not as favorable to respondent as some rules of damages indicated in the cases cited, nevertheless is sustained by the evidence, and is the usual rule adopted where judgment is entered under pleadings such as are contained in the second count of the cross-complaint herein. It should be noted that the evidence here presented is sufficient to sustain the allegation of this count as well as the first count.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

Appellant appeals from the order of the court denying his motion for a new trial and also from the judgment as against him. The indictment charged appellant with "criminal conspiracy" as defined by subdivision 2 of section 182 of the Penal Code, which reads as follows: "Criminal conspiracy defined. If two or more persons conspire: * * * 2. Falsely and maliciously to indict another for any crime, or to procure another to be charged or arrested for any crime. * * *"

Appellant's first specifications of error are that the evidence produced at the trial was insufficient to establish the essential elements of the crime as charged and that aside from the testimony of Helen Lee, an admitted accomplice, there is no evidence to connect appellant with the crime charged; there being a lack of evidence to corroborate her testimony. In the consideration of these assignments, it becomes necessary to examine the testimony produced before the trial court. We shall here summarize the testimony as presented in the record. In making this summary no attempt has been made to quote the exact language used, except where it appears within quotation marks. The evidence shows that appellant, at the time the alleged transactions were had which it is contended constituted the criminal conspiracy, was employed by the Yellow Cab Company as safety director. Helen Lee, the admitted accomplice of appellant and to whom immunity had been granted prior to appellant's trial, had been employed by the cab company as an investigator. The only direct evidence tending to connect appellant with the alleged crime is found in the testimony of Miss Lee. She testified that on the day she had completed her work for the cab company she was approached by appellant and told by him that if she would move to the Philben Hotel he would give her a case to work upon. She thereupon moved to the indicated hotel, and on the same day appellant called upon her there and left with her a hand bag of some kind. Appellant instructed her to become acquainted with a man named Walkup who then resided at the Philben Hotel. She further testified that after she had made the acquaintance of Walkup she was instructed by appellant to invite Walkup to her room for the purpose of getting him in a drunken condition. At one time she was instructed to get Walkup in a "compromising position." The reason for this as appears from her testimony was as follows:

"Q. And was anything said during that period of time as to why you wanted to get him (Walkup) drunk or in a compromising position? A. He (appellant) said these people wanted to control him.

"Q. And that was the reason why you were to get him in that position, was simply because the people he represented wanted to control him? A. The people Mr. Shawn represented wanted to control the Major.

"Q. And that was your understanding all along, that that was why you were to get him in that condition? Is that correct? A. So they could take pictures of him, and that would embarrass him and force him to do as they wanted.

"Q. That was the reason they wanted this information, to force him to do as they wanted? A. That was my understanding."

Miss Lee also testified that appellant furnished to her a bottle of wine and told her that a private detective would be one of the persons who would take the pictures of Walkup. Her testimony also shows that at appellant's direction she removed to the Leeward Apartments and from there she called Walkup over the telephone and invited him to have dinner there with her, but that he refused but told her to meet him at the Elks' Club, which she did.

The private detective, Sandel, and his employer testified that appellant attempted to secure the services of Sandel in the "closing of a case," but that he refused to tell them what the case was. Neither Miss Lee's name nor Walkup's name was mentioned, though Miss Lee later told Sandel's employer she was engaged on a case with appellant.

Another witness testified that he knew both appellant and Walkup. That one week after Miss Lee came to live at the Philben Hotel appellant asked him to point out to him Walkup, appellant at the time telling him that Walkup "had witnessed an accident for us over at the Yellow Cab Company."

Walkup testified that he was a police commissioner and had had "casual" meetings with Miss Lee, one at the Elks' Club. He did not mention or refer to appellant in any way.

One Patterson, a fellow employee of appellant's with the cab company, testified that he knew both appellant and Miss Lee. That appellant had introduced Miss Lee to him and that he had seen them together a number of times. That appellant asked him to drive his car to the Elks' Club to meet Miss Lee. That he did this, appellant telling him that he thought Miss Lee was "stepping out on him." That at appellant's request he, together with appellant, followed Miss Lee from the Elks' Club to her apartment house. That they saw her come from the apartment house and enter a drug store. That at the time he left appellant and at his request again followed Miss Lee down town, where he met her and dróve her to Echo Park, where they met appellant. They later went to witness' home, met his wife, had dinner together and played golf, and then drove Miss Lee to a point near her home.

A police officer who it would appear from the record was detailed to watch Miss Lee testified that he engaged the room next to Miss Lee's room in the Philben Hotel, made her acquaintance, conversed and played cards with her, and from his room in the hotel overheard a conversation between Miss Lee and a woman friend in which Miss Lee said, "Mike is getting awfully mad because I seemed to be slow," and the friend replied, "I hope the Major does not get it in the neck too hard, because he seems to be an awfully nice old man." It appears from the record that at the time of the meeting of Walkup and Miss Lee at the Elks' Club there were also present some five or six police officers, both male and female; that some of them followed Miss Lee from the club, while others followed appellant and Patterson. They testified to the facts as already narrated and in addition testified that Miss Lee handed a slip of paper to a cab driver, which appellant afterwards secured, and that Miss Lee on her trip downtown met a man and talked with him until Patterson came for her.

Other witnesses testified that Miss Lee talked to Walkup in the lobby of the hotel and that she met appellant and talked to him in Echo Park, another woman being present at the time who was identified as the other woman in the room at the time the conversation was overheard by the police officer next door. The foregoing contains, in brief, all the material evidence offered at the trial.

[1, 2] Appellant contends that: "The evidence is legally insufficient to sustain the verdict of guilty, as it does not establish the essentials of the crime charged." As has been hereinbefore noted, appellant was indicted under the provisions of section 182, subdivision 2, of the Penal Code. This subdivision became a part of our laws as section 102 of the Crimes and Punishment Act (St. 1850, p. 242), the section then reading: "If two or more persons shall conspire to commit any offense; or falsely and maliciously to indict another for any offense; or to procure another to be charged or arrested for any such offense * * *." This section was enacted as a part of the Penal Code in 1872, the only changes in so far as the subdivision being the substitution, as indicated by the italics, of the word "crime" for "offense" and the deleting of "such." This part of the section has not been amended since it was so enacted. Prior to the adoption of the Constitution of 1879 (article 1, § 8), certain crimes could only be prosecuted by indictment. People v. Vierra, 67 Cal. 231, 232. This was also true as to the procedure in the state of New York, our section 182 of the Penal Code being based upon the New York Penal Code, Field's Draft. When this fact is considered the reason for the somewhat particular phraseology of subdivision 2 of section 182 is obvious. Provision was made for offenses indictable and also those that could be prosecuted by complaint and information.

The indictment upon which appellant was tried and convicted alleges that appellant conspired to procure one Walkup to be charged and arrested for the crime of resorting and for the crime of drunkenness. The only evidence offered by the people at the trial as to the motive or reason for the alleged conspiracy is, as has been heretofore pointed out, an alleged desire upon the part of those engaged in the plot to embarrass Walkup and so "control him" and "force him to do as they wanted." There is no evidence that the arrest of Walkup was contemplated, and it would seem that any arrest would have tended to defeat the alleged sinister design. The sufficiency of the evidence, as measured by the terms of the indictment and the section of the Penal Code under which it was drawn, must, therefore, rest upon the construction to be placed upon the words "to be charged" as found in both the indictment and Code. Respondent contends that "to be charged" as used in the Code has no special legal significance, but should be deemed as synonymous with "to be accused." In the more than eighty years that the statute in question has been upon our statute books the courts of the state have not been called upon to construe the language just quoted, and the industry of counsel has failed to disclose, in other jurisdictions, authority of a convincing nature. In view of the history of section 182, that the part of the section containing the words in question were originally incorporated in the enactment to cover a procedural condition then existing, the limited class of crimes in which other than prosecution by indictment was authorized, it would seem highly improbable that the words "to be charged" were used in other than a strict and limited legal significance. The context, "to be charged or arrested," is illustrative of this construction in that "to be charged" referred to the formal charging by complaint or information, while the latter part "or arrested" without doubt was incorporated to cover those instances where the formality of a written "charge" was unnecessary or not complied with. In the case of People v. Garnett, 129 Cal. 364, 61 P. 1114, 1115, our Supreme Court in construing section 32 of the Penal Code, a section having a history identical as to origin and enactment with that of section 182 of the Penal Code, said: "Again, the word 'charged,' as used in the section, means a formal complaint, information, or indictment filed against the criminal, or possibly an arrest without warrant might be sufficient. Mere general rumors and common talk that a party has committed a felony are wholly insufficient to fill the measure required by the word 'charged.'"

In People v. Leporl, 35 Cal. App. 60, 63, 169 P. 692, 694, the court said: "Charged may mean a 'formal complaint, information, or indictment' (People v. Garnett, 129 Cal. 366, 61 P. 1114), and, as here used, cannot mean anything more or different than information." Respondent has cited a number of cases from other jurisdictions, but upon examination it is evident that they are not controlling in the instant case, arising as they do under circumstances at variance with those here presented and in some instances under statutes differing in nature to our Code.

The evidence produced at the trial fails to support the material allegations of the indictment under which appellant was convicted, in that there cannot be found in the record any evidence whatsoever tending to prove that appellant intended or conspired "to charge" Walkup in any complaint or information with the alleged crimes or to cause his arrest therefor. Inasmuch as for the reasons indicated herein the judgment below must be reversed, the consideration of the other points specified by appellant in his briefs is unnecessary here.

The judgment and order appealed from are reversed.

Action by George E. Toby against W. B. Hubbard and others, copartners, doing business under the fictitious name of Greenman & Sons. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

Fitzgerald & Selleck, of San Diego, for respondent.

BARNARD, P. J.

This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff in an action for damages growing out of a collision between two automobiles. As the respondent was driving his machine along his own right-hand side of a paved highway, having recently entered the same, he observed another automobile, driven by the appellant Hubbard and owned by the other appellants, approaching on its left-hand side of the highway and apparently passing another car. The respondent slowed down, apparently almost to a stop, to allow the approaching car to cross over to its proper side of the highway, but, instead of so crossing over, that car maintained its course on its extreme left-hand side of the road and struck the respondent's car head-on.

The principal point raised by appellants is that the respondent was guilty of contributory negligence, as a matter of law. In support of their contention they rely entirely upon the respondent's own testimony, which they thus summarize: "On the 24th day of April, 1930, he had a collision with another automobile on the southerly edge of the Town of Fallbrook, when he had come from Live Oak Park; that he entered the paved highway at the intersection known as the Live Oak intersection after he had made a boulevard stop; that he very cautiously approached the intersection from the east going west; that this intersection is a blind intersection, and is slightly down grade and in his opinion a very dangerous one for traffic that might be coming onto the highway from the Live Oak Road; that his car was in low gear; that he continued in low gear and turned north onto the highway and shifted into intermediate when he saw two cars coming; that the cars in his judgment were some four hundred or more feet from the intersection; that both cars were going south, one being on his side of the highway and nothing to obstruct that car from coming across to its own side of the highway; that he stepped his gear up with intentions of going into high; that he continued to watch the car and saw that it continued, even though it had gone considerably ahead of the other car on plaintiff's side of the highway. He took his foot off the accelerator, slowed down and then realized that this automobile was going to hit him; that he had slowed his car down at that time to such a slow speed that he could not take the shoulder of the road; all that he had time to do was to put his foot on the clutch and the brake and wait for the shock."

Appellants also set forth in their brief the testimony of the respondent as given upon cross-examination, which adds nothing to the above summary, so far as the question before us is concerned. The respondent also testified that he saw these two cars approaching, the appellants' car being on his side of the highway "seemingly as though" it had passed the other car, both cars being far enough away, the appellants' car being in advance of the other, and there being nothing to obstruct its driver from going across to his own side of the highway.

[1] The general rule as to when a question of contributory negligence is one of fact and when one of law is thoroughly established and is thus stated in Moss v. Boynton Co., 44 Cal. App. 474, 186 P. 631, 632: "Contributory negligence 'is a question of law only when the evidence is of such a character that it will support no other legitimate inference than that in the one case the plaintiff was guilty of contributing negligence. * * * When the evidence is such that the court is impelled to say that it is not in conflict on the facts, and that from those facts reasonable men can draw but one inference, and that an inference pointing unerringly to the negligence of the plaintiff contributing to his own injury, then, and only then, does the law step in and forbid plaintiff a recovery. * * * Even where the facts are undisputed, if reasonable minds might draw different conclusions upon the question of negligence, the question is one of fact for the jury.' "

[2] We think the application of this rule to the facts of this case leads inevitably to the conclusion that the question of contributory negligence was one of fact for the court. It can hardly be said that from these facts reasonable men could draw but one inference and that pointing unerringly to the negligence of the respondent contributing to his own injury. On the other hand, it would appear entirely reasonable that this respondent, seeing the other car apparently passing another automobile, with plenty of room to return to its own side of the road, might naturally expect this to be done and rely upon it, and that in slowing down almost to a stop, thus giving the other car additional opportunity to cross to the other side of the road, the respondent did all that could be expected of a reasonable man under such circumstances. It would also seem, with the other car coming at 40 miles an hour, as shown by the evidence, that the period of time available to the respondent to get out of the way, after it became apparent that the other car was not going to change its course, must have been extremely short and such as might very easily have made it impossible for the respondent to get off the highway. The question was therefore one of fact for the trial court, which by its judgment placed the blame on the party who, without excuse, was traveling on the wrong side of the road.

[3-6] The only other point raised is that the court erred in disregarding the testimony of both parties and "deciding the case on a theory of his own." The argument made is that the court disregarded the testimony as to how far the respondent could see along the road, and, as a result, refused to consider the defense that the respondent had the last clear chance to avoid the collision in question. Reliance is placed upon the opinion of the trial judge upon deciding the case. It has frequently been pointed out that such an opinion is not a part of the record and is in no way conclusive upon the appeal. Even at that, the appellants rely upon only a portion of that opinion, taken apart from its context. While expressing doubt as to whether the respondent actually was able to see for a distance of 400 feet along the highway at the time he was making the turn from the intersecting street, the court stated that he might well have been able to see for that distance after he had driven upon the pavement. The court then went on to point out a number of respects in which the evidence indicated that after the respondent realized his danger he had no opportunity to avoid the collision. In effect, the court held that the respondent did not have the last clear chance to avoid the accident, and the evidence strongly supports that conclusion. Every inference and intendment must be taken in support of the judgment; and the court could have well invoked another rule of law to the effect that, when a person is placed, without his fault, in a position of peril, he may not be held strictly accountable if, in the light of full deliberation, it finally appears that some other course might have been wiser than the one he instinctively followed. Were the reasoning of the trial court in this case to be considered, it fully supports the judgment rendered and contains nothing conflicting therewith.

For the reasons given, the judgment is affirmed.

W. J. LACHFORD CO. v. SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA GAS CO.

Civ. 7213.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California.

July 26, 1932.

1. Evidence ⇐434(8).

Parol evidence is admissible to prove fraudulent negotiations in procurement of contract.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Douglas L. Edmonds, Judge.

Action by the W. J. Lachford Company against the Southern California Gas Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Evans, Pearce & Campbell and Earl Oakley, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Thos. J. Reynolds and L. T. Rice, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, J.

In an action upon a contract pursuant to which fuel was alleged to have been furnished at a rate in excess of the schedule price chargeable in such cases, judgment was rendered in favor of the defendant upon the pleadings. The plaintiff appealed.

The appellant's contract required, and it paid for some years, at the rate of 26 cents for natural gas furnished by the respondent. The complaint alleged that the respondent represented through its agent, who was clothed with authority to act for his principal, that the buyer was not entitled to nor eligible for a lower rate, and that a lower rate could not and would not be allowed; that said representations were false, were known to the defendant to have been made by said agent, and that they were known to be false and fraudulent, and were made with intent to deceive and defraud the plaintiff; that the plaintiff was entitled to the lower rate; and that the defendant knew that the latter rate was available to the plaintiff. Judgment was demanded for the difference between the alleged proper rate and the amount which had been paid. By the terms of said contract it was agreed: "All terms and stipulations heretofore made and agreed to by the parties in relation to said fuel service are merged in this contract, and no representation of any agent or employee shall be binding upon the company, except as expressed herein." At the time set for trial the plaintiff was permitted to file an amendment to its complaint, and to allege that the defendant falsely and fraudulently and with intent to defraud the plaintiff, represented "through the defendant's agents, representatives and employees," "who were clothed with authority to act for the defendant in soliciting contracts," that the plaintiff was not eligible for the lower rate for fuel and could not write a contract therefor; that such representations were knowingly and intentionally false. It was stated in behalf of the plaintiff that it would prove that it was entitled to a lower rate during the entire period of time covered by its contracts, "which the agent of the defendant secured through his misrepresentations to the plaintiff," and which the plaintiff "was induced to enter into by false and fraudulent representations by his agent."

[1, 2] It is contended by the appellant as a ground for reversal that the trial court erred in declining to permit the introduction of evidence tending to prove the allegations of fraud contained in its complaint and as indicated by its offer of proof; and authorities holding that the exemption clause as to agents "does not preclude proof of fraudulent representations by which the defendant was induced to execute the agreement and the promissory note" given upon subscription for stock, etc., are cited. It is well established that parol evidence is always admissible to prove fraudulent negotiations in the procurement of a contract. But in each of the cases upon which the appellant relies it appeared that the principal had acquiesced in the agent's acts or representations, or facts peculiar to the transaction there considered do not preclude the application of such doctrine. However, as stated by our Supreme Court in Gridley v. Tilson, 202 Cal. 748, 262 P. 322, 323: "A well-settled exception, however, is the case where the party seeking to rely on fraudulent representations of an agent had notice of the limitation on the agent's authority to make representations. Therefore a principal is bound only by the representations embodied in the written contract, where a provision in the contract notified the prospective purchaser that the agent's authority went no further. Fidelity & Casualty Co. of New York v. Fresno Flume & Irrigation Co., 161 Cal. 466, 119 P. 646, 37 L. R. A. (N. S.) 322; Pease v. Fitzgerald, 31 Cal. App. 727, 161 P. 506; Tockstein v. Pac. Kissel Kar Branch, 33 Cal. App. 262, 164 P. 906; Munn v. Anthony, 36 Cal. App. 312, 171 P. 1082; Schuster v. N. A. Hotel Co., 106 Neb. 672, 184 N. W. 136, 186 N. W. 87; Northern Assurance Co. v. Grand View Building Ass'n, 183 U. S. 308, 22 S. Ct. 133, 46 L.

Ed. 213. In the case of Pease v. Fitzgerald, supra, the rule was applied under circumstances almost identical with the circumstances in the present case. Defendant, however, attempts to escape the effect of the settled rule of these cases by testifying that he did not have his glasses with him at the time he signed the subscription contract and gave the notes and therefore he did not read the contract nor the provision referred to. But this cannot afford him an excuse in the absence of a showing that he was prevented by the agent from reading the limiting clause or was otherwise tricked into signing the document without reading it. He made no request to have the contract read to him. In addition it was in evidence that he had previously signed similar contracts with the same company in subscribing for 3000 shares of its stock." No semblance of fraud other than representations of an agent which were capable of verification by the appellant from published schedules is asserted in the instant case, though it continued to accept the respondent's service over a period of more than two years.

The judgment is affirmed.

Rae Freiberger, in pro. per.

Colbourn & De Avila, of Oakland, for respondents.

PER CURIAM.

The above-entitled actions arose out of a dispute over an agreement of sale of certain real property. Appellant Freiberger agreed to buy, and respondents agreed to sell, an apartment house for the sum of $16,500. The buyer was to pay $4,100 down, and the payment of the balance was to be secured by two mortgages or deeds of trust. Appellant paid the said sum of $4,100 in escrow to Alameda County Title Insurance Company. Subsequently she demanded the return of the money from the escrow holder, and served notice of rescission upon respondents, chiefly on the grounds of defective title and fraud. The demand was refused. Thereafter the respondents brought an action against the title company and the appellant for the $4,100 down payment and for specific performance. Appellant engaged counsel, and the action was tried, the money being meanwhile paid into court. At the conclusion of the action the trial court announced its intention of giving judgment to the sellers. Before findings were prepared, however, Miss Freiberger's counsel submitted an offer of compromise. After considerable discussion, a settlement was reached, by the terms of which the Frankfields were to take the sum of $1,500, and the balance of the money was to be returned to Miss Freiberger. This agreement was embodied in a stipulation which provided that, upon payment of these sums, the action might be dismissed. It was signed by the parties and their attorneys. Immediately thereafter the court made an order for the payment of the money in accordance with its terms, and this was done. A dismissal of the action was prepared and signed by the attorneys, but was not filed until some time later.

About nine months after the settlement, appellant Freiberger, having dismissed her counsel, filed a claim of lien against the property which was the subject of the agreement of sale. Respondents brought an action (the first of the above-entitled actions) to quiet title. Appellant, appearing in propria persona, filed an answer and counterclaim. Thereafter appellant brought an action against respondents (the second of the above-entitled actions) seeking affirmative relief. These actions were tried, and each was decided in favor of respondents. Appellant appealed from both judgments, and the appeals were consolidated.

The theory of appellant may be summarized as follows: The original agreement of sale was procured by fraudulent representations of the sellers, and their title was defective; consequently appellant was entitled to rescind, and did so; she then became entitled to the return of her down payment of $4,100; no final judgment was ever rendered against her in the first action; and the purported compromise agreement was void because procured by fraud, duress, and menace on the part of respondents, their attorneys, and her own attorney.

[1, 2] It is apparent that, if the compromise agreement is valid, these appeals are determined by that fact alone. Appellant claims that she was threatened with harm if she refused to sign the stipulation, and that her own attorney told her he was working against her interest, and would use his influence with the judge to cause her injury. There is no evidence save the testimony of appellant herself to support these statements and all of the other witnesses testified to the contrary. Moreover, it is not denied that appellant, accompanied by the other parties and both attorneys, walked down to the courtroom where the judge made the order for payment of the money, and thereafter proceeded to the office of the county treasurer, where she personally secured the money.

The situation is, then, as follows: Appellant was about to lose $4,100 and costs as a result of an announced decision against her. Her attorney arranged a settlement for $1,500. She signed the agreement, took the money, and was apparently satisfied for a period of nine months.

From these facts it necessarily follows that the trial court was justified in making its finding that this agreement was freely and voluntarily entered into and carried out by all parties. This disposes of the appeals, and the judgments are therefore affirmed.

Superseding opinion in 7 P.(2d) 717.

A. J. Harder, of Sacramento, for petitioner.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Neil R. McAllister, Dist. Atty., and Guy P. Johnson, Asst. Dist. Atty., both of Sacramento, for respondent.

SEAWELL, J.

Alleging that he is illegally confined and restrained of his liberty by the warden of Folsom prison, petitioner seeks by this application for a writ of habeas corpus to secure his release and discharge.

Petitioner was convicted in Los Angeles county on three counts of grand theft. He was received at San Quentin on August 18, 1928, and thereafter his term was fixed at four years for the first offense and two years each for two subsequent offenses, the sentences to run concurrently, so that his maximum sentence would be four years. With full allowance of credits on this term, petitioner would be entitled to his release on August 18, 1931 (section 1168, Pen. Code). Prior to August 18, 1931, and on October 27, 1929, he was released on parole. On July 24, 1931, which was prior to the expiration of his term as reduced by a full allowance of credits, petitioner was sent to Folsom for violating his parole. On July 25–26 the state board of prison directors ordered that the parole theretofore granted to petitioner "be suspended and revoked pending investigation of the complaint filed" against the petitioner. On July 31, 1931, petitioner was given the required notice of hearing of the charge of parole violation, and the hearing thereon was set for August 1, 1931. On that date the hearing was continued, apparently without objection of petitioner, to August 8th and 9th, when the matter was partially heard, and then continued to August 14th, and after that to August 26, 1931, when the hearing was concluded, and upon the oral and documentary evidence before it the prison board determined "that due proof had been made that the prisoner has with evil intent violated the rules and regulations of the prison, was guilty of the offense specified in the complaint, and should be punished therefor * * * by a forfeiture of such time credits as he had heretofore earned, or may hereafter earn." The propriety of this type of order was upheld in In re Sanders, 47 Cal. App. 368, 190 P. 647.

Petitioner contends that on August 26, 1931, when the order of forfeiture of credits was made, the prison board was without jurisdiction to make such order, for the reason that his time (with full allowance of credits) had expired. This contention is based on the theory that at the time of his parole violation he had admittedly earned, and been allowed, a reduction of eight months on his time, and in addition thereto had been allowed an additional four months' reduction by virtue of resolution of the board of prison directors dated July 1, 1931. This resolution purported to allow in advance, upon the recommendation of the warden, all credits earned by prisoners during the interim between the semiannual meetings of the board. Petitioner contends that with the allowance of these credits his term expired on August 18, 1931, which was prior to the date his parole was formally suspended, and the order made revoking all credits theretofore earned or thereafter to be earned by him.

[1] A prisoner on parole is constructively a prisoner of the state in the legal custody and under the control of the state board of prison directors. In re Heckman, 90 Cal. App. 700, 266 P. 585. Rules and regulations for the conduct of a paroled prisoner are rules and regulations of the prison. See Matter of Stanton, 169 Cal. 607, 147 P. 264. Upon hearing and trial, the petitioner was found guilty of having "with evil intent violated the rules and regulations of the prison," and as punishment therefor the prison board forfeited all good time theretofore earned or thereafter to be earned. This the statute empowered it to do. Section 1168, Pen. Code.

[2] It is well settled that a prisoner is not entitled as of right to credits (In re Thompson, 54 Cal. App. 177, 201 P. 473; Pareses v. Board of Prison Directors, 208 Cal. 353, 281 P. 394), nor may they be accorded automatically by operation of law, but, in addition to being earned, must be allowed by affirmative action of the prison board (In re Mann, 192 Cal. 165, 219 P. 71).

[3] Assuming that the petitioner had earned all the credits allowed by section 1168 of the Penal Code, a point we need not now decide, there can be no doubt that the prison board had authority to revoke and forfeit those credits for any infraction of the rules or for parole violation occurring prior to the expiration of petitioner's sentence. That is all that was done in this case, and it is immaterial that the order forfeiting the credits was made at a time subsequent to the expiration of the alleged "reduced" term. By the order forfeiting the credits, the so-called "reduced" term disappears from the case, and the petitioner is required to serve the full four years originally imposed on him, which term has not at this time expired. In reaching this conclusion, we regard as unimportant the fact that the parole violation for which petitioner's credits were subsequently revoked occurred prior to the expiration of the asserted "reduced" term. Likewise, notice of the hearing for revocation of parole and forfeiture of credits was served on petitioner and several hearings had prior to August 18, 1931. The mere fact that, by reason of such continuances, the order revoking and forfeiting petitioner's credits was made subsequent to August 18, 1931, is, in our opinion, immaterial.

We conclude, therefore, that the petitioner was not entitled to discharge on August 18, 1931, and that the prison board's jurisdiction over the petitioner continued up to the time of the making of the order of August 26, 1931, forfeiting all credits theretofore earned or thereafter to be earned. Such order was therefore properly made.

[4] This matter seriously affects the disciplinary and administrative policies which the state evidently intended should be placed as far as possible in the hands of the state board of prison directors and those charged with administrative details under said board, and this court should not interfere with its decision, unless it clearly appears that it has exceeded its powers, or that substantial injustice has been done. As an aid to administration, we see no objection to credits being allowed by the board upon the recommendation of the warden on the condition that the prisoner's conduct and work continues to be meritorious up to the date that his discharge is due.

The application is denied, and the writ is discharged.

YOLO et al. v. MODESTO IRR. DIST.

Sac. 4538.

Supreme Court of California.

Sept. 1, 1932.

Rehearing Denied Sept. 28, 1932.

1. Waters and water courses ⊂=228¾.

Irrigation district operating power lines under statutory authority for selling electricity within and beyond its territory held liable in tort for negligent maintenance of electric power line (St. 1877–78, p. 820; St. 1919, p. 778, as amended).

Irrigation district, although, when created by St. 1877–78, p. 820, it had been operating as public or state agency performing governmental function, had availed itself of St. 1919, p. 778, as amended, pursuant to which it constructed power houses and transmission lines for manufacture, distribution, and sale of electric power, light, and energy throughout its territory and also beyond its boundary lines, competing with a public service corporation and using only about 25 per cent. of power generated and transmitted by it for pumping, drainage, and other necessary irrigation district activities, and by engaging in such activities had become a quasi municipal corporation liable for torts of its agents when acting in proprietary capacity.

2. Waters and water courses ⊂=228¾.

Irrigation district held liable for death of boy if caused by negligent maintenance of power line maintained as proprietary enterprise, even if at time of accident wire was carrying power for irrigation purposes (St. 1877–78, p. 820; St. 1919, p. 778, as amended).

It was immaterial what particular use was being made at the time in question of power conveyed over broken wire so long as wire was constructed and maintained as part of, and for advancement of, proprietary enterprise.

PRESTON, J.

Appeal from judgment of nonsuit in favor of defendant in an action to recover damages for the alleged wrongful death of plaintiffs' minor child on April 7, 1926. The boy was electrocuted on the farm where he was working while crawling through a fence, the wires of which had become charged with electricity when one of the transmission wires of defendant's power line broke during a high wind, from rubbing against the branches of a tree or other cause, and contacted the wire strands of an adjoining fence.

The power wires, at the place where the break occurred, passed through a line of trees, the branches of which had not been trimmed for some time prior to the accident, and evidence was received in support of and against the charge that the boy's death was due to the negligence of defendant in failing to properly construct and maintain the said power line and in failing to take due precautions to trim the limbs of the trees so that no injury could be caused to the wires by overhanging or swaying branches. At the conclusion of the testimony, the court granted a nonsuit upon the ground that an action in tort against defendant irrigation district, based upon the negligence of its officers or employees, could not be maintained. Plaintiffs appealed. This question, therefore, confronts us: May an irrigation district, organized and operating as is defendant, be held liable in tort by reason of its negligent maintenance of an electric power line in connection with its irrigation system? If so, the judgment of nonsuit was improperly granted.

Preliminarily it may be said that, in numerous cases dealing with tort liability, this court has distinguished between two species of public corporations. In the one class have been placed incorporated cities, towns, and similar organizations, denominated "municipal corporations," which may be held liable for torts of their agents committed while acting in a proprietary capacity. Chafor v. Long Beach, 174 Cal. 478, 163 P. 670, L. R. A. 1917E, 685, Ann. Cas. 1918D, 106; Davoust v. Alameda, 149 Cal. 69, 84 P. 760, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 536, 9 Ann. Cas. 847; Morrison v. Smith Bros., 211 Cal. 36, 293 P. 53. In the other class have been placed irrigation, reclamation, drainage, and similar organizations, variously denominated "public corporations," for "governmental purposes," "agents or representatives of the state in the particular locality in which they exist," "public agencies," etc., which (with certain exceptions such as liability created by statute) are not generally liable for torts of their agents because they are held to be state agencies performing governmental functions. Whiteman v. Anderson-Cottonwood, etc., 60 Cal. App. 234, 212 P. 706; Nissen v. Cordua Irr. Dist., 204 Cal. 542, 269 P. 171; Morrison v. Smith Bros., supra. The case last cited also recognizes a third classification, corporations such as a district organized under the Municipal Utility District Act (Stats. 1921, p. 245), denominated "quasi municipal corporations" or public corporations of a quasi municipal character, more nearly resembling municipal corporations proper than state agencies and subject, so far as liability for tort is concerned, to the rules governing municipal corporations, that is, being generally liable for torts committed by their agents while acting in a proprietary capacity. For a full discussion of this subject see Morrison v. Smith Bros., supra.

[1] We shall now discuss the organization and operations of this defendant to determine under which classification it should come and whether it is subject to the general rule governing tort liability or to the exception thereto which excludes state agencies.

Defendant, the Modesto Irrigation District, was created by legislative enactment (Stats. 1877–78, p. 820), and, operating under this legislation as an irrigation district, it was, within the classification of a public or state agency performing a governmental function, exempt from liability for the torts of its agents. However, defendant subsequently availed itself of the provisions of the statute of 1919, and subsequent amendments (Stats. 1919, p. 778; Stats. 1921, pp. 829, 1083; Stats. 1923, p. 629), pursuant to which it constructed power houses and transmission lines for the manufacture, distribution, and sale of electric power, light, and energy throughout its territory and also outside of its boundary lines, competing with a public service corporation, and, in fact, using only about 25 per cent. of the power generated and transmitted by it for pumping, drainage, and other necessary irrigation district activities. Appellants contend that, by so engaging in these latter activities, defendant stepped beyond the character and out of the classification of purely an irrigation district or state agency, and assumed in part at least the role of a municipal or quasi municipal corporation. In other words, appellants claim that, although cloaked with the name and form of an irrigation district, defendant, so far as its operations under said statute are concerned, more closely resembles a municipal corporation proper than it does a state agency, and it may properly be termed an organization coming within the classification of a quasi municipal corporation, liable for the torts of its agents when acting in a proprietary capacity. These contentions must be sustained.

This is so because of the language of the act itself, which in so many words extends the scope of the organization beyond that of an irrigation district, enlarges its powers. For instance, the act states that any irrigation district "may provide for the construction, acquisition, operation, leasing and control of plants for the generation, distribution, sale and lease of electrical energy, including sale to municipalities, corporations, public utility districts, or individuals, of electrical power so generated;" that "the officers, agents and employees of such districts shall have the same powers, duties and liabilities respecting such power and the construction, acquisition, repair, maintenance, management and control thereof as they now have or may hereafter have respecting such irrigation or such irrigation districts;" that "the California irrigation district act shall be so construed, applied and enforced as to apply to such power as well as such irrigation, except that nothing in said act shall be so construed as to prevent the sale of power by any district for use outside of the boundaries of such district or to require the distribution of such power in accordance with any assessments levied by such district." St. 1919, p. 778, § 1, as amended by St. 1923, p. 629. In particular the exception noted in the clause last quoted has the undeniable effect of extending the powers of the corporation beyond those authorized by the Irrigation Act and requiring it to assume characteristics more nearly partaking of the nature of a municipal corporation than of a state agency.

[2] The maintenance and operation of an electric plant used to supply the public with power has been directly held to be the exercise, not of a governmental function, but of a proprietary and private right. Davoust v. City of Alameda, supra. It is immaterial in this case what particular use was being made at the time in question of the power conveyed over the broken wire—whether it was carrying power for irrigation purposes or for sale or for other purposes—so long as said wire was constructed and maintained as a part of, and for the advancement of, the proprietary enterprise. The said act, pursuant to which defendant was operating, is determinative of its nature as a quasi municipal corporation, and it follows that it may be held liable, when acting in a proprietary capacity, for the torts of its agents. In other words, while we can conceive that a governmental agency might be organized and authorized to operate a power plant for governmental purposes only, and thus be free from tort liability, this could not be true of a corporation organized pursuant to the above statute, which specifically opens the door to the conducting of a proprietary enterprise by authorizing the sale of power outside of the boundaries of a district—such corporation, therefore, being free to act in a proprietary capacity, must be held liable for torts committed by its agents in conducting the proprietary enterprise. Recognizing this fact, the complaint here specifically alleges that said defendant was on said day and now is "engaged in a purely proprietary enterprise additional to and not necessary for irrigation purposes, to-wit: in the business of transmitting, transporting, distributing and selling electric current and power to consumers thereof in and near the City of Modesto. * * *"

The above holding is foreshadowed in some of the cases upon which defendant mainly relies. For example, in the case of Whiteman v. Irrigation District, supra, 60 Cal. App. 234, 241, 242, 212 P. 706, 709, the court says: "It is manifest that to uphold the complaint herein as stating a cause of action against the corporation we must take the position that the district is concerned in its operations only with private matters. This follows for the reason that the complaint does not specify for what purpose the cement was to be used. If it could be legally devoted by the district to any public purpose, it would be necessary to negative that condition by alleging facts showing that the district was promoting a proprietary right in the use of the cement at the time of the accident. There is no such allegation."

This distinction is also noted in the case of Nissen v. Cordua Irrigation District, supra, 204 Cal. 545, 269 P. 171. Again in Morrison v. Smith Bros., supra, 211 Cal. at page 45, 293 P. 53, 56, it is said: "The rule excluding state agencies from liability for tort is an exception to the general rule which we are not inclined to extend."

The justice of this ruling is apparent. As stated by counsel, a practical situation is presented. The inhabitants of Modesto and outlying districts desired to operate an electrical distribution system under public ownership. Had this end been accomplished through the city itself, a municipal corporation, it would have been liable for all torts committed by it in conducting such a proprietary enterprise (Davoust v. City of Alameda, supra; Ruppe v. City of Los Angeles, 186 Cal. 400, 199 P. 496; Sincerney v. City of Los Angeles, 53 Cal. App. 440, 200 P. 380); had it been accomplished through a public utility district, such district might also have been liable (In re Orosi Public Utility District, 196 Cal. 43, 235 P. 1004); the same is true of a municipal utility district (Morrison v. Smith Bros., supra). What real reason then could there be for making a distinction in favor of an organization operating under the said act of 1919, as amended? None exists; hence our conclusion that such a corporation, when acting in its proprietary capacity, may be held liable for the torts of its agents.

The judgment is reversed.

Action by Genevieve Berte against A. F. Luse, Western States Land & Mortgage Company, and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants named appeal.

Affirmed.

James R. Jaffray and Le Roy Reames, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Koenig & Brunton, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

This appeal is taken from a judgment quieting title in favor of plaintiff. The complaint is in the form usually employed in such an action. The defendant Clara H. Bergmeier admitted that title and possession of the property was in plaintiff, but alleged that she and her trustees, A. F. Luse and Western States Land & Mortgage Company, claim an interest in the property by virtue of a deed from plaintiff to this defendant, which deed was intended as security for a $10,000 loan alleged to have been made by this defendant to plaintiff. Defendants A. F. Luse, Mary E. Luse, and the Western States Land & Mortgage Company filed a separate answer, generally denying the allegations of the complaint. The other defendants either defaulted or filed disclaimers.

The only evidence introduced by plaintiff at the time of the trial in reference to her title was the deed by which she received title to the lots in question. The remainder of plaintiff's case was devoted to proving that the claim of defendants was without merit. On evidence substantially in conflict the trial court found that on June 5, 1924, at a time when plaintiff owned the property, plaintiff and her mother entered into an agreement with defendant Clara H. Bergmeier whereby said defendant agreed to advance to plaintiff and her mother the sum of $10,000, and to take as security a deed to the lots in question; that in pursuance to this agreement a deed to the lots was executed and delivered to Clara H. Bergmeier; that thereafter and within a few days the contracting parties agreed to rescind the loan agreement and to enter into a partnership. As part of this new agreement it was agreed that the deed should be redelivered to plaintiff. The evidence is ample to support the finding that the loan agreement was canceled by mutual consent, and that defendant Bergmeier at no time loaned any money to plaintiff.

The evidence shows, and the trial court found, that after the loan agreement was canceled the plaintiff and her mother frequently demanded the return of the deed, but for one reason or another were unable to secure a redelivery. Conditions remained in this state for approximately three years when defendant Bergmeier caused the deed to herself to be recorded. She then executed a deed to the premises to defendant A. F. Luse, in exchange for some apparently worthless oil and gas leases in Texas. The court found on conflicting evidence, and appellants do not attack the finding, that Luse at all times had actual knowledge of the claims of plaintiff to the property. Luse thereafter deeded the property to the Western States Land & Mortgage Company, of which he was president. This corporation likewise had actual knowledge of the plaintiff's claims to the property.

On this state of the evidence, as already stated, the trial court quieted plaintiff's title against the claims of defendants. A. F. Luse and Western States Land & Mortgage Company alone appeal.

The briefs filed on behalf of appellants and respondent indicate that neither counsel has shown the diligence in the preparation thereof or the regard for the rules of court expected of counsel in causes pending in this court. In the interest of justice, however, we will consider the appeal on its merits.

[1] Appellants in their opening brief in no way attack the sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings above set forth, but solely contend that it was error for the trial court to quiet plaintiff's title for the reason that plaintiff failed to trace her record title back to the original patentee, or to a grantor in possession. It will be remembered that plaintiff's only evidence tending to show title in herself was the deed by which she received title. Of course, the rule is elementary that in a quiet title action the plaintiff must recover on the strength of her own title and not on the weakness of the defendant's. Under ordinary circumstances it would follow that since the plaintiff failed to prove her chain of title, and admitted she was not in possession, the judgment herein should be reversed. However, the instant case comes within a well-settled exception to the rule that a plaintiff in a quiet title suit must trace title back to an original patentee. It is to be noted that the sole claim of the appellants is based on the deed from plaintiff to defendant Bergmeier. It is well settled that when the sole claim of the defendants is necessarily predicated on the theory that the plaintiff has good title, as where defendants claim through a conveyance from plaintiff, it is sufficient proof of title in the plaintiff to introduce into evidence the deed conveying the property to plaintiff. This is so because in such a case when defendants are claiming through the plaintiff they must necessarily admit the validity of plaintiff's title at the time their claim arose. Strange v. Strange, 23 Cal. App. 281, 137 P. 1104; Denning v. Green, 88 Cal. App. 379, 263 P. 819; Willard George Hotel Company v. Warden, 99 Cal. App. 401, 278 P. 898; Tannahill v. Greening, 85 Cal. App. 714, 259 P. 1017; Thiele v. Security Trust & Savings Bank, 202 Cal. 758, 262 P. 308. It follows that plaintiff's proof was sufficient.

[2] In a supplemental opening brief appellants contend that certain evidence was improperly admitted by the trial court, either because it was improper impeachment, or on the ground it was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial. The impeaching testimony was properly admitted, as was likewise all the evidence tending to show that the Bergmeier deed was at most a mortgage and that no consideration was given therefor. The appellants in no way attack the material findings on these issues. There was no error in the admission of evidence.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

LANGDON, J.

This is a petition for a writ of mandate.

On July 11, 1932, the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco adopted a resolution, declaring that due to world-wide economic conditions, the public interest and necessity demand that provision be made for the care and maintenance of the indigent sick and dependent poor of said city and county; that the estimated cost for such care during the fiscal year 1932–1933 is $6,500,000; that no part of said sum can be paid out of the ordinary annual income of the city and county in addition to other necessary expenses; and that consequently a bond issue is required to raise the money. This resolution was approved by the mayor on July 12, 1932, and published on July 13, 1932. On July 22, 1932, Ordinance No. 19.0711 was passed and approved by the mayor, calling for a special election to be held on August 30, 1932, to submit to the electors of the city and county the proposition of incurring a bonded debt for the said purpose and in the said sum. The ordinance sets forth the necessary details of the procedure in handling the election, and the form, denomination, interest rate and time of payment, and retirement of the bonds.

A certified copy of this ordinance was forwarded on July 22, 1932, to respondent Collins, registrar of voters of the city and county, who immediately gave notice of his refusal to place the proposition on the ballot. It is his contention that the proposed bond issue is unlawful, both for lack of authority to issue bonds under the circumstances, and by reason of improper procedure in the calling of the election. The present petition seeks to compel respondent to submit the proposition to the voters.

The petition states the foregoing facts, and further alleges that the investigations of committees appointed by the mayor, who have reported to the board of supervisors, show that San Francisco is now supplying food and other necessities of life to between 40,000 and 50,000 persons; and that during the coming winter it is estimated that between 40,000 and 60,000 families will need such assistance. It is further alleged that to raise the necessary money by taxation would require an additional tax of $1 on each $100 valuation of assessable property, which, in view of existing conditions, would cause such widespread default among taxpayers as to leave the city and county without funds to perform its ordinary functions.

[1] The grave and immediate necessity of some salutary measures to care for persons made indigent as a result of the current economic depression is established by the allegations of the petition. The extraordinary number of people in need is a matter of such common knowledge that we may take judicial notice of it. See People v. Tossetti, 107 Cal. App. 7, 289 P. 881. But the method adopted by petitioner to meet this situation presents serious questions for our determination.

The first question is whether, as counsel for the city and county contend, there is direct statutory authority for San Francisco to issue bonds for the relief of its indigent sick and dependent poor.

[2] There are two statutes which refer to the duty or power of a county to give relief to the poor. Section 4041.16 of the Political Code (as added by St. 1929, p. 1458, § 17) provides in part: "Under such limitations and restrictions as are prescribed by law, and in addition to jurisdiction and powers otherwise conferred, the boards of supervisors, in their respective counties, shall have the jurisdiction and powers to provide for the care and maintenance of the indigent sick or dependent poor of the county, and for that purpose to levy the necessary property or poll taxes, or both." It will be observed that this section is permissive, imposing no obligation; and that it refers to counties alone. The Pauper Act (Deering's Gen. Laws, 1931, vol. 2, p. 3130, Act 5814) provides in section 1: "Every county and every city and county shall relieve and support all pauper, incompetent, poor, indigent persons and those incapacitated by age, disease, or accident, lawfully resident therein, when such persons are not supported and relieved by their relatives or friends, or by their own means, or by state hospitals or other state or private institutions." This statute is mandatory, and applies to a city and county as well as to a county. There can be no question as to the applicability of the first statute, giving power to a county, and the second statute, imposing a duty on the county or city and county, to the existing situation, where large numbers of persons have become indigent through unemployment. The statutes are neither in terms nor spirit limited to the relief of chronic or permanent paupers, or any other class of poor persons, but extend to every person coming within the terms of the statute dependent upon public assistance for the necessities of life.

[3] If, then, a county or city and county must support its poor, how may it raise the funds with which to do so? Section 4041.16 of the Political Code, quoted supra, permits the levy of taxes by a county for this purpose, but does not purport to restrict the county to this means. And section 4088 of the Political Code provides that a county may incur a bonded indebtedness "for any purposes for which the board of supervisors are herein authorized to expend the funds of said county. * * *" This plainly permits a county to issue bonds for relief of the poor. It follows that San Francisco may, subject to any applicable statutory limitations, issue such bonds if it is a county. In other words, it has the duty as a city and county, under the Pauper Act, of supporting its poor, by the usual method of taxation, but it can issue bonds under section 4088 of the Political Code only if it is a county.

[4, 5] "The consolidated city and county of San Francisco partakes of the nature of a city and a county. It has the powers and performs the functions of both." Nicholl v. Koster, 157 Cal. 416, 420, 108 P. 302, 304. (Italics ours.) "San Francisco is therefore both a city and a county, and, although the boundaries of the two bodies corporate are coincident, the electors within this territory vote for officers * * * whose powers and duties are prescribed by general laws, and upon which the charter is silent. It must follow from this that some of its officers are city officers, and others are county officers. There is nothing unusual or inconsistent in this. The 'government' of the city is municipal, and the officers who are to exercise that government are municipal officers; but the territory in which that government is exercised is still a part of the state, and, for all purposes other than municipal government, is subject to its control, with the right on the part of the state to authorize the election therein of such officers as may be required to execute its general laws, or to perform such functions disconnected with the municipal government as may pertain to the government of the state." Kahn v. Sutro, 114 Cal. 316, 326, 46 P. 87, 91, 33 L. R. A. 620. These cases establish the rule that the functions performed in the particular case determine whether San Francisco is to be viewed as a city or a county. See, also, Keyes v. City and County of San Francisco, 177 Cal. 313, 173 P. 475; Crowley v. Freud, 132 Cal. 440, 64 P. 696. In Nicholl v. Koster, supra, it was pointed out that the matter in question—the probation system—concerned the whole state, and was therefore a matter of state policy and not a municipal affair. The duty to relieve the indigent, established by state statute, is likewise a matter of statewide interest, in which the city and county of San Francisco is governed by the general law, and acts as a county—an agent of the state. See County of Sacramento v. Chambers, 33 Cal. App. 142, 164 P. 613.

[6, 7] It follows that no inconsistent provisions in the San Francisco municipal charter could limit the performance of these county functions. See Nicholl v. Koster, supra. Actually, however, the charter does not purport to place any limitation upon the issuance of such bonds. Section 2 provides that San Francisco "shall have all rights and powers appropriate to a county, a city, and a city and county," subject to any restrictions in the charter. Section 3 provides that where "a procedure for the exercising of any rights or powers belonging to a city, or a county, or a city and county is provided by statute of the state of California, said procedure shall control and be followed" unless a different procedure is provided by charter or ordinance. Section 101, which incorporates the general law on creation of bonded indebtedness of municipalities, applies "except as otherwise provided in this charter," and hence does not prevent the creation of bonded indebtedness for county purposes, as an exercise of powers appropriate to a county under section 2.

[8, 9] The second question is whether the method adopted for the submission of the proposition and the issuance of bonds was proper. The board of supervisors proceeded under section 4088 of the Political Code which sets forth a detailed procedure, and which was therefore applicable both as an appropriate general law, and by virtue of the provisions of section 3 of the charter. Respondent, however, raises two objections to the proceedings. The first is that the specification of a maximum rate of interest for the bonds (6 per cent.) was improper, since the statute (Pol. Code, § 4088) requires "the rate of interest" to be stated. But said section permits a maximum rate of 6 per cent., and clearly there can be no objection to a method which permits the issuance of bonds at such a rate or lower, if it should be possible to do so. The voters who approve a maximum rate of 6 per cent. impliedly approve any lower rate. See Cole v. City of Los Angeles, 180 Cal. 617, 182 P. 436; Town of Martinez v. Johnson, 201 Cal. 397, 257 P. 853. The second objection is that the special election called under the provisions of section 4088 of the Political Code could not lawfully be consolidated with the August primary election (see Deering's Gen. Laws 1931, vol. 1, p. 1095, Act 2264, § 1), and that for the same reason it could not be held on the same date, with the same precincts. A sufficient answer is that although the elections are to take place on the same date and in the same precincts, they have not been consolidated and are not confused. Separate provision is made for inspectors, judges of election, and clerks; ballots are to be used for the special election, as distinguished from voting machines at the primary election; and the returns are to be separately canvassed. The elections are obviously distinct and separate. See Morgan v. City of Los Angeles, 182 Cal. 301, 187 P. 1050; Mead v. City of Los Angeles, 185 Cal. 422, 197 P. 65.

[10] The final question which must be answered relates to the provisions of article 4, § 31, of the California Constitution, prohibiting the giving, lending, or pledging of the credit of the state or any subdivision thereof, in aid of any individual, association, or corporation, and also prohibiting the making of any gifts of public money or other things of value to any individual, association, or corporation. It is contended that the proposed bond issue is a gift in violation of this section. It must, however, be considered as settled by the recent decision of this court in the case of Patrick v. Riley, 209 Cal. 350, 287 P. 455, that the expenditure of public money in pursuance of a public purpose is not within the scope of the prohibition. See, also, Sacramento County v. Chambers, 33 Cal. App. 142, 164 P. 613; Veterans' Welfare Board v. Riley, 189 Cal. 159, 208 P. 678, 22 A. L. R. 1531; Macmillan Co. v. Clarke, 184 Cal. 491, 194 P. 1030, 17 A. L. R. 288; Pasadena City High School District of Los Angeles County v. Upjohn, 206 Cal. 775, 276 P. 341, 63 A. L. R. 408; State v. Wienrich, 54 Mont. 390, 170 P. 942; Commonwealth of Pennsylvania v. Liveright (Pa. 1932) 161 A. 697; State v. Nelson County, 1 N. D. 88, 45 N. W. 33, 8 L. R. A. 283, 26 Am. St. Rep. 609.

[11] Our conclusion is, therefore, that the city and county of San Francisco, acting through its board of supervisors, had power to issue the proposed bonds, and that the procedure followed was in accordance with all applicable laws. It is accordingly ordered that the writ issue directing respondent to place the measure upon the ballot for submission to the voters in the forthcoming election.

GIRDNER v. UNION OIL CO. OF CALIFORNIA et al.

Sac. 4686.

Supreme Court of California.

Aug. 9, 1932.

Rehearing Denied Sept. 8, 1932.

1. Negligence ⇐83.

Whether last clear chance doctrine applies depends on facts of particular case.

2. Negligence ⇐83.

In determining whether "last clear chance doctrine" applies, question is not whose negligence came first or last, but whose negligence was proximate cause of injury.

If plaintiff's so-called continuing negligence is proximate cause of injury, the doctrine does not apply, but if defendant is able to avoid injuring negligent plaintiff and negligently fails to do so, plaintiff's original though continuing negligence only remotely contributes to the injury and is not proximate cause thereof, and hence the applied doctrine by its own principles establishes plaintiff's right to recover notwithstanding fact that his original negligence would by its continuing nature bar recovery if doctrine were not applicable.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Last Clear Chance," see Words and Phrases.]

3. Negligence ⇐136(25).

Whether plaintiff's negligence is proximate or remote cause of injury is fact question in each particular case.

4. Negligence ⇐83.

Doctrine of "continuing negligence" has no application, unless negligence of plaintiff is proximate cause of injury.

5. Negligence ⇐83.

"Continuing negligence" rule does not apply where "last clear chance doctrine," by presence of its own elements, is brought into operation.

If all elements of "last clear chance doctrine" are present, and plaintiff's negligence becomes remote in causation, the doctrine applies; but if any one of elements of last clear chance doctrine is absent, plaintiff's negligence remains proximate cause and bars recovery under "continuous negligence rule."

6. Negligence ⇐83.

Contributory negligence does not bar recovery where "last clear chance doctrine" applies.

In order that "last clear chance doctrine" may apply, it must appear that plaintiff has been negligent and, as result thereof, is in position of danger from which he cannot escape by exercise of ordinary care, which includes cases not only where it is physically impossible for him to escape, but also where he is totally unaware of his danger; that defendant has knowledge of plaintiff's peril and knows, or in exercise of ordinary care should know, that plaintiff cannot escape from such situation; that defendant has last clear chance to avoid accident by exercising ordinary care; and that he fails to exercise such care and accident results thereby, and plaintiff is injured as proximate result of such failure.

7. Negligence ⇐83.

Defendant injuring another though able to prevent injury is not relieved of liability, though injured party, unaware of his peril, was brought into danger by own negligence.

Defendant is not privileged to injure another simply because he is negligently or otherwise in position of danger, and if he has opportunity of avoiding injury, he must at his peril exercise it under rule of "last clear chance."

8. Automobiles ⇐244(59).

Evidence and findings in motorist's action for intersectional collision with truck held to support application of last clear chance doctrine.

Facts found and supported by evidence were to the effect that plaintiff, in failing to look when crossing intersection, was contributorily negligent; that plaintiff did not know of approach of defendant's truck, and hence was unaware of danger; that driver of truck perceived that plaintiff was unconscious of peril he was in, and hence that plaintiff could not be relied upon to avert collision; that truck driver could have prevented collision had he arrested progress of truck or turned truck in time; but that, having such time, he negligently failed to do so until it was too late to avoid injury.

Appeal from a judgment awarding plaintiff $5,000 for personal injuries and $500 damages to his automobile, as the result of a collision between plaintiff's automobile and an oil truck owned by defendant Union Oil Company, and driven by defendant Elam. The case was tried by the court sitting without a jury.

[1] The sole question presented by the appeal is whether or not the facts in the case justify a recovery for plaintiff under the last clear chance doctrine. Appellant claims that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings and judgment. Primarily it may be stated that whether the doctrine is applicable in a given case depends entirely upon the existence or nonexistence of the elements necessary to bring it into operation, and this question is controlled by factual circumstances. Here there is evidence to show that the collision between the automobile driven by plaintiff and the truck belonging to defendant oil company and driven by defendant Elam, occurred at the intersection of Ferry street and the California state highway, in the town of Anderson, in Shasta county, on the 6th day of January, 1927, between 2 and 3 o'clock in the afternoon. Ferry street in the town of Anderson runs in an easterly and westerly direction, while the highway runs through said town in a northerly and southerly direction. The Southern Pacific Railroad lies east of and runs parallel with the highway. At the time of the collision, plaintiff was driving a touring car with side curtains. He was proceeding in a westerly direction on Ferry street across the highway. As he passed over the railroad track he was, due to the condition of the road, driving slowly at about 4 or 5 miles an hour. After crossing the railroad track he accelerated his speed to 12 or 15 miles an hour. Plaintiff testified that he looked to the north when 20 or 30 feet from the east side of the track and saw no cars approaching. He then looked south down the highway. He did not again look to the north but drove on to the highway, still looking to the south when the collision occurred. He further testified that he never saw the truck of defendant that day, either before or after the occurrence of the accident.

At the time of the collision and immediately prior thereto the truck was being operated by defendant Elam along the highway in a southerly direction. According to his testimony, Elam saw the plaintiff when he was about 50 feet north of the intersection. He testified that Girdner was traveling about 15 miles an hour and that at no time during the period in which he observed him did Girdner look in his direction; that he (Elam) took his foot off the gas accelerator and let the truck drift toward the intersection; that during the period of time his truck was so drifting the speed thereof was retarded about 3 miles an hour, so that he was traveling about 12 miles an hour; and that when he got about 15 feet from the point of collision he applied his brakes, and turned his truck to the right when about 4 or 5 feet from the point of collision.

Other witnesses variously estimated the speed at which Elam was traveling at from 15 to 30 miles an hour. The court found that he was proceeding at a rate of 20 miles. Elam admitted he did not sound his horn as he approached the intersection prior to the collision, nor did he give plaintiff any warning of his approach. The truck driven by Elam was 18 feet in length and about 5½ feet in width, weighing at the time, with its load, about 5 tons. There was evidence to show that it could be stopped according to the following speeds: 10 miles per hour, 8 to 10 feet; 15 miles per hour, 12 to 13 feet; 20 miles per hour, 20 feet; 25 miles per hour, 23 to 25 feet; 30 miles per hour, 34 or 35 feet.

By reason of the impact, plaintiff's car was shoved or skidded along the pavement in a southerly direction for a distance of from 15 to 20 feet. Skid marks on the pavement showed that the wheels of the truck skidded for a distance variously estimated at from 15 to 20 feet. As a result of the collision plaintiff suffered severe and permanent injuries, and his automobile was completely demolished.

In rendering judgment for the plaintiff, the trial court based its decision upon the last clear chance doctrine, and filed an opinion in the case in which it discussed the evidence. It found, in substance, that plaintiff failed to exercise ordinary care, and did not act as an ordinarily prudent person would have acted in the operation of his automobile when approaching an intersection, as he failed to look to the north, in which event he would have seen the truck that confronted him. In failing to look, it held plaintiff to be guilty of contributory negligence, barring his right to a recovery unless the doctrine of the last clear chance applied to the facts. It then found that the evidence clearly established the fact that when plaintiff approached and was proceeding across the path of the oil truck, and up to the time of the collision, he did not see and was totally oblivious of the approach of the truck, and the danger that confronted him; that defendant Elam first saw plaintiff's car some 40 or 50 feet away from the intersection; that he saw plaintiff looking straight ahead, in an opposite direction, and not slowing the speed of his automobile; that Elam was traveling at a speed of 20 miles an hour and could have stopped his truck almost immediately, and within a distance of a few feet; that he had ample time and sufficient distance, at least 25 to 35 feet, in which to stop and avoid coming in contact with plaintiff's car, but failed to do so. Accordingly, it applied the doctrine of the last clear chance to the facts of the case.

It is claimed on behalf of appellants that the doctrine of last clear chance has no application to a situation as here, where by mutual carelessness an injury ensues to one of two parties. In other words, the doctrine of last clear chance excludes from the operation of its underlying principle every case wherein it may be said that the negligence of the injured party was contemporaneous, concurrent, continuing, and contributory with the negligence of the party inflicting the injury, up to the very moment of the impact. Accordingly, it is claimed that the trial court had a misconception of the doctrine of last clear chance. In support of their claim appellants cite us to the doctrine announced in such cases as Everett v. Los Angeles, etc., Ry. Co., 115 Cal. 105, 43 P. 207, 46 P. 889, 34 L. R. A. 350; Lee v. Market Street Ry. Co., 135 Cal. 293, 67 P. 765; Young v. Southern Pacific Co., 182 Cal. 369, 190 P. 36; Rowe v. Southern California Ry. Co., 4 Cal. App. 1, 87 P. 220, where the continual negligence doctrine is announced. This doctrine is, like the doctrine of the last clear chance, based upon the particular facts of the case and is but a determination that the facts involved do not bring into operation the latter doctrine, but involve merely the ordinary and proximately contributory negligence which will bar recovery in any case. In other words, the doctrine as pronounced in the cases cited and relied upon generally, hold that the doctrine of last clear chance may not be invoked by a plaintiff to avoid his contributory negligence when the same has proximately contributed to his injury.

[2-7] The real issue in cases of the character here involved is not whose negligence came first or last, but whose negligence, however it came, was the proximate cause of the injury. Esrey v. Southern Pacific Co., 103 Cal. 541, 37 P. 500; Beach on Contributory Negligence, § 50.

Whether or not, therefore, negligence is the proximate or remote cause is, as above stated, a question of fact in each particular case. The doctrine of continuing negligence has no application unless the negligence is the proximate cause of the injury. On the other hand, if all the elements of the last clear chance doctrine are present and plaintiff's negligence becomes remote in causation, then this doctrine applies. If any one of the elements of the last clear chance doctrine is absent, then plaintiff's negligence remains the proximate cause and bars recovery. But the continuous negligence rule does not apply to a situation in which the last clear chance rule, by the presence of its own elements, is brought into operation. Where these necessary elements are lacking, courts have declared, and rightfully so, that plaintiff's negligence being continuous and contributory with that of defendant bars a recovery. The necessary elements, as deduced from the well-considered cases, may be stated in substance as follows: That plaintiff has been negligent and, as a result thereof, is in a position of danger from which he cannot escape by the exercise of ordinary care; and this includes not only where it is physically impossible for him to escape, but also in cases where he is totally unaware of his danger and for that reason unable to escape; that defendant has knowledge that the plaintiff is in such a situation, and knows, or in the exercise of ordinary care should know, that plaintiff cannot escape from such situation, and has the last clear chance to avoid the accident by exercising ordinary care, and fails to exercise the same, and the accident results thereby, and plaintiff is injured as the proximate result of such failure. It has been said that such failure by defendant to use ordinary care under such circumstances amounts to a degree of reckless conduct that may well be termed willful and wanton, and when an act is thus committed, contributory negligence upon the part of the person injured is not an element which will defeat a recovery. Esrey v. Southern Pacific Co., supra, at page 545 of 103 Cal., 37 P. 500.

We do not deem it necessary to review and discuss the numerous cases cited by appellants. The apparent confusion which exists in some of the decisions upon the subject arises in the application of the law to the facts, but as to the rule itself there is little or no confusion. It would be a strange case indeed, to say the least, that would declare it to be permissible to run down and injure one simply because he was in a position of peril of which he was unaware, without responding in damages for his willful act. Such, of course, is not the law. A defendant is never relieved of liability if he has it in his power to prevent the injury. This doctrine applies whether one is unaware of his peril by reason of his negligence, or when exercising ordinary care is so ignorant. In either situation the rule is the same. A defendant is not privileged to injure another simply because he is negligently or otherwise in a position of danger. If he has the opportunity of avoiding the injury, he must at his peril exercise it. The rule of the last clear chance means just what the words imply. A party who has the last chance to avoid the accident, notwithstanding the previous negligence of a plaintiff, is solely responsible. Townsend v. Butterfield, 168 Cal. 564, 143 P. 760; Harrington v. Los Angeles Ry. Co., 140 Cal. 514, 526, 74 P. 15, 63 L. R. A. 238, 98 Am. St. Rep. 85; Palmer v. Tschudy, 191 Cal. 696, 218 P. 36; Berguin v. Pacific Elec. Ry. Co., 203 Cal. 116, 263 P. 220; Darling v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 197 Cal. 702, 242 P. 703; Atkins v. Bouchet, 86 Cal. App. 294, 260 P. 828; O'Farrell v. Andrus, 86 Cal. App. 474, 260 P. 957; Smith et al. v. Los Angeles Ry., 105 Cal. App. 657, 288 P. 690.

The element of continual negligence is present in all last-chance cases. If defendant is not able to avoid injuring plaintiff in the exercise of ordinary care, the plaintiff's original negligence continues to be the proximate cause of his own injury, which bars recovery. If, on the other hand, defendant is able to avoid injuring the negligent plaintiff, and negligently fails to do so, plaintiff's original though continuing negligence only remotely contributes to the injury and is not the proximate cause thereof, and hence the applied doctrine, by its own principles, establishes the right of plaintiff to recover notwithstanding the fact that his original negligence would, by its continuing nature, bar a recovery if the doctrine were not applicable. To hold otherwise would be to dispute its existence.

The real question to be determined in considering cases of the character of the one here involved is whether or not the so-called continuing negligence is the proximate or remote cause of the injury, which question is determined by the application of the principles of the doctrine of the last clear chance itself. Stated in another way, contributory negligence of the party injured is not the proximate cause of the injury, as the negligence of the defendant being later it constitutes the sole proximate cause. Cady v. Sanford, 57 Cal. App. 218, 207 P. 45. When the doctrine applies, plaintiff's negligence becomes remote rather than proximate in causation. If it does not apply, his negligence remains proximate in its causation and will bar his recovery. If these principles are kept in view, no confusion should exist in their application to the facts of a given case. The principle underlying the last clear chance doctrine is that it is humane in its nature, and an exception to the ordinary rules underlying the defense of contributory negligence as laid down in Young v. Southern Pacific Co., supra, and other cases of similar character relied upon by appellants.

[8] It but remains to be seen whether all the elements of the applied doctrine are present in plaintiff's case. The findings were framed upon the facts as stated in the opinion of the court hereinabove recited. There was a conflict in the evidence upon all the material issues, as is usual in such cases, but there is ample evidence in the record to fully support the findings of the trial court, to the effect that plaintiff did not know of the approach of defendants' truck and hence was unaware of his danger; that defendant Elam perceived that plaintiff was unconscious of the peril he was in, and hence that plaintiff could not be relied upon to avert the collision; that Elam could have prevented the collision had he arrested the progress of his truck or turned the same in time, but having such time, he negligently failed to do so until too late to avoid the injury. The facts as found justified the court in applying the doctrine discussed.

The judgment is affirmed.

In determining whether "continuing negligence doctrine," rather than "last clear chance doctrine," applies, real issue is, not whose negligence came first or last, but whose negligence was proximate cause of injury.

Doctrine of "continuing negligence" has no application unless plaintiff's negligence is proximate cause of injury, but if all elements of doctrine of last clear chance are present and plaintiff's negligence becomes remote in causation, then "last clear chance" doctrine applies, but, if any of elements of such doctrine are lacking, plaintiff's negligence, being continuous and contributory with that of defendant, bars recovery.

Action for damages for personal injuries. At the conclusion of the trial the court granted a nonsuit. This is an appeal from the judgment.

Such of the facts as are necessary for a proper discussion of the case show that plaintiff was struck down and seriously injured by a taxicab owned by defendant Yellow Cab Company, and driven by defendant Foley. The accident occurred in the city of Los Angeles at a time when plaintiff was on the way to his office. He attempted to cross Seventh street from south to north at a point slightly west of the middle of the block lying between Broadway and Hill street. He was walking hurriedly. A line of automobiles was parked parallel to the south curb of Seventh street, about one foot from the curb. There were two lines of street car tracks in the center of Seventh street. As plaintiff emerged from between the automobiles, at a point seven feet from the southerly curb of Seventh street, he looked to the west in order to observe approaching traffic, and continued looking in that direction for the time it took him to travel two or three feet beyond the parked automobiles. He observed a car about fifty feet to the west that was slowly approaching alongside the line of parked automobiles. No other traffic being in sight in that direction, he continued at a brisk walk across the street in a slightly northeasterly direction, looking at the same time to the east to observe traffic approaching from that quarter. At this moment he was struck from the rear at a point on the street two or three feet south of the most southerly rail of the car tracks. He did not see the approach of the automobile that struck him. From plaintiff's location when he last looked to the west, to the point where the collision occurred, he traveled a distance of between ten and fifteen feet. The vehicle which struck him was an east bound yellow taxi, operated as above stated by defendant Foley, a driver in the employ of defendant Yellow Cab Company. Foley's automobile was traveling in second gear at a speed variously estimated from ten to fourteen miles an hour at the time when Foley first saw plaintiff. At this time plaintiff was about twenty feet distant from Foley's seat in the cab. Foley saw that plaintiff was looking in the opposite direction and was unaware of his approach. Foley attempted to stop the taxi by applying the foot brakes, which were of the two-wheel variety. He did not sound his horn, nor did he make any attempt to swerve the taxi in either direction to avoid striking plaintiff, although the whole left side of the street was clear, nor did he apply his emergency brake. It was upon this testimony that the trial court concluded, in granting the motion for a nonsuit, that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence which continued up to the very moment of the impact, for which reason he could not recover.

At the time the motion for a nonsuit was made, plaintiff's counsel stated to the trial court that he had tried and rested his case entirely upon the doctrine of the last clear chance. This being so, we will not consider or discuss the question of the sufficiency of the evidence to support a verdict in his favor upon the theory of negligence and absence of contributory negligence, but will deal with the case as to the sufficiency of the evidence under the doctrine of the last clear chance. In support of the judgment, respondents contend, as the trial judge held, that the evidence shows that plaintiff's negligence continued up to the moment of the injury and proximately contributed thereto, for which reason the doctrine invoked by appellant does not apply, and he therefore cannot recover. In making this contention, we are cited to cases of the character of Young v. Southern Pacific Co., 182 Cal. 369, 190 P. 36, which declare the continual negligence doctrine, and hold that the last clear chance doctrine may not be invoked by a plaintiff to avoid his contributory negligence where the same has proximately contributed to his injury.

[1-3] This doctrine is not necessarily controlling in the instant case. The real issue in cases of this character is not whose negligence came first or last, but rather whose negligence, however it came, was the proximate cause of the injury. Whether or not, therefore, negligence is the proximate or remote cause, depends upon the facts of the particular case. The doctrine of continuing negligence has no application unless the negligence is the proximate cause of the injury. If all the elements of the doctrine of the last clear chance are present and plaintiff's negligence becomes remote in causation, then the doctrine applies. If, on the other hand, any of the elements of the doctrine are lacking, courts have declared, and rightfully so, that plaintiff's negligence being continuous and contributory with that of defendant bars a recovery. But a defendant is never relieved of liability if he has it in his power to prevent injuring another, and this is so whether one is unaware of his peril by reason of his negligence or not.

[4] The rule of the last clear chance means just what the words imply, namely, if one has the opportunity of avoiding the injury, he must at his peril exercise it. Townsend v. Butterfield, 168 Cal. 564, 143 P. 760; Palmer v. Tschudy, 191 Cal. 696, 218 P. 36. As above stated, the real question to be determined in cases of this character is whether or not the so-called continuing negligence is the proximate or remote cause of the injury. If the elements of the last clear chance doctrine are present, and the doctrine applies, the contributory negligence of the party injured is not the proximate cause, as the negligence of defendant, being later, constitutes the sole proximate cause. Here there was evidence which tended to show that defendant could have avoided the injury. He saw plaintiff and knew he was unaware of his peril, yet he neither sounded his horn, nor did he apply his emergency brake, nor did he attempt to swerve his car to avoid injuring the plaintiff although he had every opportunity so to do. This evidence should have been submitted to the jury, and the trial court committed error in granting the nonsuit. The identical question here involved is fully discussed and decided in Girdner v. Union Oil Company of California (Cal. Sup.) 13 P.(2d) 915, this day decided, where the authorities are reviewed.

Upon the authority of that case the judgment herein is reversed.

Action by A. J. Barr and another against Henry B. Ream. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal.

Carr & Kennedy, of Redding, L. N. Lorenzen, of Mt. Shasta, and Horace V. Ley, of Yreka, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

This is an appeal by plaintiff from a judgment of the superior court of Siskiyou county in an action to determine certain water rights. Three tracts of land are involved in the action. Plaintiffs' upper tract, about 15 acres in extent, was acquired by them in 1912 from the Sisson Tavern Company. South of it lies 146 acres belonging to defendant. South of that lies plaintiffs' lower tract of 73 acres. A water course known as Cold creek enters the southwesterly portion of plaintiffs' upper tract, flows through it in a southwesterly direction, and thence through the land of defendant, but does not enter plaintiffs' lower tract. A ditch known as Barr ditch taps Cold creek at about the entrance onto plaintiffs' upper tract, and proceeds in an almost southerly direction through said tract, then through the land of defendant, and finally upon the lower tract of plaintiffs. Although some other issues were presented at the trial, the case on appeal is concerned solely with the rights of the parties in the waters of Cold creek and Barr ditch. The trial court found that the ditch was built by plaintiffs in 1904, prior to the time of their acquisition of title to the upper tract, and under permission of the then owners of said tract; that defendant permitted plaintiffs to divert water over his land in said ditch, to the extent that such water was not used by defendant or his tenants; that previously defendant and his predecessors had an easement for a right of way over a portion of plaintiffs' upper tract to divert water from Cold creek, and that it was agreed between the parties that defendant should abandon his said easement and instead make use of Barr ditch for said purpose; that for more than five years prior to the commencement of this action, defendant has used Barr ditch adversely to plaintiffs and has an easement in it to take the waters of Cold creek for irrigation on his land, with the exception of two miners' inches awarded to plaintiffs under their riparian right.

Plaintiffs appeal on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the findings. They contend that defendant has not acquired a prescriptive right to divert water through Barr ditch, and that plaintiffs have acquired such a right to thirty inches of water. They point to evidence showing continuous use for many years by plaintiffs, save where defendant or his tenants temporarily interrupted said use. On the other hand, defendant contends and the court found that the use was always permissive, and that defendant always asserted his right to the water and only gave up such quantity to plaintiffs as he was himself unable to use. The amount of water has greatly decreased in recent years and this explains the difficulties that have arisen between the parties.

[1] Our study of the record satisfies us that there is sufficient evidence to support the findings and judgment. The testimony is in substantial conflict, but it would be difficult to arrive at any view contrary to that of the trial court since it definitely appears that on repeated occasions defendant or his tenants interrupted plaintiffs' use, and sometimes took all of the available water.

[2] Plaintiffs also contend that they are entitled to the amount of water claimed on the theory of a permission to take the same, followed by expenditures in reliance thereon, resulting in an irrevocable license or easement. We find no satisfactory evidence in the record to justify the application of this doctrine. On the contrary, it appears that defendant gave plaintiffs permission to use only the excess water, and that the amount claimed by plaintiffs was claimed adversely, according to the evidence presented on their behalf, and not under a parol license.

No purpose would be served by an extensive review of the evidence. We are satisfied with the conclusions of the trial court on all of the issues.

The judgment is affirmed.

EL DORADO IRR. DIST. v. BROWNE, District Treasurer (LUSE et al., Interveners).

S. F. 14431.

Supreme Court of California.

Aug. 29, 1932.

As Modified Sept. 19, 1932.

1. Waters and water courses ⇐224, 230(1).

Legislature has plenary power over irrigation districts and may form them and permit them to issue bonds, without election (Deering's Gen. Laws 1931, Act 3854).

While Legislature has such right, the right to vote on bond issues has been given electors of districts by California Irrigation Act (Deering's Gen. Laws 1931, Act 3854).

2. Waters and water courses ⇐228.

Irrigation district's board may, even after election at which bonds are voted, make substantial changes in plan of proposed project (Deering's Gen. Laws 1931, Act 3854, §§ 30, 30b).

3. Waters and water courses ⇐228.

Publication and distribution of informal report of plan for irrigation works held not to limit powers of irrigation district's board to make substantial changes in plan after bond election (Deering's Gen. Laws 1931, Act 3854, §§ 30, 30b).

4. Evidence ⇐65.

Electors at bond election vote with presumed knowledge of powers of irrigation district's board to make substantial changes in plan after election (Deering's Gen. Laws 1931, Act 3854, §§ 30, 30b).

5. Waters and water courses ⇐228.

Resolution of irrigation district's board, notice of bond election, and proposition placed upon ballot, framed in general terms, held not to preclude board from changing plan after bond election (Deering's Gen. Laws 1931, Act 3854, §§ 30, 30b).

Proposition on ballot was whether bonds of district in certain amount should be issued for purpose of constructing and purchasing necessary irrigation canals, pipes, pipe lines, dams, reservoirs, weirs, and works, and acquiring necessary property and rights therefor, and for purpose of acquiring water, water rights, reservoirs, reservoir sites, and other property necessary for purpose of the irrigation and otherwise carrying out provisions of an act under which the district was organized.

PER CURIAM.

This is a petition by El Dorado irrigation district for a writ of mandate to compel respondent, its treasurer, to pay a warrant drawn upon the construction fund of the district. Upon the hearing in this matter an order of reference was made and findings of fact were prepared by the referee, Hon. Peter J. Shields, judge of the superior court. From these findings, the essential undisputed facts appear as follows: Pursuant to section 30 of the California Irrigation Act (Deering's Gen. Laws 1931, vol. 2, p. 1948, Act 3854), the district employed S. J. Norris, an engineer, to prepare plans for irrigation works. Upon the rendition of his report, the board of directors estimated that the sum of $1,300,000 would be necessary to carry out the project. The report and estimate were submitted to the bond certification commission (now the California districts securities commission), composed of the Attorney General, state engineer, and superintendent of banks, as required by section 30a of the Irrigation Act. The commission gave its approval, and on January 20, 1927, the board called a special election at which the bonds were voted. Thereafter $600,000 worth of bonds were sold, the proceeds placed in the construction fund, and the money expended.

On December 20, 1928, a supplemental engineering report was submitted by Norris, approved by the directors and by the bond certification commission. This report made certain changes in the original plan of construction embodied in the first report. Thereafter, an additional issue of $350,000 worth of bonds was sold, and construction was continued under the modified plan. Various expenditures were made and obligations were incurred.

On November 25, 1930, an action was commenced by Matthew Murray, a taxpayer of the district, on behalf of himself and other taxpayers, to enjoin further construction, on the ground that the district had no power to change the plans after the bonds had been voted. This action was subsequently dismissed by the plaintiff and a new action was filed, in which a demurrer was sustained and dismissal entered after failure of the plaintiff to amend.

One of the contracts made by the district in carrying out the modified plan was with the Pelton Water Wheel Company. A balance of $403.80 being due under said contract, a claim was presented to and approved by the directors, and a warrant drawn, directing the respondent treasurer to pay the sum. Because of doubts as to the validity of the proceedings, he refused to do so. Because of similar doubts, the general contractor on March 13, 1931, refused to continue performance. There being no litigation then pending by which a speedy determination of the issue could be had, the district sought the remedy by application for mandate to this court. Matthew Murray and John L. Luse, as taxpayers, intervened and filed briefs in opposition to the petition.

The single question which is presented to us is whether the district had the power to use the funds derived from the sale of the bonds in accordance with a plan which differed substantially from that upon which the original estimate was based. It is conceded that changes in minor details are permissible, but as will hereinafter appear, the differences between the original and modified plan are substantial. It should be noted, however, that the record contains no suggestion of fraud, the changes having been made in good faith, in the belief that they were advantageous to the district.

It is contended by interveners that the modified plan is in effect an abandonment of the original project. This is not borne out by the facts. The first engineering report contemplated the purchase of a system of laterals, dam, and reservoir of El Dorado Water Corporation; enlargement of the laterals and perfection of a water supply for the city of Placerville; storage of water from the Consumnes river by the construction of a reservoir at Sly park in Hazel Valley; and construction of an auxiliary dam to increase the stored water. The second report recommended the same purchase of the El Dorado Water Corporation system, the lateral enlargement and the municipal water supply, but postponed the construction of the reservoir at Sly park and instead provided for the enlargement of a storage reservoir at Weber creek, included in the system purchased from the water corporation. The changes are considerable, but there is no basis for the conclusion that the Sly park reservoir has been abandoned and an entirely new development entered upon. The Sly park and the Weber creek storage are provided for in both plans, the differences being in the priority of development and the proportion of water to be secured from each.

[1] In considering the authority of the district and its directors, it should be remembered that the legislative power over such districts is plenary, and that they might be formed and permitted to issue bonds without any vote of the electorate at all. There is no constitutional right of residents of such a district to vote on bond issues. In re Bonds of San Joaquin Irr. Dist., 161 Cal. 345, 119 P. 198; Los Angeles Flood Control Dist. v. Hamilton, 177 Cal. 119, 169 P. 1028. This right is, however, given to the electors by the California Irrigation Act.

[2] A brief examination of the statute and the cases will show that the board had power to make the changes. The most important decision is Board of Directors of Modesto Irr. Dist. v. Tregea, 88 Cal. 334, 26 P. 237, where bonds were issued under the Wright Act, St. 1887, p. 29, as amended (the predecessor of the present Irrigation Act) to carry out a plan to bring water from the Stanislaus river to irrigate 108,000 acres of land, and after the bonds were voted, the plan was changed to provide for securing the water from the Tuolumne river for a lesser acreage. The court held that the change could properly be made. The conclusion of this case clearly governs us here, unless it has been limited by later decisions or legislation. In fact, however, it has never been overruled or nullified by statute. In Cullen v. Glendora Water Co., 113 Cal. 503, 39 P. 769, 45 P. 822, 824, 1047, the court said of the Tregea Case: "* * * We held that the authority to issue bonds is not so bound up with the preliminary plans as to sources of supply, upon which the estimate is based, that the proceeds of a valid issue of bonds cannot be used to carry out a modified plan, if the change is deemed advantageous." Subsequent legislation tends to strengthen, rather than weaken, this view. At the time these cases were decided, the statute did not specifically require that a plan be prepared prior to the bond election. The Cullen Case nevertheless held that such a plan was necessary as the basis for an estimate of the amount of bonds to be voted. Subsequent to that time, in 1913, the statute was amended (St. 1913, p. 993) to make express provision for a preliminary plan, but neither at this or any later period was any limitation placed upon the board in the matter of changes. On the contrary, the existence of such a power in the board was recognized by the 1917 amendment to section 30b of the act (St. 1917, p. 762), which requires the approval of the bond certification commission to any changes. The said amendment reads as follows: "* * * Provided, further, that if any district shall issue bonds to carry out any plans approved by said irrigation district bond commission as herein provided it shall be unlawful for said district to make any material change in said plans thereafter without the consent of said commission." The futility of limiting the exercise of a nonexistent power indicates that the power really did exist; and the failure to abrogate the rule of the Tregea Case is still more persuasive. We conclude that an irrigation district may, under the existing law, make substantial changes in the plan of a proposed project, after the election at which bonds are voted.

[3-5] It is urged by interveners that the resolution of the board, the notice of the election, and the proposition placed upon the ballot incorporated the plan of the first engineering report so as to make any subsequent change a violation of a contract with the electors, and emphasis is also placed upon the publicity given the original report, which was distributed among the voters of the district. It is clear that the publication and distribution of such an informal report cannot be deemed to limit the statutory powers of the board. The electors vote with presumed knowledge of those powers. Los Angeles County Flood Control Dist. v. Wright (Cal. Sup.) 2 P.(2d) 168. As to the resolution, notice, and ballot, inspection discloses that they were framed in general terms. The proposition on the ballot read as follows: "Shall bonds of El Dorado Irrigation District, in the amount of one million three hundred thousand ($1,300,000.00) dollars be issued for the purpose of constructing and purchasing the necessary irrigation canals, pipes, pipe lines, dams, reservoirs, weirs, and works, and acquiring the necessary property and rights therefor, and for the purpose of acquiring water, water rights, reservoirs, reservoir sites and other property necessary for the purpose of El Dorado Irrigation District and otherwise carrying out the provisions of an Act of the Legislature of the State of California, entitled 'An Act to provide for the organization and government of irrigation districts, and to provide for the acquisition and construction thereby of works for the irrigation of lands embraced within such districts, and also to provide for the distribution of water for irrigation purposes', and all acts amendatory thereof, under which Act El Dorado Irrigation District was organized." While the district may, by the form of the proposition, limit itself to a particular plan, no such limitation may be implied from a statement as broad and general as that involved herein. See County of Alameda v. Garrison, 108 Cal. App. 122, 291 P. 464; O'Farrell v. County of Sonoma, 189 Cal. 343, 208 P. 117; Williams v. City of Stockton, 195 Cal. 743, 235 P. 986.

No other points require discussion. The board had the power to proceed under the modified plan, and the obligations incurred thereunder were valid. Respondent's refusal to pay the warrant is therefore unjustified.

It is ordered that a peremptory writ of mandate issue, directing respondent to pay the sum stated in the above-mentioned warrant.

SHENK, J.

This is an appeal from a judgment for the plaintiff in an action for damages for personal injuries.

The plaintiff's injuries were the result of a collision between a passenger bus operated by the defendant company and a Ford automobile operated by Raymond P. McAlister, a minor. The defendants G. N. McAlister and Beatrix McAlister are husband and wife and are the parents of the minor. The parents were sued because of the negligence imputed to them upon their assumption of liability in the issuance of an operator's license to the minor son pursuant to the provisions of the California Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 532, § 62). The trial court, sitting without a jury, found for the plaintiff and entered judgment against the defendant corporation and the defendant parents. The McAlisters have not appealed and the judgment against them has become final. The corporation is the sole appealing defendant.

The collision occurred about 8 o'clock a. m. on October 14, 1927. The bus was traveling in an easterly direction on Carlyle street at its intersection with Tenth street in the city of Santa Monica. The bus had stopped at the southwest corner of the intersection to discharge a passenger. The driver of the bus, Earl Dawes, then started the bus, entered the intersection, and when it reached approximately the center thereof was traveling at a speed variously estimated at from seven to twelve miles per hour. It was then struck by the Ford car just behind the left front fender of the bus. The bus stopped almost instantly. The speed limit applicable to the Ford at this point was fifteen miles per hour and it was being operated at the time of the collision at the rate of from twenty-two to twenty-five miles an hour. The minor testified that he did not see the bus until he was about three feet from it, owing to the fact that he was looking eastwardly at the time.

In the complaint negligence in general terms was charged. It was stipulated at the trial that the plaintiff was a passenger for hire on the bus at the time of the accident; that the bus was owned by the defendant corporation; that Earl Dawes was the driver of the bus at the time; and that he, as the employee of the corporation, was acting as such within the scope of his employment. The plaintiff then proved the extent of her injuries, which were serious, and produced evidence which showed the manner in which the bus was operated at the time of the collision and further showed the details of the operation of the Ford car by the minor. This evidence, beyond question, proved negligence on the part of the driver of the Ford car. Based on his negligence the judgment was rendered against his parents. The driver of the bus was not produced as a witness by either party and no showing was made by the defendant corporation, or otherwise, that the driver of the bus could not have avoided the accident except by inference and conclusions drawn from the evidence of the facts above stated, and particularly from the evidence which showed in detail the conduct of the driver of the Ford car.

As to the defendant corporation the trial court, on the showing made, applied the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur. Whether this rule was correctly applied to the facts forms the principal basis of the controversy on the appeal.

[1, 2] It is not disputed that the burden was on the plaintiff to prove her cause of action against all the defendants by evidence sufficient to entitle her to recover. As to the bus company, under the pleadings, a prima facie case was established when the plaintiff proved that she was being carried as a passenger on the bus and that the injury was caused by the manner in which said defendant used or directed the instrumentality under its control. Connor v. Atchison, etc., Ry. Co., 189 Cal. 1, 207 P. 378, 26 A. L. R. 1462; McCurrie v. Southern Pacific Co., 122 Cal. 558, 55 P. 324; Osgood v. Los Angeles, etc., Co., 137 Cal. 280, 70 P. 169, 92 Am. St. Rep. 171. It was the duty of the carrier to exercise "the utmost care and diligence for their safe carriage" of the plaintiff (section 2100, Civ. Code), and upon showing that she was a passenger and was injured while being carried as such, a presumption of negligence arose, as to which it was incumbent on the carrier to show that it was free from negligence. Scarborough v. Urgo, 191 Cal. 341, 216 P. 584. We have no hesitancy in saying that the plaintiff produced proof entitling her to invoke the doctrine contended for by her.

The evidence offered by the defendant corporation to rebut the presumption consisted in the main in proving the negligence of the driver of the Ford car as to which all parties have agreed. As noted, the driver of the bus was not a witness and his employer offered no proof the effect of which would show that the driver could not have avoided the collision by the exercise of due caution. In the presence of the presumption it cannot be said as a matter of law that the trial court erroneously applied the doctrine.

[3] But the defendant corporation insists that the evidence of the conduct in detail of the driver of the Ford car, and particularly that produced by the plaintiff removed the case from the application of the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur, and that such proof showed the collision to be due solely to the negligence of the driver of the Ford car. We cannot agree. The plaintiff was confronted with a situation where, in charging concurrent negligence, she was entitled to the application of the doctrine upon proof of her status as a passenger on the bus while the same was being operated by the bus company and the resultant injury from such operation. But as to McAlister, she was bound to prove his negligence by a preponderance of the evidence without the aid of the presumption. This she could not do except by proving the particular acts which constituted such negligence. By producing such proof it should not be held that she waived or forfeited her right to invoke the doctrine as to the defendant's carrying her as a passenger. Kilgore v. Brown, 90 Cal. App. 555, 560, 266 P. 297.

[4] Another point made by the bus company is that, assuming the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur to be applicable, the plaintiff has failed to sustain the burden of proving negligence on the part of the company by a preponderance of the evidence. The argument is grounded on certain language in Scarborough v. Urgo, supra, where, in discussing the effect of the presumption arising under the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur, the court said at page 346 of 191 Cal., 216 P. 584, 586: "Such a presumption is evidence in the case, but it has no greater or different effect than the testimony of witnesses, and in no degree changes the rule as to the burden of proof, viz. the burden of producing a preponderance of evidence." The language just quoted as a correct statement of the law need not be questioned. But it does not follow therefrom that where there is no proof, or where, as here, there is insufficient proof, to rebut the prima facie showing contemplated in the application of the doctrine, such showing, supplemented by the presumption, would not constitute proof by a preponderance of the evidence.

The judgment is affirmed.

Edwin H. Williams, of San Francisco, for respondents Mary T. Dollard and Chester A. Kelly.

CURTIS, J.

This action was brought by the plaintiff against her brother and two sisters for a decree declaring that certain personal property in her possession was held by her in trust for herself and her said brother and sisters, and asking that distribution thereof be made in accordance with the terms of said trust. The defendant Annie A. Scanlon is sued not only in her individual capacity but as the administratrix of the estate of Annie A. Kelly, deceased. The parties to this action are the surviving children of the said Annie A. Kelly, deceased. The plaintiff was the youngest of the four children and lived with and cared for her mother up to the time of the death of the latter. The property of the alleged trust formerly belonged to the said Annie A. Kelly. It consists of a deposit of money in a San Francisco bank in an amount slightly in excess of $14,000, and certain articles of jewelry, a shawl, and a couple of watches. The mother died in January, 1930, and was 91 years of age at the time of her death. The plaintiff testified that "in July, she [the mother] delivered her jewelry, personal jewelry. She brought in a box and handed it to me and said, 'I want to give these to you in trust.' And she also had a paper, and on that paper she had stated exactly as she wanted it distributed. And she told me to put that in the safe deposit box with these papers, and keep it there until she died, and when she died to distribute it exactly as it was stipulated in the paper. * * * It was a diamond bar pin, an emerald and ruby bar pin, emerald earrings surrounded by diamonds, and a white crepe shawl, a gentleman's watch and a lady's watch." The paper referred to by the witness was admitted in evidence. It was dated July 26, 1919. The date, however, was placed thereon, according to plaintiff's evidence, by herself at the time it was given to her by her mother. The paper is as follows:

"San Francisco, July 26, 1919.

"I hereby give, grant, transfer and deliver to my daughter Annie A. Scanlon, my pair of emerald screw earrings, consisting of emeralds surrounded by diamonds, also one small diamond of my bar pin; the other small diamond of the same bar pin I give to my daughter Mary T. Dollard; and the large center diamond of the same bar pin, including the setting I give to my daughter, Laura A. Kelly. I give to my daughter Mary T. Dollard my bar pin consisting of rubies and emeralds, also my white crepe shawl. All the rest of my jewelry, watches, et cetera, I die possessed of, I bequeath to my daughter, Laura A. Kelly.

"[Signed] Annie A. Kelly."

Plaintiff further testified that she took the box from her mother containing the jewelry and watches and deposited it in her safe deposit box and kept it there until the death of her mother. The crepe shawl was left in the house where the mother and plaintiff resided.

In regard to the money on deposit in the bank, the plaintiff stated that on January 1, 1926, as she was preparing to go to the bank to have the interest entered in the bank book, her mother said to her: "Well, now, I have disposed of the jewelry and the real estate by gift deed, now I want to arrange about this money. I will not draw any more from the bank account unless it is absolutely necessary, and if anything happens to me this will pay the sickness or funeral expenses when I die, and the residue in that book—what is left in it, should be divided share and share alike amongst the four children." To this statement by her mother the plaintiff replied: "Very well, I will do that." The bank account referred to is the one involved herein. It then stood, and for some years prior thereto had stood, in the name of the plaintiff. After this date it remained in plaintiff's name until her mother's death. Nothing was drawn from this account during that period except that on or about February 17, 1927, the plaintiff, at the request of her mother, drew $1,000 therefrom, and loaned it to Mrs. Scanlon, who gave her note for that amount, made out in favor of the plaintiff. On the death of the mother the plaintiff called together her brother and two sisters and explained fully to them the disposition the mother had made of the bank deposit and the jewelry. All appeared satisfied with the arrangement their mother had made concerning the disposition of her property, and appeared to acquiesce therein. A few days thereafter Mrs. Scanlon made objections to her mother's plan of disposing of her property, had herself appointed administratrix of her mother's estate, and instituted proceedings to compel the plaintiff to account for said property in the probate court. Thereupon the plaintiff instituted this action for the purpose of having a trust declared and the property distributed according to its terms. Mrs. Scanlon, her brother, Chester A. Kelly, and her sister, Mary T. Dollard, were all made defendants herein. Mr. Kelly and Mrs. Dollard appeared in the action and by answer joined with the plaintiff in asking the court to sustain their mother's plan of disposing of said property and to decree distribution thereof in accordance with said plan. Mrs. Scanlon, however, individually and as administratrix of her mother's estate, answered plaintiff's complaint, and denied that her mother had made any transfer of said property, or any part thereof in trust, or otherwise, to the plaintiff, and asked for a decree of court compelling plaintiff to turn over and deliver all of said property to her as administratrix. Upon the trial the court found upon all issues in favor of the plaintiff, and entered a decree in plaintiff's favor as prayed for in her complaint. From this decree the defendant Scanlon has appealed. Her sole contention is that the findings are not supported by the evidence, and particularly that the evidence does not justify or warrant the finding that a trust has been created.

In the first place, the record before us does not show any evidence directly contradicting that given by the plaintiff and recited above. No person, other than the plaintiff and her mother, was present on the occasions when the conversations which we have detailed were had between the mother and daughter. There is some slight evidence on defendant Scanlon's part that the mother was seen wearing some of said jewelry after the time plaintiff testified that it had been given into her keeping. This was satisfactorily explained by plaintiff, and as the trial court accepted her explanation the matter is not one of concern to this court. Regarding the bank deposit, no attempt was made at the trial to show that the facts regarding its disposition were any different than as testified to by plaintiff.

[1, 2] The evidence, in our opinion, was beyond doubt sufficient to sustain the finding that the property in controversy was conveyed to the plaintiff in trust, both as to the jewelry and other property delivered to the plaintiff on July 26, 1919, and the bank deposit later transferred to the plaintiff. The evidence shows that the mother during the latter years of her life owned other property, both real and personal. This property she had divided among her children by gift deeds and other like conveyances. She was somewhat fearful of wills, and evidently decided to make final disposition of her property by other methods. The box containing the jewelry and watches was delivered to the plaintiff to place the same in a safe deposit box and to distribute them in accordance with certain instructions, which were also in the box. These written instructions plainly indicate that the property was to be distributed on the death of Mrs. Kelly. These instructions speak for themselves, and it is not necessary for us to specify the particular words or language contained therein indicating such intention. Appellant concedes this by her claim that they express a testamentary intention rather than a direction that the trustees make distribution of the property mentioned. There might be some merit in this claim if we consider the writing alone, but when taken in connection with the act and conduct of Mrs. Kelly in delivering the property described therein to her daughter with directions to hold and then to distribute it in accordance with the writing, the transaction as a whole possesses all the elements of a voluntary trust in personal property. Civ. Code, §§ 2221, 2222. The question is raised as to whether the crepe shawl ever passed out of the possession of Mrs. Kelly and into the possession of the plaintiff prior to the death of Mrs. Kelly. The trial court held that it did. Whether the trial court was warranted in so holding or whether it was not, this court would hardly be justified in disturbing the decree in this case for any such error, if any error were made.

[3, 4] Passing on to the bank deposit, which is by far, in point of monetary value, the principal and most substantial portion of the property involved, we find the evidence equally conclusive. This deposit had been placed by Mrs. Kelly in plaintiff's name some time in 1922, where it remained until Mrs. Kelly's death. It was designated as "Laura A. Kelly, Special." It was in this condition, in the possession of Laura A. Kelly on January 1, 1926, when her mother gave directions regarding its final disposition, which were that after the payment of certain expenses, including her funeral expenses, the residue was to "be divided share and share alike amongst the four children." Under the decisions of this state, the acts of the parties above recited were sufficient to create a trust in the money deposited in the name of "Laura A. Kelly, Special." Hellman v. McWilliams, 70 Cal. 449, 11 P. 659; Booth v. Oakland Bank of Savings, 122 Cal. 19, 54 P. 370; Thomas v. Lamb, 11 Cal. App. 717, 106 P. 254. The fact that in 1927, under the directions of Mrs. Kelly, the plaintiff drew $1,000 from this fund did not alter the trust character of the balance remaining in the account. Hellman v. McWilliams, supra.

The judgment and decree is affirmed.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; K. S. Mahon, Judge.

Action by the Hibernia Savings & Loan Society against the Ellis Estate Company and others. From an order vacating an order appointing a receiver and directing him to pay over to defendants the moneys collected by him, plaintiff appeals. Motion to dismiss the appeal.

WASTE, C. J.

The appellant, plaintiff in this action to foreclose a mortgage, on the same day that it filed the complaint, filed an affidavit in support of an application for an order appointing a receiver. Acting solely upon such affidavit, and without examination of the complaint or other evidence, the court made its ex parte order appointing a receiver, with the powers and duties usually incident to such a receivership. The defendants, respondents here, moved the court to discharge the receiver and to rescind the order appointing him. The court granted the motion. It rescinded the order of appointment, and directed the receiver to pay over to the defendants the moneys collected by him on the ground that the order was void, in that the appointment was made inadvertently and without sufficient cause. From this order the plaintiff has appealed. Respondents move to dismiss the appeal, and for an affirmance of the order vacating the appointment of the receiver upon the ground that no appeal lies from such an order.

[1, 2] It is provided in section 963, subd. 2, of the Code of Civil Procedure, that an appeal may be taken from an order appointing a receiver; but no appeal is provided from an order setting aside and vacating an order appointing a receiver. The order here appealed from is not one made after judgment. It is a general rule that orders relating to vacation of orders cannot be made the subject of direct appeal unless they themselves be of a class of orders designated by the Code as appealable. See Luckenbach v. Laer, 190 Cal. 395, 396, 212 P. 918. But appellant contends that the order here appealed from is a final judgment, in that it amounts to a final determination of a collateral matter distinct from the general subject of litigation—a judgment that is conclusive of a question in the case, and final as to that question. 2 Cal. Jur., p. 144, § 21. An order vacating an order appointing a receiver, and directing him to pay over the money collected by him has the effect of discharging the receiver; and this is so although it does not so provide in terms. While the receiver is an indifferent person as between the parties, and is appointed in behalf of all who may establish rights in the cause, the plaintiff, at whose request the receiver was appointed, having asserted a reasonable probability of being ultimately entitled to a decree in the action, is interested in having the receivership continued, in order that the property and its issues and profits may be preserved.

[3] Therefore, it would seem that the order vacating the order appointing the receiver and directing him to pay the money collected by him over to the defendants, which order, in effect, amounts to a discharge of the receiver, is of such finality on that phase of the case as to be appealable as a final judgment within the meaning of section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Los Angeles v. Los Angeles City Water Co., 134 Cal. 121, 66 P. 198; Anglo-Californian Bank v. Superior Court, 153 Cal. 753, 756, 96 P. 803.

The motion to dismiss the appeal is denied.

PRESTON, J. (dissenting).

This is an action to foreclose a mortgage on a business block in Marysville. The amount claimed to be due thereon is $67,000. Plaintiff, on an affidavit made upon information and belief, asserted the property to be of a value less than the debt and costs, and procured an ex parte order on October 30, 1931, appointing a receiver. On November 13th thereafter, defendants gave notice that on November 25th they would move the court for an order vacating the order appointing a receiver upon the ground that it had been improvidently entered; said notice being supported by affidavits showing the property to be of a value in excess of $100,000. This motion was heard on the day named, and the defendants produced several witnesses to prove that the property was in fact of the value of in excess of $100,000. Plaintiff attempted, but wholly failed, to rebut any of this evidence. Thereupon, and on November 27th, less than thirty days from the date of the original order, the court gave its order revoking the receivership appointment.

There is no showing whatever that would have justified the appointment of a receiver. The receiver himself is not attempting to appeal. Plaintiff only seeks this right. No property right of plaintiff, however, has been invaded or adjudicated. The court is perfectly free to render an unrestricted decree upon the merits of the cause. If it be conceded that the order is appealable, it should be affirmed upon the ground that the appeal therefrom is frivolous, as the matter was discretionary, and there is no evidence whatever of an abuse of discretion.

But, in my opinion, the order is not appealable. It is not mentioned in section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It is merely interlocutory, and settles no right of either party nor of the receiver. There might be peculiar circumstances under which an order discharging a receiver or revoking his appointment might have in it the essence of a judgment, but the one here before us certainly contains no such ingredient. The cases cited in the majority opinion are not at all analogous to the situation here. Los Angeles v. Los Angeles City Water Co., 134 Cal. 121, 66 P. 198, was a contest over the settlement of the account of a receiver, and the order directed the payment of his compensation by one of the parties. There was an appeal from it by the party required to pay said compensation and by the receiver also. Manifestly there was in such case a determination of final property rights of the parties, and an appeal was properly allowed. In the other case, Anglo-Californian Bank v. Superior Court, 153 Cal. 753, 96 P. 803, there was involved a contest between the plaintiff bank and the receiver as to whether or not the receiver was entitled to certain funds claimed by third parties. The decision of the court was that the plaintiff pay to the receiver the said funds so claimed by others. There was, of course, in such situation, a final adjudication of property rights, and an appeal was properly allowed.

The general principles governing the situation before us have been well set forth in the case of Title Ins. & Trust Co. v. Calif., etc., Co., 159 Cal. 484, 486, 487, 114 P. 838, 839, where the court reviews the history of orders appointing receivers under the Practice Act and under the Code of Civil Procedure, and declares: "It is well settled by the decisions of this court that no appeal can be taken from an interlocutory order unless the order be designated by statute as one of those from which an appeal may be taken. Such was the rule under the Constitution of 1849 and the Practice Act (Allender v. Fritts, 24 Cal. 447; Myers v. Mott, 29 Cal. 359, 89 Am. Dec. 49), and the same conclusion has been reached in cases arising since the adoption of the Constitution of 1879 and the enactment of the Code of Civil Procedure. Thus, in Illinois Trust & Savings Bank v. Alvord, 99 Cal. 410, 33 P. 1133, the court said that 'the only interlocutory or intermediate orders from which a separate appeal can be prosecuted are those enumerated in subdivision 3 of section 939 of the Code of Civil Procedure.' See, also, Rochat v. Gee, 91 Cal. 356, 27 P. 670. Upon the same ground it was held that, prior to the amendment of 1897 to said section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure (St. 1897, p. 209), there was no right of appeal from an interlocutory order appointing a receiver. French Bank Case, 53 Cal. 495; Emeric v. Alvarado, 64 Cal. 529, 622, 2 P. 418. In the case at bar the appellant seeks to appeal from an order (made before judgment) vacating a prior order appointing a receiver. An order appointing a receiver is, since the amendment of 1897 (St. 1897, c. 151), to section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the subject of direct appeal. The statute does not, however, authorize an appeal from an order refusing to vacate the appointment of a receiver. It would seem clear, therefore, that the attempted appeal now under discussion does not come within the terms of the statute and that, if the appellant has any right to a review of the order complained of, it must be by means of an appeal from such final judgment as may hereafter be entered in the action. Code Civ. Proc. § 956."

We take it to be too well settled to require the citation of authority that no appeal can be taken from a mere interlocutory order, unless the statute so provides. The question here before us has been directly passed upon in other jurisdictions. See Taintor v. St. John, 50 Mont. 358, 146 P. 939, 940, where the court uses this language: "Since an order annulling an order appointing a receiver is not one of the judgments or orders enumerated in section 7098, above, no appeal lies therefrom, though such order is reviewable upon appeal from the final judgment." A kindred holding is Pagett v. Brooks, 140 Ala. 257, 37 So. 263, 264. See, also, Clark on Receivers (2d Ed.) vol. 1, § 128, p. 153.

A moment's consideration of the question here will disclose the wisdom of such a rule.

Here property worth in excess of the mortgage debt is turned over to the plaintiff, and the defendants are deprived of their possession thereof. Such drastic action should not be indulged, unless upon a clear showing of prejudice to the rights of the plaintiff. The court, recognizing its improvident act, properly set aside its order, and, if this appeal be allowed, where, may I ask, rests the right of possession of the property during the pendency of such appeal? Is the receiver now entitled to possession or is he to be ousted of possession pending the appeal and to be allowed later to resume it, should the order be reversed? To allow an appeal in a case of this character would have a tendency to flood this court with appeals from purely interlocutory orders, and hence hamper the proper administration of justice.

It is my conclusion that the appeal should be dismissed.

HARDEN, Justice pro tem.

The plaintiff, Margaret Calihan, Russell K. Dougherty, and two other persons were passengers in a taxicab operated for hire in San Diego by defendant, Yellow Cab Company of San Diego, a corporation, on the 6th day of October, 1930. On that day, while said taxicab was being driven rapidly over a depression commonly known as a "double dip," placed at a street intersection to carry off rain water, plaintiff and said Russell K. Dougherty were thrown from their seats with such force that their heads struck against the top of the taxicab, resulting in personal injuries to both of them. Plaintiff brought suit against defendant, and prayed for general damages in the sum of $7,500 and for special damages in the sum of $550. Trial was before the court and a jury, and resulted in a verdict in plaintiff's favor for the full amount of her demand, $8,050. Judgment was entered accordingly. Motion for new trial was denied. One of the grounds of the motion was that the verdict was excessive. Defendant has appealed from said judgment.

The sole point raised on the appeal is that the judgment was excessive.

Stated substantially in the language of the witnesses, the record would sustain the following findings:

Plaintiff had received personal injuries in an accident which occurred in August, 1928. At that time she sustained a broken leg and injuries to her back and ribs. From said injuries she had recovered, so that on October 6, 1930, she was vigorous and able to follow the profession of nursing; she was then possessed of great endurance; was of a jovial disposition; was plump and rosy, and in good health. At the time of the accident involved herein she was twenty-nine years of age, and earned about $100 per month from following the profession of nurse. In said accident she sustained a bruise to the top of her head, caused by a severe blow. Thereafter she was found to be in extreme agony from injury to her neck, with pain in her head and in the cervical and dorsal regions of her back. Several vertebræ were rotated, and apparently some of the ligaments and muscle fibers were torn. The result was the turning of her head to one side and the raising of her shoulders. She was confined to her bed nine-tenths of the time from October 6, 1930, to December, 1930. Up to the time of the trial, which occurred over eleven months after the accident, she was not able to stand the strain of continued work at her profession. During that period she had cried frequently without reason; she seemed weak and trembling; had lost from ten to fifteen pounds in weight; and there was a marked change in her appearance and disposition. At the trial she seemed haggard and worn, and appeared to be ten or fifteen years older than before the accident; she looked like a different person; was melancholy, pessimistic, and nervous; her neck and head were drawn over to one side and her shoulders not in normal position; there was a change in her gait, and she leaned forward when sitting. It must be stated, however, that it was admitted at the trial that plaintiff had sustained no permanent injuries.

It was established that plaintiff's special damages, on account of expense incurred for the services of physicians and nurses, amounted to $550, and that up to the time of trial she had been without earnings as a result of her injuries for over eleven months, making an additional loss of about $1,100. After deducting said items from the amount of the general verdict, it appears that the net amount awarded for personal injuries, pain, and suffering, and probable loss of earnings in the future, was $6,400. That is the basis for the contention of appellant that the award was excessive.

[1] In any consideration of the question raised here, appellant has the distinct burden of carrying its point. The verdict was subjected to review by the trial court upon proceedings for new trial, and comes here bearing that court's approval.

Particular emphasis is placed by appellant on the fact that, owing to the financial depression from which the country is suffering at the present time, the value of the dollar has increased to such an extent as to make the award excessive. It is contended that the court will take judicial notice of conditions; that in periods of great prosperity, when money was cheap, courts have considered that fact as a justification for affirming large awards; that conversely, now that money is dear, when much in goods and labor is demanded in return for the dollar, the same rule ought to apply.

[2, 3] Changing conditions should be noted by the court. While it may be proper for defendant to point to the increased purchasing power of plaintiff's dollar, defendant's actual complaint is the scarcity of money. Our judicial knowledge having been invoked, we note signs of the country's gradual emergence from the depths of the depression; we may expect a return to normal conditions. No exact measure of detriment suffered as a result of personal injuries has ever been applied, or is possible. Necessarily, values are different. To plaintiff, her injuries were serious; to defendant, they appeared to be trivial. Aside from special damages awarded and an allowance for loss of earnings, the jury and trial court considered that plaintiff's damages amounted to $6,400, and did so in the knowledge common to courts and jurors alike of present financial conditions. Undoubtedly the standards of court and jury are ordinarily more nearly exact than those of either party to an action. An appellate court may properly rely with confidence on the good sense and sound judgment of those to whom the trial is committed. It is therefore the rule that, unless the award is so grossly disproportionate to any fair limit of compensation warranted by the facts as to shock the sense of justice and indicate that it was based on passion and prejudice rather than sober judgment, the reviewing court will not interfere to impose its judgment for that of the jury and trial court.

[4] Having considered the entire record carefully, we cannot say that the verdict has the appearance of being the result of prejudice or passion. It is not so far at variance from this court's opinion of what was fair compensation as to warrant our interference.

The conditions under which we may interpose our judgment against that of the jury are so well understood that we cite only two authorities in support of our decisions: Smith v. Royer, 181 Cal. 165, 183 P. 660; Zibbell v. Southern Pacific Co., 160 Cal. 237, 116 P. 513.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; C. E. Beaumont, Judge.

Action by Milton C. Gordon against J. E. Mount. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Norris J. Burke and Hatfield, Wood & Kilkenny, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Berry & Watson, of Stockton, and J. E. Mount, in pro. per., for respondent.

PLUMMER, J.

In this action the plaintiff sought judgment against the defendant for and on account of a certain alleged malicious prosecution. Judgment went for the defendant. The cause was tried before the court sitting without a jury. Findings were waived. From the judgment of the court, the plaintiff appeals.

The alleged malicious prosecution consisted of the filing of a complaint by the defendant, charging the plaintiff with the theft of a number of cattle. Complaint dismissed upon motion of district attorney.

The record shows that litigation has been pending between the defendant and the James J. Stevinson Corporation, of which the plaintiff in this action is the superintendent, for over twenty years. At the time of the occurrences mentioned in this action, George Hatfield was the manager of both the James J. Stevinson Corporation and the Eastside Canal & Irrigation Company, and was the immediate superior of the plaintiff in this action.

While the various phases of the litigation between the parties herein are set out in the transcript, only that which pertains to this action need be considered.

In one of the actions the title of the Eastside Canal & Irrigation Company to an easement to a certain ditch commonly known as the "Turner Slough" was quieted. This slough ran through the east half of lot 24, in section 26, township 7 south, range 10 east, M. D. B. & M., being property belonging to the defendant.

On or about the 10th day of April, 1928, the plaintiff herein was engaged in cleaning out said Turner slough, where it ran over and through the land belonging to the defendant, and on that date the plaintiff took up as estrays six head of cattle, where they were then grazing on the east half of lot 17, section 16, township 7 south, range 10 east, M. D. B. & M., being property belonging to the James J. Stevinson Corporation.

It appears from the record that two days prior to the taking up of the cattle a notice had been served upon the defendant to keep his cattle off the described premises. After the taking up of the cattle by the plaintiff, proceedings were had under the provisions of the statute relating to estrays, and thereafter it appears that a suit for the recovery of the cattle was prosecuted by the defendant, and one Woolman who claimed to be the owner of some cattle theretofore left in the possession of the defendant Mount, and taken up as estrays by the plaintiff Gordon. This action resulted in a judgment directing the return of the cattle upon payment of the sum of $85, cost of the proceeding. This sum being paid, the plaintiff proceeded to return the cattle claimed to have been taken up by him as es-trays, save and except as to one that had died during the pendency of the action just referred to. It also appears that there were two or three calves also returned with the cows that had been taken up.

The controversy which led to the filing of the criminal complaint by Mount arose out of the contention on the part of the defendant in this action that the cattle returned were not the same as those that had been taken up. The cattle were taken up as estrays, as heretofore stated, on or about the 10th day of April, 1928, and returned to the defendant by the middle of July, 1929. The cattle were returned by placing them in a public highway opposite the residence occupied and belonging to the defendant Mount. The claim on the part of the plaintiff is that the identical cattle, with their issue, were returned, save and except as to the one head that had died. The testimony on the part of the plaintiff was to the effect that one of the cattle taken up was missed on or about two months after being taken up, that the country was searched, and said animal could not be found. The testimony on the part of the defendant was to the effect that they could not identify the cattle returned, as the ones taken up, save and except as to one of them.

We do not need to follow the testimony set out in the transcript, relative to the identity of the cattle returned as being what was left of the cattle that had been taken up as estrays by the plaintiff, and will content ourselves with saying that it largely preponderates in favor of the contention of the plaintiff that, of the six cattle taken up as estrays, all of them were returned with their issue, save and except as to one which the court found, in the claim and delivery proceeding, had disappeared from the possession of the James J. Stevinson Corporation without any fault on the part of the corporation, and without any fault on the part of the plaintiff in this action.

[1] During the introduction of testimony relative to the taking up of the cattle and the place where they were grazing at the time of the taking up, the court, over the objection of the plaintiff, allowed the defendant to introduce testimony to the effect that defendant had had an agreement with A. J. Stevinson, an employee of the Stevinson Corporation, relative to an exchange of pastures, and that the cattle were where they had a right to be at the time they were taken up as estrays. Also there was other testimony introduced over the objection of the plaintiff that the wires inclosing the field in which the cattle had been, had been cut by employees of the Stevinson Corporation, and the cattle escaped therefrom. While this testimony does not appear to be material to any of the issues involved in this action, and the objection of the plaintiff to its introduction should have been sustained by reason of what we shall hereafter say, it is unnecessary to follow the rather extensive argument of counsel for the appellant relative to the authority of A. J. Stevinson to bind the corporation by any such agreement, even though made by him.

[2, 3] Three grounds of defense, though not specifically set out in the answer, appear to be tendered by the testimony, to wit: Probable cause; advice of counsel; lack of malice. The record shows, as we have summarized, that the cattle in question were taken up as estrays, a judgment of the court finding that the cattle were lawfully taken up and directed to be returned upon payment of costs, that the costs were paid, and, the testimony largely preponderating in favor of the contention that the same cattle taken up as estrays were returned, together with their issue, save and except as to the one missing animal, it is evident that no probable cause existed for the filing of a criminal complaint charging theft of the cattle. The findings in the case having been waived, and there being nothing in the evidence which would warrant a finding that the defendant had probable cause for the filing of a criminal complaint, it must be presumed that the court did not base its judgment upon the alleged existence of probable cause.

[4, 5] The second ground of defense is that of advice of counsel. To sustain this defense, the law is well established that any one relying thereon must show that he made a full and complete statement of all the facts within his knowledge bearing upon the transaction. This can only be done by the testimony showing what facts were stated by the defendant to the counsel consulted by him. It is not sufficient simply for the defendant to say in substance, "I stated to counsel all the facts within my knowledge concerning the transaction." Such testimony is only the conclusion of the witness. It appears that the defendant consulted the district attorney of Merced county, who advised him that he would not issue a complaint. The defendant also consulted the attorney who had represented him in a civil action, and was advised by him that he could do no more in the cause. The defendant then consulted counsel in the city of Stockton and obtained a complaint from them which he subsequently filed with a justice of the peace in Merced county, who issued a criminal complaint thereon. The defense of advice of counsel is based upon the action of his Stockton attorneys. All the testimony relative to the statement of facts is really summarized in a few questions which are as follows (taken from the testimony of the defendant):

"Q. Now, in consulting your attorneys in Stockton, did you tell them all the facts within your knowledge pertaining to the case?

"Mr. Burke: We object to that as calling for a conclusion of the witness.

"The Court: Overruled.

"Mr. Watson: Q. Did you relate to them, all of the facts to which you have testified here?

"Mr. Kilkenny: We object to the question in that form, as leading and suggestive, and calling for the conclusion of the witness.

"The Court: Well, it is leading. Change the form of the question.

"Mr. Watson: Q. Did you, or did you not, tell your attorneys, on that occasion, to which you have testified, before the complaint was filed, relate to them all of the facts to which you have testified in this case? A. Yes, sir, the same."

There is no testimony that the defendant testified as to what he told his attorneys. He merely stated, over plaintiff's objection, that he told them all the facts of the case to which he had testified in the proceeding then being had before the court. It is almost unnecessary to cite authorities to show that this testimony is insufficient to support the defense of advice of counsel. However, we will cite an excerpt from the testimony set out in the case of Lansky v. Prettyman, 140 Mich. 40, 103 N. W. 538, 540, which is strikingly similar: "Q. Did you state all the facts that you knew in relation to this case both for and against Mr. Lansky and Van Kaul? A. I gave him the facts that I knew. Q. Did you give him all the facts you knew? A. I certainly did. I told him everything I knew about the case from the beginning." The court held that plaintiff's objection to such testimony should have been sustained. That the defendant must, by his testimony in court, set forth all the facts that he stated to his counsel in making an alleged full and fair disclosure, is supported by all the authorities. We simply cite 19 Am. & Eng. Law (2d Ed.) p. 387 (cases cited in note 5); Beadle v. Harrison, 58 Mont. 606, 194 P. 134; Murphy v. Davids, 181 Cal. 706, 186 P. 143. The list of authorities supporting what we have said is too long for further citation. It must therefore be held that the defense of advice of counsel is not supported by the testimony in this cause.

[6, 7] There remains for our consideration the question of malice, upon which question there was no testimony in addition to what inferences might be drawn from lack of probable cause and lack of advice of counsel other than the following: Justice McConnell, the justice of the peace before whom the complaint was filed, testified that the defendant said: "I want to get even with the Stevinson Corporation." On the part of the defendant Mount the testimony is as follows:

"Q. On the date the complaint was filed, what conversation was had between you and Judge McConnell? A. I just gave him the complaint and he filed it. I don't think there was much of a conversation then. I don't remember that conversation.

"Q. Did you say to him that you were going to get even with the Stevinson Corporation? A. No sir, I did not."

Upon the subject of malice, we find the following in 16 California Jurisprudence, p. 746: "It is incumbent upon the plaintiff, in an action for malicious prosecution, to prove malice. The existence of malice may be inferred by the jury from acts or declarations of the defendant expressing or indicating prejudice, ill-will or malicious motive in the matter of the prosecution. And while malice is not presumed to exist from want of probable cause as a matter of law, it may be inferred therefrom by the jury. But in whatever way malice may be proved, it must be proved as a fact." And on page 735 of the same volume we find the following text, which we think is fully borne out by the cases cited in the footnotes: "It is not sufficient, in an action for malicious prosecution to show that the proceedings complained of were prosecuted without proper ground, or even without what in law constitutes probable cause. Malice, that is, actual malice on the part of the prosecutor, is a necessary element in the cause of action. It is abundantly settled that no suit may be maintained against an unsuccessful plaintiff or prosecutor, unless it is shown affirmatively that he was actuated in his conduct by malice —some improper or sinister motive. Malice is essential to the maintenance of such action and not merely to the recovery of exemplary damages. There is no distinction in this respect between actions for actual damages and those for exemplary damages, or between actions for instituting civil and those for instituting criminal proceedings." The burden of proving both malice and want of probable cause is on the plaintiff. Runo v. Williams, 162 Cal. 444, 122 P. 1082; Lee v. Levison, 173 Cal. 166, 159 P. 438; Burke v. Watts, 188 Cal. 118, 204 P. 578; Carpenter v. Ashley, 15 Cal. App. 461, 115 P. 268; Foster v. Banks, 112 Cal. App. 622, 297 P. 106. Further: In order to sustain an action for malicious prosecution, malice and want of probable cause must occur. If either be wanting, the action must fail. The authorities supporting this statement of the law are so numerous that we cite only a recent decision, to wit: Pickering v. Havens, 70 Cal. App. 381, 233 P. 346.

[8-10] While the jury or the trial court sitting without a jury may properly infer malice from want of probable cause, they are not required to do so as a matter of law. It therefore follows that we cannot state as a matter of law that the evidence in this case establishes the charge of malice. Where findings are waived, it is presumed that every fact essential to the support of the judgment was proved and found by the court. Gray v. Gray, 185 Cal. 598, 197 P. 945; 24 Cal. Jur. p. 956, and the cases there cited.

[11, 12] In support of the judgment, there being no findings in this case, we must hold that the court, notwithstanding the record shows want of probable cause and lack of reliance upon advice of counsel, that the testimony introduced in the cause did not justify the charge of malice, and the existence of malice being a question of fact, we are bound by the judgment of the trial court.

The judgment is affirmed.

CRESPI & CO. v. GIFFEN et al.

Civ. No. 813.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

Aug. 22, 1932.

Appeal and error ⊂655(1).

Where trial judge certified to entire transcript, it would not be stricken from record because official reporter did not certify to part (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 273, 953a).

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; C. E. Beaumont, Judge.

Action by Crespi & Co. against L. F. Giffen and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal, and plaintiff moves to strike the reporter's transcript from the record on appeal and for an order affirming the judgment of the trial court.

Motions denied.

Irvine P. Aten, of Fresno, for appellants.

G. Levin Aynesworth, of Fresno, for respondent.

MORTON, Justice pro tem.

This is a motion by respondent to strike the reporter's transcript from the record on appeal and for an order affirming judgment of the trial court. The motion is based upon the ground that the reporter's transcript has not been and cannot be properly authenticated under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure, for the reason that the official reporter was not present during a portion of the trial, at which certain evidence was introduced. It appears that, after the taking of the evidence at the first hearing, the trial court requested a further deposition of the witness Knowles. By stipulation this deposition was taken and filed in the action. Shortly thereafter counsel for both appellant and respondent appeared in court, and without objection this deposition was offered and introduced in evidence and considered by the court; the cause was then further argued by both counsel. The official court reporter was not present during this hearing. It was also found necessary to correct the minutes of the court to show the introduction in evidence of this deposition and also another deposition offered during the trial. The official reporter certified to all of the evidence incorporated in his transcript except the two depositions. The trial judge, over the written objection of respondent, certified to the entire transcript as containing all the testimony and evidence offered and received at the trial. The court rendered judgment for the plaintiff, and the defendant appeals.

Under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure, it is the duty of the trial judge, when the reporter's transcript is presented to him for his approval, to examine it and to "see that the same is a full, true and fair transcript of the proceedings had at the trial, the testimony offered or taken, evidence offered or received. * * *" In the case of Lake v. Harris, 198 Cal. 85, at page 88, 243 P. 417, 419, the court held: "It is the duty of the trial judge to authenticate all papers, records, and files which are not subject to certification solely by the clerk, and which are essential to a proper determination of the appeal"—citing cases. We find in Bell v. Brigance, 194 Cal. 445, 229 P. 27, 28, a case closely in point. There it appeared that certain proceedings were had at the trial, and then a court reporter took the proceedings "from said point aforesaid." In denying the motion made to affirm the judgment, the court said: "The judge shall examine the transcript, and if he finds it a full, true, and fair transcript of the matter required by the statute to be included, he shall certify to its truth and correctness. * * * The certificate of the judge is the only certificate required or provided for by section 953a, supra, and is the only authentication of the transcript to which this court will look. The reporter's certificate may have been of assistance to the judge below, being prima facie evidence of the testimony and proceedings (Code Civ. Proc. § 273), but it adds nothing to the authenticity of the transcript in question. Williams v. Lane, 158 Cal. 39, 40, 109 P. 873." We feel this statement of the law clearly determines the question in issue here. The motion to strike the reporter's transcript from the record is therefore denied.

The ruling on the motion to strike removes the basis for the motion to affirm the judgment of the trial court, and therefore it is also denied.

SHANFELD v. MUNSON et ux.

Civ. 392.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

Sept. 2, 1932.

Appeal and error ⇐773(2).

Where appellant failed to file points and authorities as provided by rules, or to show diligence or meritorious case, appeal will be dismissed (Rules of District Court of Appeal, Rule I, § 4, and Rule V).

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; S. L. Strother, Judge.

Action by David Shanfeld against Guy H. Munson and Anna Munson, who brought separate action against plaintiff, after which the cases were consolidated and tried together. From judgment rendered, David Shanfeld appeals. On respondents' motion to dismiss appeal.

Appeal dismissed.

Christian Hoeppner and Gilbert H. Jertberg, both of Fresno, for appellant.

Wakefield & Hansen, of Fresno, for respondents.

HARDEN, Justice pro tem.

Plaintiff, David Shanfeld, brought suit against the defendants, Guy H. Munson and Anna Munson, husband and wife, for damages as a result of personal injuries sustained by him on February 18, 1930, in a collision between an automobile truck driven by plaintiff and an automobile driven by the defendant Anna Munson. In said collision said Anna Munson also sustained personal injuries, on account of which she and her husband brought a separate action against the plaintiff herein for damages. The cases were consolidated and tried together before the court and a jury. The verdict was in favor of the defendant in the present action and in favor of plaintiff herein as defendant in the other case. Judgment was entered accordingly. From the judgment entered herein plaintiff has appealed.

The transcript on appeal was filed on May 4, 1931. Respondents gave appellant written notice on July 21, 1932, that they would move the court on August 9, 1932, to dismiss the appeal on the ground that appellant's points and authorities had not been filed within the time allowed by the rules of court. Rule I, section 4, of this court required the appellant to file points and authorities on or before June 3, 1931. No order was made granting any extension of time for such filing. Rule V provides for dismissal of an appeal on motion for failure to file points and authorities within the time allowed. Pursuant to said notice, respondents made their motion on August 9, 1932, to dismiss the appeal. The rules also provide that such motion to dismiss shall be denied, if points and authorities are on file at the time the notice is given; but no points and authorities had been filed at that time nor when the motion to dismiss was made. No diligence has been shown to comply with the rules nor to resist the motion. No showing was made that the appeal is meritorious.

The respondents are entitled to a dismissal of the appeal. McCabe v. Healey, 139 Cal. 30, 72 P. 359; Coats v. Coats, 146 Cal. 443, 80 P. 694; Gilbert v. United States F. & G. Co., 97 Cal. App. 42, 274 P. 1023; Welch v. Stratton, 73 Cal. App. 765, 239 P. 380; Pierce v. Employers' Indemnity Exchange, 33 Cal. App. 98, 164 P. 403; Barnhart v. Conley, 17 Cal. App. 230, 119 P. 200.

The appeal is therefore dismissed.

CREDIT FINANCE CORPORATION v. MOX et al.

Civ. 8311.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California.

Aug. 29, 1932.

1. Usury ⇐106.

Compromise settlement definitely fixing indebtedness due and releasing debtor's claims against creditor, and note executed as part payment of amount due held enforceable, though original transaction was usurious (Usury Law [St. 1919, p. lxxxiii]).

2. Compromise and settlement ⇐6(2).

Compromise of doubtful claim asserted and maintained in good faith constitutes sufficient consideration for new promise.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Myron Westover, Judge.

Action by the Credit Finance Corporation against Gustav Mox and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, named defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

L. M. Pritchard, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Hewitt, McCormick & Crump and H. L. Green, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

KNIGHT, J.

This is an action to recover on a promissory note executed by the defendants Gustav and Otto Mox and J. L. Deane for the payment of $25,000. The answers admitted due execution of the note, but pleaded want of consideration and usury. The trial took place before the court, and judgment was given in favor of plaintiff for the full amount of the note and interest; and from such judgment the defendant Gustav Mox has appealed. The appeal was taken on the judgment roll alone, and the sole question presented is the legal sufficiency of the findings to support the judgment.

It appears from the findings that defendants owned approximately 65 per cent. of the outstanding stock of Mox, Incorporated, which was engaged in the business of selling lumber; and in October, 1925, plaintiff agreed to lend the corporation such sums of money as it might require to operate its business, taking as security therefor the assignment of book accounts due the corporation. Up to February, 1927, there were some seventy-five separate loans made, the amounts advanced being equal to 60 per cent. of the face value of the accounts taken as security therefor; and the total amount thereof aggregated several hundred thousand dollars. In June, 1926, on demand of plaintiff, the defendants herein gave plaintiff a written agreement of continuing guaranty, by the terms of which defendants jointly and severally and unconditionally guaranteed the payment of all indebtedness due plaintiff from the corporation. Thereafter a dispute arose between the parties as to the exact amount due from the corporation to plaintiff; the corporation and the defendants claiming that part of the sums demanded by plaintiff were usurious. Eventually the parties agreed upon a compromise and settlement, whereby plaintiff deducted some $18,000 from the amount claimed; "the mutual belief of all of the parties being," according to the trial court's findings, "that the allowance of said claim of some $18,000 would purge all transactions of any possible taint of usury." Whereupon, and in February, 1927, in consummation of said compromise and settlement, the parties entered into a written agreement whereby the amount of the indebtedness due plaintiff was fixed at $100,000, and the corporation and defendants agreed, as the court found, "to release all claims whatsoever held by any or either of them against plaintiff and its subsidiary corporations, and to pay to plaintiff the sum of $100,000.00, irrespective of what the books of any or either of said corporations might show as due and/or owing"; and as part of the same settlement and in part payment of said $100,000 the defendants herein executed and delivered to plaintiff the promissory note here sued upon, for $25,000, no part of which has ever been paid.

The trial court further found that prior to said settlement and compromise plaintiff claimed a balance due of $172,838.39, and that "of said sum * * * $41,500.00 constituted interest charges made by plaintiff for loans to said Mox Incorporated, and * * * that all of said sum of $41,500.00 is an improper charge and not allowable." Continuing, the finding reads: "Deducting said sum of $41,500.00 from the balance due and owing from Mox Incorporated, its subsidiaries, and defendants, to plaintiff, the Court finds that a sum in excess of $100,000.00 was due and owing * * *" to plaintiffs in "February, 1927, prior to the execution of said agreement of compromise and settlement." The trial court's legal conclusions were that the loans made by plaintiff to said corporation "were tainted with usury and in violation of The Usury Act of the State of California" [St. 1919, p. lxxxiii]; and that "the sum of $41,500.00 constitutes interest in excess of $12.00 upon each $100.00 per year, and is therefore a void and illegal charge"; but, continuing, the court found that "prior to the execution of said agreement of compromise and settlement" there was due plaintiff a sum in excess of $100,000.

[1, 2] The main contention made by appellant on this appeal is that, inasmuch as the trial court found that part of the sum of $172,838.39 claimed by plaintiff to be due prior to the compromise and settlement, to wit, the sum of $41,500, constituted usurious interest and consequently was a void charge, the agreement entered into as a result of such compromise and settlement and the note here sued upon which was given in part payment of the amount found to be legitimately due are likewise tainted with usury and consequently void. We find no merit in the contention, for, as said in Lamb v. Herndon, 97 Cal. App. 193, 275 P. 503, 508, in the absence of a showing of fraud or undue influence, a compromise agreement, like a judgment, is decisive of the rights of the parties thereto, and "even though there had been usury in the original transaction, it would seem that upon a settlement upon which each of the parties released the others from all claims and liabilities of every character then existing, the right to rely upon a previous usurious transaction would cease to exist. Ector v. Osborne, 179 N. C. 667, 13 A. L. R. 1207, 103 S. E. 388; Hoopes v. Ferguson, 57 Iowa, 39, 10 N. W. 286; Blohm v. Hannan, 82 N. J. Eq. 192, 88 A. 622." To the same effect is Thayer v. Buchanan, 46 Or. 106, 79 P. 343. Furthermore it is held generally in this state that the compromise of a doubtful claim asserted and maintained in good faith constitutes a sufficient consideration for a new promise. Snowball v. Snowball, 164 Cal. 476, 129 P. 784;

Bank of Commerce v. Scofield, 126 Cal. 156, 58 P. 451; Rohrbacher v. Aitken, 145 Cal. 485, 78 P. 1054.

Here the trial court found that during all of the negotiations for compromise the plaintiff in good faith maintained that the transactions involving the advances were not tainted with usury, and that much more than $100,000 was legitimately due plaintiff on said indebtedness. Therefore, since no claim has been made by appellant at any time that the compromise was brought about by fraud or undue influence, or any unfair advantage, he is bound by the agreements he entered into as a result thereof.

The judgment is affirmed.

2. Appeal and error ⇐1099(7).

3. Master and servant ⇐330(3).

Finding that hoisting contractor's employee operating hoisting equipment rented to building contractor remained under former's control, held justified under evidence in action based on employee's negligence.

The evidence disclosed that the hoisting contractor rented to the building contractor, engaged in erecting a stadium, a tractor and hoisting attachments, and furnished an operator, charging for the use of the hoisting apparatus and operator a specified sum per day. The operator's wages were paid by the hoisting contractor, and no one in the employ of the building contractor directed him as to care or operation of motor or hoist. The injuries were due to workmen's falling when cage fell as result of carrying load too great for the hoist.

LAMBERSON, Justice pro tem.

We have before us two appeals of the defendant S. D. Le Clair, which have, by stipulation of the parties, been consolidated and presented in a single record. Each of the plaintiffs sued defendant for damages for personal injuries suffered as a result of the falling of a construction elevator cage used in the hoisting of building materials and equipment going into the construction of a concrete structure known as Kezar Stadium in Golden Gate Park, in San Francisco. The trial, which has resulted in this appeal, was the second trial of the case, and was had before the court without a jury. In the former trial, with a jury, the court directed a verdict in favor of the defendant. Upon an appeal the judgment was reversed. Valdick v. Le Clair, 106 Cal. App. 489, 289 P. 673. Upon a second trial the court gave judgment in favor of the plaintiff F. Valdick in the sum of $2,050, and in favor of the plaintiff A. Madsen in the sum of $3,000. The appeal is from each judgment.

At the beginning of the second trial, counsel agreed by stipulation that certain facts, as set forth in the opinion of the court in Valdick v. Le Clair, supra, were established. We consider it advisable for the purposes of this opinion to restate the facts, because the testimony, as it was developed at the second trial, varied in some particulars from that given at the first trial. The facts, in substance, were as follows:

J. A. Bryant was a general contractor who had secured a contract for the erection of the Kezar Stadium. During the progress of the work, it being necessary for the carrying on of the work that hoisting machinery be used, Bryant went to the appellant, who was a hoisting engineer, and had been engaged in the business of renting hoisting machinery and engines of various types, and supplying operators for the same for many years. Bryant told Le Clair of his contract and of his requirements. According to the testimony of Le Clair, he asked Bryant if the latter wanted a small steam engine, and Bryant replied that he did not want such an engine, because it would be necessary to move the machinery several times, and, as the ground was rough, he would like to have a tractor. In describing his requirements, Bryant stated that he desired to run a cage or elevator platform of a size large enough to accommodate two buggies, which are large steel wheelbarrows used for carrying concrete from the trucks to the places where it is poured into the walls under construction. Appellant told Bryant that a tractor was not large enough to handle two loaded buggies on a single line. The latter then said that he intended to hoist one buggy loaded, and allow enough room on the platform for the placing of an empty buggy which could be lowered, presumably, while the loaded buggy was being emptied, thus allowing the loading and unloading to be a continuous operation. It was agreed that Bryant should pay $18 per day to the appellant for the use of the engine and hoisting apparatus, including $8 as wages for an operator to be provided by Le Clair. On the following day, pursuant to agreement, a representative of Le Clair went out to the stadium, and in a talk with Bryant's foreman it was agreed that a cage large enough for two buggies should be used. The foreman wanted to use a single line running from the center of the cage, and appellant's representative suggested that, because of a loaded buggy being carried on one side of the cage, the cage would tip or rack, and that, in order to remedy such defect, he would furnish with the hoisting apparatus a device known as a bridle. Shortly thereafter this representative of Le Clair personally delivered at the scene of work a Fordson tractor with a hoisting apparatus of the drum and cable type, known as an Ellison hoist, adjusted thereto. This equipment was delivered at a point about 200 feet from the elevator tower which was in process of erection, and with which the hoisting apparatus was to be used. Three or four days later, upon notification from Bryant or his foreman, Le Clair's representative, telephoned to one of their hoisting engineers, a man named Pratt, who had been employed by Le Clair for at least 14 years, to report for work on the following morning to Bryant's foreman, and to take his orders from Bryant or the foreman. On the following day Pratt reported to the foreman about 8 o'clock in the morning, and was told that they were not ready to pour, but to get the tractor warmed up and ready for work. In the time intervening between delivery of the engine and hoist to the scene of the work, and the morning on which Pratt had reported for work, the hoisting engine and hoist had been moved to a position near the tower, and rigged up for work. Le Clair's representative testified that the work of rigging up the hoist had not been done by any one connected with Le Clair's establishment. Pratt examined the engine, and warmed it up for work, and during the morning hoisted some equipment for Bryant's foreman. About 11 a. m. he was informed that they were ready to hoist concrete. Two loaded buggies were run on to the cage and hoisted to the level of a runway where the respondents, who were employees of Bryant, were stationed with orders to take the buggies off of the cage. There is some conflict in the testimony as to whether or not Pratt made objection to Bryant or his foreman that the load was too great for the hoist. As the respondents stepped forward to pull the buggies off of the cage, they each placed a foot on the cage and pulled on the buggies. Thereupon the cage fell, and each of the respondents was precipitated to the ground a distance of about 14 feet, receiving the injuries which form the basis of the action. It was later found that the excessive weight had sheared off a contrivance known as a "Woodruff key," which is a steel wedge or cotter pin inserted in a slot of a steel rod or shaft, and which was a part of the braking apparatus of the hoist, thereby permitting the cage to fall.

Pratt continued to work on the job for some days after the accident. When concrete was not to be poured, he would be told by the Bryant foreman that he would not be needed the following day, and, when concrete was to be poured, the foreman would notify Le Clair's office, and some one at that place would notify Pratt to report on the job. Pratt received his wages from Le Clair at the rate of $8 per day, and frequently worked overtime at the request of Bryant's foreman. All of his wages were paid by Le Clair, who also furnished gasoline and oil with the tractor. The trial court found in each case as follows: "Shortly prior to June 15, 1928, the defendant S. D. Le Clair, a hoisting contractor, entered into an agreement with the said J. A. Bryant, and pursuant to said agreement, the defendant S. D. Le Clair agreed to and did furnish to said J. A. Bryant for hire a certain hoisting engine and apparatus, owned by the said defendant, together with a hoisting engineer in the employ of said defendant, to operate the same, in the construction of said Kezar Stadium; the said defendant S. D. Le Clair, by and through his said employee and hoisting engineer, operated and controlled said hoisting engine and apparatus in the construction of said Kezar Stadium on said 15th day of June, 1928; the said employee and hoisting engineer of said defendant was not, at said time and place, a servant or employee of the said J. A. Bryant but, in the operation and control of said hoisting engine and apparatus, was and remained the employee and servant of said defendant, acting within the course and scope of his employment by, and under the control of, the defendant S. D. Le Clair."

The facts, as developed in the second trial of the case, do not differ materially from those adduced during the first trial. We have already related such additional matters which seem or tend to explain the relation which Pratt bore respectively to Bryant and to appellant. The solution of the controversy depends, as it did in the former appeal, upon the status of Pratt, who had worked for Le Clair for a long period of time. No one in the employ of Bryant directed Pratt as to the care or operation of the motor or hoist. Even Pratt said that no signals or directions were actually given as to when to hoist, but he watched the men, or the placing of the buggies on the cage, and it was customary for the engineer to use his own judgment as to when the cage was ready to go. He further testified that he knew the two buggies weighed 900 pounds each, and that the capacity of the hoist, as it was rigged, was about 1,500 pounds.

The court upon the former appeal (Valdick v. Le Clair, supra), said at page 497 of 106 Cal. App., 289 P. 673, 677: "We are of the opinion that the testimony is susceptible of the inference that the work of hoisting or raising the concrete 'buggies' to the workmen on the stadium was being done by respondent Le Clair through his employee, Arthur M. Pratt; that the jury might well have concluded, without abusing the discretion vested in it as the trier of the facts, that Le Clair at no time had surrendered full control over Pratt to Bryant, nor had Bryant exercised that degree of control over Pratt which would establish the relation of special employer and employee between Pratt and Bryant, but Le Clair had himself retained the right to control Pratt; Bryant merely, through his foreman, giving Pratt directions as to the details of the work and the manner of doing it."

Upon the question as to the correctness of the trial court's order granting a motion for a directed verdict, the court said in substance that, the evidence in the record being sufficient to support a finding that at the time of the accident Le Clair had not resigned full control of Pratt, it followed that Le Clair would be liable for damages if Pratt was negligent, and his negligence was the proximate cause of the injuries received by the plaintiffs, and the question of Pratt's negligence was a question of fact for the jury, to be determined from all the evidence, and held that, only when the facts are clear and undisputed, and the dictates of common prudence point to only one reasonable conclusion, the question is then, and only then, one of law for the court.

[1] Respondents urge that the conclusions of the court on the former appeal became the law of the case. The conclusion of the court that the question as to the control of Pratt, and as to his negligence, were questions of fact for the jury to determine, did become the law of the case.

[2] Where the appellate court has, in its opinion, stated a rule or principle of law necessary to a decision, that rule or principle must be adhered to and observed throughout the subsequent progress of the case, both in the lower court and upon subsequent appeals, although it may be believed upon further consideration that the former decision in that particular was erroneous. Burns v. Jackson, 53 Cal. App. 345, 200 P. 80, citing Westerfeld v. New York L. Ins. Co., 157 Cal. 339, 107 P. 699. This doctrine does not, however, extend without exception to questions of fact. In Wallace v. Sisson, 114 Cal. 42, 45 P. 1000, 1001, cited with approval in Allen v. Bryant, 155 Cal. 256, 100 P. 704, the court said: "But, when the fact which is to be decided depends upon the credit to be given to the witnesses whose testimony is received, or the weight to which their testimony is entitled, or the inferences of fact that are to be drawn from the evidence, the sufficiency of the evidence to justify the decision must be determined by the tribunal before which it is presented, and is not controlled by an opinion of the appellate court that similar evidence at a former trial of the cause was insufficient to justify a similar decision * * * and if, in the opinion which it renders, it assumes that the evidence sustains any fact, it is only the opinion of the court, and not a finding of that fact." In Allen v. Bryant, supra, the court said that the doctrine of law of the case is rarely, and in a very limited class of cases, applied to matters of evidence as distinguished from rulings of law.

[3, 4] We must conclude, therefore, that the questions of fact as to whether Pratt was the servant of appellant rather than Bryant, and as to whether the negligence of Pratt as the employee of appellant was the proximate cause of the injury to the respondents, were still to be determined by the trial court upon the second trial, and the problem here to decide is the sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings of the trial court.

An excellent analysis and carefully considered review of the California cases involving the question which we have before us in this case is found in the case of Peters v. United Studios, Inc., 98 Cal. App. 373, 277 P. 156, 157. In that case, Daum, a tractor driver in the employ of United Studios, Inc., was sent with the tractor by his foreman to the Christie Studios, with instructions to go over to the Christie Studios to do whatever they wanted done over there. The United Studios rented the tractor and furnished Daum as the driver. Oil and gas were furnished by the Christie Studios. Daum reported to the foreman of the latter, and thereafter the tractor was taken to Wilmington, where it was used in filming certain scenes of a motion picture. The Christie Studios people attached two angle irons to the front of the tractor, and on one occasion the tractor was driven for a short time by one of the Christie actors. On other occasions Daum was furnished costumes and doubled for the actors, while on other occasions he wore his own working clothes, and was not made up. The Christie foreman told Daum what to do, but did not undertake to interfere with the mechanical operation of the tractor. Daum knew nothing about the contract, but turned in his time to the United Studios people, and during the time that the tractor was used by the Christie people the United Studios had nothing to do with the operation of the machine and in no way interfered with the operation of the machine. Judgment was rendered upon a verdict against the defendants, United Studios, and the operator of the tractor, for injuries received by an actor employed by Christie Studios, who was injured while the tractor was being operated by Daum in the filming of a picture.

At the trial of the case the court instructed the jury as follows: " 'You are instructed that, as a matter of law and as a matter of fact, the defendant Kenneth Daum, in the driving, management and operation of the tractor that struck the plaintiff on the occasion involved here, was the agent and servant of the defendant, United Studios, Incorporated, and any act of negligence, if any, on his part, was the act of negligence of said defendant corporation as well as his own.' "

In holding that the trial court erred in giving such an instruction, the appellate court said: "The question is, again, not what control was actually exercised, but who had the authoritative right to control. The fact that the terms of the contract of hiring were not conclusively proved left it, in our judgment, to the jury to determine from all the evidence who at the time and place of the injury had the right to exercise exclusive direction and control of the conduct of Daum. In the last analysis the question really depends on the construction to be given to the direction to Daum to 'do whatever they want done' in the light of all the proved circumstances in the case. That was peculiarly a fact to be determined by the jury and should not have been taken from them. We conclude, therefore, that the court erred in instructing the jury as a matter of law that appellant United Studios, Inc., was liable for the negligence of Daum. We likewise conclude that under the evidence in this case the question of whether or not Daum remained subject to the control of United Studios, Inc., so as to render them liable for his negligence, should have been left to the jury to decide under appropriate instructions by the court."

The case of Umsted v. Scofield Eng. Const. Co., 203 Cal. 224, 263 P. 799, 801, was another case where the employee of the general employer was instructed to go over to the special employer's job and do " 'anything they wanted to take care of' " or "do whatever was needed." On the job the construction superintendent of the special employer had directed the employee Umsted, as to what was to be done, but not as to how to do anything. The Supreme Court said that the jury might have inferred that the instructions given by the representative of the construction company, the special employer, were merely directions as to the result to be accomplished, such as are required in the nature of things to be given to independent contractors in any case.

[5] On appeal, all conflicts in the evidence must be resolved in favor of the judgment, and all reasonable inferences from the evidence will be drawn in its support. Witherow v. United American Ins. Co., 101 Cal. App. 334, 281 P. 668.

While we are of the opinion that some of the cases relied upon by respondent are to be distinguished from the case before us, particularly the case of Moss v. Chronicle Pub. Co., 201 Cal. 610, 258 P. 88, 55 A. L. R. 1258, in which the employees involved were engaged in doing work for the mutual benefit of their respective employers, and the case of Billig v. Southern Pacific Co., 189 Cal. 477, 209 P. 241, in which the employee of the general contractor was controlled during the greater part of the time by the general employer, and was beyond the control of the special employer for long periods of time, we must, nevertheless, conclude that the question of whether Pratt was actually under the control of Bryant to such an extent as to absolve the appellant of responsibility for the negligence of Pratt, as well as the question of whether or not Pratt's negligence was the proximate cause of the injury to respondents, was a question of fact to be determined by the court, and that its findings cannot be disturbed.

It would be idle to review the California authorities, because they have been set out very fully in several decisions, and particularly in Peters v. United Studios, Inc., supra. The cases have gone far in supporting the principle that to escape liability the original master must resign full control for the time being, it not being sufficient that the servant is partially under the control of a third person; and that it is necessary to distinguish between authoritative direction and control, and mere suggestions as to details, or the necessary co-operation where the work furnished is part of a larger operation.

It is ordered that the judgment be affirmed.

Rehearing Denied Sept. 24, 1932.

1. Indictment and Information ⇐161(4).

Evidence at preliminary hearing held to show robbery and subsequent attempted robbery so as to justify amended information containing count based on attempt.

2. Robbery ⇐12.

Possession of money by intended victim is not essential to crime of attempt to commit robbery.

3. Criminal law ⇐829(1).

Accused cannot complain of refusal to give instruction, where points involved were covered in court's charge.

4. Criminal law ⇐1218.

Accused convicted of attempt to commit robbery of second degree were properly sentenced to imprisonment in state prison instead of in county jail (Pen. Code, § 213, and § 664, subd. 1).

5. Robbery ⇐26.

Weight of complaining witness' testimony in prosecution for attempted robbery held for jury.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; John J. Allen, Judge.

Harold Lee, George Chan, and Lou Horn were convicted of attempt to commit robbery of the second degree, and they appeal.

Affirmed.

Frank M. Carr and W. W. Laidley, both of Oakland, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and William F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM.

Appellants, with Lee Chong, James Loo You, and a woman named Lonie Chan were charged by a complaint filed in the police court of the city of Oakland with the offenses of robbery and conspiracy to commit robbery and extortion. On December 10, 1931, after a preliminary examination, the charges against said Lee Chong and James Loo You were dismissed, and appellants, with Lonie Chan, were held to answer to the Superior Court on the charge of robbery. The district attorney of Alameda county thereafter filed an information charging the four last mentioned with that crime, and later, over their objection, filed an amended information by which was added a second count charging them with the crime of attempt to commit robbery.

The four were duly tried, and Lonie Chan was acquitted on both counts. Appellants were acquitted on the first count and convicted of the crime of attempt to commit robbery of the second degree. Motions by the latter in arrest of judgment and for a new trial were denied, and the appeal is from the order denying a new trial and the judgment of conviction.

[1] Appellants claim that it was error to permit the filing of the amended complaint, for the reason that an attempt to commit robbery was not shown by the evidence taken at the preliminary examination, and that their motion to strike therefrom the second count mentioned should have been granted.

The complaining witness, a Chinese named Yip Wong Sun, with one Lin Hoy, conducted a barber shop on Eighth street in Oakland. They lived in rooms at the rear of the shop. This witness testified that on November 20, 1931, at about 10 p. m., at the suggestion of said James Loo You, he visited a beauty parlor conducted by Lonie Chan for the purpose of having his hair cut. He was invited into an inner room, and upon his entering she made an outcry. Appellants, with another Chinese, thereupon made their appearance. They seized the witness, threatened him with violence, and took from his person a sum of money and certain jewelry. Upon these acts was based the charge of robbery contained in the first count of the information. According to Lonie Chan, when the complaining witness entered her shop, he made improper advances, which led her to call for assistance, and appellants responded. The complaining witness testified that he was held a prisoner in the Chan house until the morning of November 21, 1931, when he was taken by appellants to his own shop for the purpose of getting from him the further sum of $600. During the night he was induced to sign a writing in Chinese which he copied from a draft prepared by appellants. This paper corroborated the story of Lonie Chan, and therein the witness agreed to pay the last-mentioned sum. The writing was found under a rug in the Chan house by police officers. The witness also testified that, when the appellants brought him to his shop, they were armed with pistols and threatened violence, if the above sum should not be produced. Upon his arrival, he ran through the shop and locked himself in a lavatory, at the same time calling to his partner for help and stating that appellants intended to rob him. The partner testified that appellant George Chan said, "We came to get some money," but, after some conversation, appellants departed. According to a police officer, appellants admitted that the complaining witness remained at the Chan house all night, one stating that they were holding him in order that they might obtain a warrant for his arrest. They also admitted that he signed the document mentioned, but all denied that any violence was used or that they were armed. The complaining witness, his partner and a police officer testified substantially as above both at the preliminary examination and at the trial.

As contended by respondent, this testimony tended to establish two separate offenses—first, the alleged robbery at the Chan house on November 20, and an attempted robbery on the following morning, and the evidence was such as to justify the amendment complained of. People v. Bird, 212 Cal. 632, 300 P. 23.

[2] Appellants contend that it does not appear that the complaining witness had any sum of which he could be robbed, or that any robbery was attempted.

Under the decisions, it was unnecessary to show that the witness possessed any sum, and the evidence was sufficient to support the charge of an attempted robbery (People v. Lee Kong, 95 Cal. 666, 30 P. 800, 17 L. R. A. 626, 29 Am. St. Rep. 165; People v. Holden, 13 Cal. App. 354, 109 P. 495; In re Magidson, 32 Cal. App. 566, 163 P. 689).

[3] With respect to certain instructions which appellants claim were erroneously refused, the record discloses that the first and second were given; the third referred to the presumption of innocence; and the fourth to the evidence required to overcome this presumption. Other instructions were given which fully covered the matters contained in those offered by appellants, and their refusal was not error. The fifth required the jury to find, before a conviction could be had on the second count in the information, that the complaining witness had in his possession or immediate control the sum of $600. Such a finding under the cases cited above was unnecessary, and the instruction was properly refused. The sixth was fully covered by another instruction given by the court.

We find no merit in the further claim that the court erred in its rulings on the admissibility of certain evidence.

[4] Appellants were sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison. They assign this as error, claiming that they should have been sentenced to imprisonment in the county jail.

As stated, they were convicted of the crime of attempt to commit robbery of the second degree. Section 213 of the Penal Code provides that robbery in the second degree shall be punishable by imprisonment in the state prison "for not less than five years," and robbery in the second degree by imprisonment in the state prison "for not less than one year." Subdivision 1 of section 664 of the same code provides that, if the offense attempted is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison for five years or more, the person guilty of such attempt is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison for a term not exceeding one-half the longest term of imprisonment prescribed upon conviction of the offense so attempted, provided that, if the crime attempted is robbery, such attempt shall be punishable by imprisonment in the state prison for a term of not more than twenty years; and that, if the offense attempted is punishable in the state prison for any term less than five years, the person guilty of such offense is punishable by imprisonment in the county jail for not more than one year.

It has been held that the word "punishable" as used in the latter section refers to the maximum punishment which may be inflicted (Ex parte Hope, 59 Cal. 423; People v. Superior Court of City and County of San Francisco, 116 Cal. App. 412, 2 P.(2d) 843); and that under this section the maximum punishment for an attempt to commit robbery is the same regardless of the degree of the crime attempted (People v. Arguero, 113 Cal. App. 424, 298 P. 520). We are satisfied that respondent's contention is correct; namely, that for the offense committed by appellants they were punishable under subdivision 1 of the section, and were properly sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison.

[5] While there were elements of improbability in the testimony of the complaining witness, we cannot say that his testimony as a whole was unworthy of belief. It was corroborated in material particulars by the testimony of other witnesses, and the question of its weight was for the jury. People v. Raich, 26 Cal. App. 286, 146 P. 907; People v. Chesney, 72 Cal. App. 570, 237 P. 793; People v. Castro, 85 Cal. App. 228, 259 P. 117.

The verdict was fairly sustained, and no error has been shown which would warrant a reversal.

The order and judgment appealed from are accordingly affirmed.

FARRELL v. MIRAMAR HOTEL CO., Limited et al.

Civ. 8287.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California.

Sept. 1, 1932.

1. Fraud ⇐58(1).

Fraud may be proved by circumstantial evidence.

2. Corporations ⇐80(11).

In action to rescind stock purchase for fraud, plaintiff had burden to establish fraud; presumption being in favor of fair dealing.

3. Fraud ⇐58(1).

Fraud need not be proved beyond reasonable doubt, proof by preponderance of evidence being sufficient (Code Civ. Proc. § 2061, subd. 5).

4. Corporations ⇐80(11).

In action to rescind stock purchase for fraud, finding that individual defendant's agent misrepresented stock as treasury stock and that individual defendant received proceeds from sale of stock and club memberships held sustained by evidence.

5. Corporations ⇐80(1).

Record held to show that misrepresentations respecting stock caused buyer "injury" entitling him to rescission of stock and club memberships purchase for fraud.

Record disclosed that if there had been no fraud, money paid for stock would have gone into treasury of the corporation, a hotel company, to be used for constructing new building, which had been deemed for hotel company's best interests; that proceeds of sale of memberships in club would have been used for erection of club improvements and nothing more would have been spent therefor, and that consequently there would have been no indebtedness on that score against club, but that buyer's real position because of fraud was that money paid for stock was not used for improvements considered advisable for best interests of company and not available therefor, and that as to memberships in club, far greater and more expensive improvements had been made to club property than had been represented to buyer would be made, and cost thereof was outstanding indebtedness against club.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Injury," see Words and Phrases.]

6. Appeal and error ⇐1061(3).

In action to rescind stock purchase for fraud, allegedly erroneous refusal of nonsuit held not prejudicial where, at conclusion of entire case, evidence warranted finding of misrepresentation.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Fletcher Bowron, Judge.

Action by H. E. Farrell against the Miramar Hotel Company, Limited, Gilbert F. Stevenson, and others. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff against named defendant Stevenson, such defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Richard L. North, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Fogel & Beman, of Los Angeles, and John W. Loucks, of Pomona, for respondent.

BEAUMONT, Justice pro tem.

This is an action to rescind a contract on the ground of fraud. In 1926, Gilbert F. Stevenson and his wife owned certain real property in Santa Monica upon which were situated a hotel and an apartment house. A corporation was formed, at their initiation, under the name of Miramar Hotel Company, Limited. The real property, subject to a mortgage of $500,000, was conveyed to the hotel company, as said corporation will be hereinafter designated. The consideration for this transfer was 799 shares of the capital stock thereof, issued under permit from the corporation commissioner. The corporation commissioner also gave permission to the hotel company to sell to the public 701 shares of its capital stock for the purpose of obtaining funds necessary for construction of an addition to its building. All money so realized was to be impounded until released by the commissioner. At the time of the formation of the hotel company, another corporation was organized under the name of Miramar Club of California. This corporation was formed for purpose of conducting a "beach club" in conjunction with the hotel. The Stevensons were the owners of substantially the entire outstanding stock of both corporations. Clyde R. Commons was employed by Gilbert F. Stevenson to sell certain of his shares of the capital stock of the hotel company and "founders'" life memberships in the club. He, in turn, employed one J. E. Griffin as a salesman. Griffin effected a sale of two shares of stock and two memberships to H. E. Farrell. Action was instituted against both corporations, Gilbert F. Stevenson and wife. Judgment of nonsuit was entered as to Mrs. Stevenson, and judgment was in favor of defendant corporations. Plaintiff recovered against Gilbert F. Stevenson in the sum of $3,300 and interest. Said last-named defendant has appealed upon the ground of insufficiency of evidence; that the decision is against law, and because of alleged errors occurring at the trial.

In August, 1926, appellant's agent, Griffin, called at respondent's home and, not finding him, left word that he desired to see respondent about a business matter. Respondent thereafter went to the office of Griffin, which was situated in the hotel company's building. Griffin told respondent he was selling shares of stock and units of the two corporations; that it was a sort of "two-headed concern"; that the plan was to be "a share of stock in the hotel company and a share of stock or a membership in the beach club"; that there was being issued "something like 2500 units or shares in this organization and with that money they were to build a hotel up on top of the palisades of the Miramar Park; they were to build a beach club below. * * * These moneys that were to be raised by the sale of this stock, were to be put into that construction"; that the club "would own all the property." At the time of the negotiations, Griffin offered to sell respondent the stock on a part-payment plan, and stated he "was authorized by his corporation to make that allowance" to respondent. Respondent further testified that as a part of the inducement to purchase the stock, Griffin gave him a pamphlet upon which appeared: "Statement of Physical Assets of the Corporation Which Owns the Miramar Properties. * * *" This pamphlet contained a statement that there were 1,500 shares of capital stock of which 795 were issued, and that the "balance are in the treasury unissued." It contained the further statement: "A new addition is to be built at once onto the present apartment wing." Respondent's testimony is further to the effect that relying upon the oral statements of Griffin and upon the printed instruments handed him by Griffin, he believed he was purchasing part of the unissued treasury stock of the hotel company; that so believing, he accepted Griffin's offer, signed the application presented to him by Griffin, and gave him a draft in favor of the Miramar Club for $1,650; that if he had known the stock was the individual stock of appellant and not treasury stock, he would not have purchased it. The application respondent signed was headed "Miramar Club of California" and was for a "founder" membership, price $1,650. Respondent, still relying on Griffin's representations and believing he was purchasing treasury stock, procured another share of stock and life membership September 4, 1926; this latter being for his son. Commons and Griffin maintained their offices for selling appellant's stock in the hotel building and it was there respondent carried on said negotiations. Neither Commons nor Griffin appeared at the trial as a witness. No treasury stock was sold to any person. Certificates for the two shares of stock and for the two memberships were delivered to respondent.

There was introduced in evidence a letter received by respondent, which is as follows: "Dear Mr. Farrell: Enclosed are two of the new blanks, which we hope are in accordance with the rulings of the Corporation Commissioner of the State. The original one signed by you, was found incomplete after consultation with him. Would you be so good then, to sign each of the white ones and mail in the enclosed envelope to Mr. Clyde R. Commons, 815 South Hill St., Los Angeles. It is merely a detail of complete and accurate records." This letter was dated October 6, 1926, and was signed by Griffin. The statement therein regarding consultation with the corporation commissioner was utterly false. One of the inclosures was an application for membership in the club, price $600, and the other was in part as follows: "Miramar Hotel Company Limited * * * A California Corporation. Capital Stock $1,500,000. Divided into 1500 shares. All Common Stock and each share participates equally in the ownership, profits and management of the Corporation. I hereby purchase one share of the Common Capital Stock of the Miramar Hotel Company Limited of Santa Monica, California, for the sum of $1,050.00. * * * This application may be rejected by the Company by refund of moneys paid hereon." Both applications were dated September 3, 1926, when received by respondent.

Appellant's testimony, in part, follows:

"Q. Did you have anything to do with making the application to the Commissioner of Corporations for the permit to sell the stock of the Hotel Corporation? A. I consulted some lawyer probably who drew it up and he might have handed me the application to sign.

"Q. You did not read it, did you, when you signed it? A. Probably, it was owing to how much I trusted the lawyer that drew it up. * * *

"Q. And you formed the corporation for the sale of that property? A. Some five years after I owned it, yes.

"Q. And before this date that you sold this stock to Mr. Farrell? A. Yes.

"Q. And you took some 700 shares of the common stock? A. For my interest, for my interest in the hotel. * * *

"The Court: I would like to ask a few questions. Mr. Stevenson, do you know how stock got into the hands of the broker or anyone else and was sold? A. He got it from me. He was appointed the person to handle it by me. He had a broker's license, and I was afraid to have anything to do with it myself, and I wanted all the printed matter made by one that had been successful in club work.

"Q. You authorized him to print anything that pertained to the sale of the stock? A. Yes, he was a broker to handle it in a legal way, and I did not pay any attention to it, to any printed matter that was put out.

"Q. What did you authorize him to do, if anything, about the sale of the stock? A. He used his own judgment about handling it. He had handled some other clubs and appeared to be an expert in that line. * * *

"Q. Do you know how the stock got into his hands, or in the hands of Mr. Griffin? A. Well, they made requisitions to have some stock issued about once a week, I think on Saturday afternoons, what they had to have issued.

"Q. What they had to have issued? A. What they had sold, and they wanted the stock in order to deliver it. I had the stock; I was selling my stock.

"Q. You were selling your own stock? A. My own stock; that was the only stock that could be used, because the permit of the Corporation Commissioner was that the treasury stock was to build the hotel and I could not build that club and sell any treasury stock; I had to sell my own. It cost about $150,000.00 to furnish that down on the beach there, and I put my stock money that I received in to that club. If I had sold treasury stock how could I use the money for that? I advanced the money to build that club.

"Q. And then took some security for it, did you? A. No security only what security I have by controlling the Board of Directors of it.

"Q. You did not donate that money to the corporation? A. No, it stood on the books as they owing that much for what I advanced to build it. But the club is out of debt and is considered one of the finest on the beach.

"Q. Did Mr. Commons ever show you any of the printed matter? A. Why, yes. I would see it on his desk when I would go in there.

"Q. Have you ever seen any of these forms that he was using? A. I would look at them, I would ask him if they were all right, if I said anything to him, yes. * * *

"Q. And you think you have seen both of these forms and knew he was using these forms to sell the stock? A. Why, I probably have. I would not pay much attention to them only ask him if they were all legal.

"Q. I am referring to Plaintiff's Exhibit 1 [the first application] and Plaintiff's Exhibit 4 [applications inclosed in Griffin's letter of October 6]. Then you did see Mr. Griffin in the office there? A. Why, yes.

"Q. And you knew he was one of the salesmen? A. He was one of Mr. Commons' salesmen, yes. * * *

"Q. When did Mr. Commons come into this transaction, what date? A. I don't remember,

"Q. Do you remember whether it was before or after the 24th of August, 1926? A. Why, he was around there in July.

"Q. Was he working for you as your broker on the 24th of August, 1926? A. I presume so.

"Q. Are you sure that he was? A. I am sure he was working, yes.

"Q. Working as your broker? A. Yes.

"Q. At the Miramar Hotel? A. Yes.

"Q. On the date this transaction took place did you pay Mr. Griffin any money yourself, by your own personal check? A. I have paid Mr. Griffin part of the money and handed the rest over for the other parties at his solicitation on account of needing money before the Judge [Commons] came down on Sundays or something.

"Q. At whose solicitation? A. Mr. Griffin's.

"Q. Then you have paid him money? A. That check that was left for me, that money Mr. Farrell testified he came down and left a check for his son's stock, and I knew what Mr. Commons' share would be to go to him, and I give it to him, and then Mr. Commons, the balance was settled up with him, yes."

The check delivered to appellant by respondent on September 4, 1926, was made payable to the order of Miramar Club for the sum of $1,650. It was indorsed: "Miramar Club of California, By Gilbert F. Stevenson, Treasurer." It also contained a further indorsement as follows: "Pay to the order of The Citizens National Bank of Los Angeles, Cal. Western Mutual Life Assn. G. F. Stevenson." It appears that appellant was secretary and manager of the Western Mutual Life Association.

[1-3] Fraud may be proved by circumstantial evidence. Hageman v. Colombet, 52 Cal. App. 350, 198 P. 842; 12 Cal. Jur. 829. The burden was upon respondent to establish the existence of fraud, the presumption being in favor of fair dealing. 12 Cal. Jur. 816. Nevertheless, as was said in Eade v. Reich (Cal. App.) 7 P.(2d) 1043, 1045: "Fraud need not be proved beyond a reasonable doubt (Bullard v. His Creditors, 56 Cal. 600, 603), it being sufficient if it be established by a preponderance of the evidence (Code Civ. Proc. § 2061, subd. 5; Noll v. Baida, 202 Cal. 98, 259 P. 433). As the court said in Edmonds v. Wilcox, 178 Cal. 222, 172 P. 1101, 1102: '* * * All judicial expressions concerning the necessity of clear and satisfactory proof of fraud must be construed in the light of the fundamental rule that a preponderance of the evidence controls in a civil case.'"

[4] We are convinced the testimony of respondent, together with the circumstances disclosed by the evidence, amply sustains the court's finding as to fraud. Certainly the letter of October 6, 1926, containing the two applications, is evidence from which intent to deceive may be inferred. 12 Cal. Jur. pp. 830, 831; Butler v. Collins, 12 Cal. 457; Walberg v. Underwood, 41 Cal. App. 679, 183 P. 254; Smith v. Reynolds, 94 Vt. 28, 108 A. 697; 27 Cor. Jur. 40. We quote here, as particularly applicable, the finding of the court regarding the letter. It is as follows: "The reference to the Corporation Commissioner was pure fiction. The writer had not consulted the Corporation Commissioner, and there was no effort to comply with his rulings." This is fully sustained by the evidence. There is no question that respondent relied on the statements made to him, and in particular that he believed he was purchasing treasury stock of the hotel company. And there is no question as to agency. The evidence shows appellant gave Commons and Griffin full power to make the representations they made. In fact, the issue as stated in appellant's brief is: "The entire case has dwindled to the single proposition of whether or not appellant represented to respondent that the two shares of stock in Miramar Hotel Company, Limited, purchased by respondent, were treasury stock, and said paragraph VI of the findings of fact decides that he did." In addition, however, appellant calls attention to paragraph XIV of the findings, which is to the effect that appellant, and not the hotel company or the club, received the proceeds from the sale of the stock and memberships. We have heretofore referred to the evidence regarding this, and we are of the opinion that it sustains the finding so attacked.

[5] Appellant urges that the decision is against law. He claims that even if fraud be conceded, it has not been shown that respondent suffered injury. What would have been respondent's situation, if there had been no fraud? The money he paid for his stock would have gone into the treasury of the hotel company, to be used for constructing a new building which had been deemed for the best interests of the hotel company's business. The proceeds of the sale of the memberships in the club would have been used for the erection of the club improvements and nothing more would have been spent therefor. Consequently, there would have been no indebtedness on that score against the club. What was respondent's real position? He and the others who purchased stock in the hotel company had their stock, but the money paid therefor was not used for the improvements considered advisable for the best interests of the company, and it was not available therefor. As to his membership in the club: Far greater and more expensive improvements had been made to the club properties than had been represented to respondent would be made, and the cost of all of those provided by the money "advanced" by appellant was an outstanding indebtedness against the club. We believe there was injury under the principles announced in Spreckels v. Gorrill, 152 Cal. 383, 92 P. 1011, and Munson v. Fishburn, 183 Cal. 206, 190 P. 808. See, also, J. B. Colt v. Freitas, 76 Cal. App. 278, 244 P. 916; Denovan v. Golden State Woolen Mills, 104 Cal. App. 504, 286 P. 714; Stillwell v. Rankin, 55 Mont. 130, 174 P. 186; 12 Cal. Jur. 766–7.

[6] Appellant complains of the denial of the motion for a nonsuit as to appellant. The motion was specifically made on the ground that no misrepresentation was made. The evidence we have heretofore referred to as to the making of the representations was before the court for consideration at the time the motion was acted upon. The motion was properly denied. In addition, there was no prejudice to appellant when the entire evidence is considered. "If, upon the conclusion of the whole case, there is evidence upon the material issues warranting the submission of the cause to the jury, the question of whether the court erred in denying a nonsuit becomes of no consequence." Peters v. Southern Pacific Co., 160 Cal. 48, 52, 116 P. 400, 402.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Clair S. Tappaan, Judge.

Action by Josephine Mannion against Simeon Baldwin and others. From the judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals.

Reversed.

Fred N. Arnoldy, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

John Perry Wood and John F. McCarthy, both of Los Angeles, for respondents Simeon and Helen D. Baldwin.

Walter A. Ham, of Los Angeles, for respondents Sykes and others.

TUTTLE, Justice pro tem.

This is an action brought to recover the sum of $7,500 which it is contended was paid for stock issued and sold in violation of a permit granted under the Corporate Securities Act (St. 1917, p. 673, as amended). The trial court found to the contrary, and judgment was entered in favor of defendants. The appeal is taken from the judgment.

The sole question before this court is the sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings.

In May, 1927, respondent Sherman M. Sykes and respondent Simeon Baldwin entered into a partnership to conduct a retail clothing business. Baldwin furnished some $800. Sykes advanced no money whatever. Each owned a half interest in the business. From time to time Baldwin advanced more money for the business, until there was owing him some $10,000. Eventually he became dissatisfied with the manner in which the business was being conducted, and agreed to sell his interest in the partnership to Sykes for the sum of $10,000 and to accept in payment thereof two promissory notes for $5,000 each. In the meantime a corporation known as "The Trousseau Shop, Inc.," was formed by Baldwin and his wife, Helen D. Baldwin, and Gladys Sykes, the wife of Sherman Sykes, for the purpose of taking over the partnership business, and on October 24, 1927, the commissioner of corporations granted a permit authorizing the corporation to sell 200 shares of its capital stock at par ($100) for cash. On December 1, 1927, Sykes, his wife, and his mother executed and delivered to Baldwin the two promissory notes above mentioned for $5,000 each in payment of his share in the partnership; and on the same day the directors of the corporation authorized Baldwin as president and Mrs. Sykes as secretary to issue five certificates calling for a total of 160 shares of stock. Certificates numbered 1, 2, and 3 were issued for one share, each, as qualifying shares to the incorporators; and certificates numbered 4 and 5 were issued to Gladys Sykes for 75 and 82 shares, respectively. Certificate No. 5 was thereupon delivered to Baldwin as security for the payment of said promissory notes; and certificate No. 4 was reissued as certificate No. 6, for the same number of shares, 75, with the name of the holder thereof left blank. Baldwin and his wife and Mrs. Sykes as directors of the corporation thereupon adopted a resolution authorizing the purchase from themselves and Sherman Sykes of the partnership business, subject to its obligations, for $16,000 cash; and Baldwin, his wife, Sykes, and his wife then joined in an instrument transferring to the corporation the partnership assets subject to its obligations.

On the next day, December 2, Baldwin and Mrs. Sykes met at the bank and Baldwin delivered his certified check for $16,000, payable to the defendant corporation. This check was then and there deposited to the account of the corporation and immediately withdrawn therefrom and paid back to Baldwin in the form of a cashier's check for a like amount.

On December 5, 1927, defendant Gladys Sykes met plaintiff at the bank. Mrs. Sykes signed certificate No. 6 as secretary (it had already been signed by Baldwin as president of the corporation) and delivered the same to plaintiff and received from plaintiff a check for $7,500, which was deposited to the account of the corporation. The sum of $5,000 was thereupon withdrawn from said account and paid over to Baldwin in payment of one of his notes. The balance, $2,500, remained in the bank account of the corporation.

It appears that plaintiff had a nephew for whom she was desirous of securing a position, and the understanding was that he would be given work if she made the investment. In any event, as soon as she paid for the stock the nephew started to work for defendant corporation. Within about a year's time after the investment was made, defendant corporation was adjudicated a bankrupt.

[1] It is the rule in this state that permits issued by the corporation commissioner for the sale of stock must be strictly complied with. Parrish v. American Ry. Emp. Pub. Corp., 83 Cal. App. 298, 256 P. 590. No "thinly-veiled attempt to circumvent the manifest purpose of this salutary legislation [Blue Sky Law] should go unwhipped of justice." People v. McCalla, 63 Cal. App. 783, 220 P. 436, 439. Speaking of the Corporate Securities Act, and evasions of the provisions thereof, our courts have said: "If such subterfuges were permitted, the statute would soon become a dead letter, and the object it was designed to accomplish would be frustrated by the very persons against whose practices it is directed." Domenigoni v. Imperial Live Stock, etc., Co., 189 Cal. 467, 474, 209 P. 36, 39.

As we have stated, on December 1st all the 160 shares (except qualifying shares to incorporators) were issued to Mrs. Sykes, and the transfer of the partnership assets to the corporation was made. No cash whatever was paid for the stock. This constituted a direct violation of the permit to sell for cash. It is true that on the following day Baldwin handed Mrs. Sykes a check for $16,000, but this was immediately returned to Baldwin. Here is what he had to say about it:

"Q. * * * When you gave this $16,000 check of yours, payable to the Trousseau Shop, Inc., it was your intention and the understanding, that you would receive right back— A. You bet your life it was. * * *

"Q. You were not letting go of this money? A. I should say not; no, sir."

There is evidence upon the part of defendants that this $16,000 was loaned to Mrs. Sykes so that she could pay for the stock. No note or any other evidence of the indebtedness was produced.

It is a significant fact that just as soon as this $7,500 was received from plaintiff, defendant Baldwin was on the spot to take $5,000 thereof in payment of one of his notes against Mrs. Sykes. Defendants contend that this stock (sold to plaintiff) was the personal property of Mrs. Sykes, and that she therefore did not need a permit to sell the same. Why was the whole amount deposited in the account of the corporation, and the sum of $2,500 allowed to remain there?

[2] The only reasonable conclusion and inference which can be drawn from the facts in this case is that the stock issued on December 1st was in violation of the terms of the permit, the consideration being not cash, but the partnership business.

[3-7] It is earnestly contended by respondents that there is substantial evidence to support the finding that the stock in question was the personal property of Mrs. Sykes, hence her sale to plaintiff did not come within the purview of the Corporate Securities Act. People v. Pace, 73 Cal. App. 548, 238 P. 1089. The answer is that Mrs. Sykes was a director of the company and present when the unauthorized issue of the stock was made. It does not lie in her mouth to now say that her sale was a private one. She knew that the stock was void, and sold it to an innocent party with this knowledge, and must be held liable for any loss which resulted. Defendants Baldwin and his wife and Gladys Sykes were all directors who were present at the meeting which voted to issue the stock in violation of the permit. They are active participants, and equally liable. O'Connell et ux. v. Union Drilling & Petroleum Co. et al. (Cal. App.) 8 P.(2d) 867. It is true that they did not actually participate in the sale to plaintiff, but the uncontradicted evidence shows that at the meeting of December 1st, when the stock was issued, the directors knew that it was going to Mrs. Mannion. We must assume that the corporation received value in an amount equal to the par value of the stock which it sold to Mrs. Sykes, who had knowledge of the fact that it was issued in violation of the permit. Under such conditions the corporation should share the liability for reimbursement. It does not appear that defendant Sherman M. Sykes was in any manner connected with the issuing of the stock, and he therefore cannot be compelled to reimburse plaintiff.

Manifestly the transaction which took place on December 2d was a sham and was designed and carried out to circumvent the conditions of the permit and thereby make it possible to solicit and obtain from Mrs. Mannion the cash with which to pay Baldwin part of the money he had advanced to the partnership.

We are aware of the rule that where the evidence is conflicting on issues of fact, the finding of the trial court will not be disturbed. There is no pretense, however, that any cash was paid for the stock when it was issued to Mrs. Sykes on December 1st, and consequently the trial court's decision sustaining the legality of the transaction obviously violates the rule enunciated in the cases we have cited, which, as shown, require strict compliance with the terms of the permit.

[8] It is not disputed that stock issued contrary to the terms of a permit granted by the commissioner of corporations is illegal and void, and that the purchaser is entitled to recover the money paid therefor. Tatterson v. Kehrlein, 88 Cal. App. 34, 263 P. 285, and cases cited therein.

There is no evidence to show that plaintiff knew that she was buying stock which had been sold in violation of the permit. This contention of respondents is without merit.

Summing up the entire matter, the evidence shows, without substantial conflict, that the stock issued on December 1st was not sold for cash, but that the consideration therefor was the transfer of the assets of the partnership, and hence in contravention of the terms of the permit; that all defendants except Sherman M. Sykes participated in such issue and knew at the time that the 75 shares were to be sold to plaintiff; that the sum of $7,500 paid by plaintiff for such stock was deposited in the bank account of the corporation. We might add that in our opinion the evidence shows that the whole transaction was a bald attempt to circumvent the Corporate Securities Act, so that defendant Baldwin might obtain most of the money which he admitted he knew was coming from plaintiff. The last chapter in the episode was the bankruptcy of the corporation within a year after the stock was purchased.

The judgment is reversed.

BELSER v. AMERICAN TRUST CO.

Civ. 8592.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California.

Aug. 12, 1932.

Rehearing Denied Sept. 10, 1932. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 10, 1932.

1. Evidence ⇐588.

Testimony may be inherently so improbable, or rendered so by other evidence, as to warrant rejection, though court did not see and hear witness (Code Civ. Proc. § 1847).

2. Deeds ⇐208(2).

Plaintiff's testimony that there was manual tradition of deed found in deceased father's safe deposit box held not to require credence under circumstances (Code Civ. Proc. § 1847).

Circumstances disclosed that, after father's death, plaintiff inquired as to what his father had done with property in question, and stated that his father had freely talked of selling the property, and there were other circumstances which warranted trial court in disbelieving plaintiff's testimony and concluding that he never had seen gift deed until after safe deposit box had been opened.

3. Evidence ⇐588.

There being circumstances in evidence impairing accuracy of plaintiff's testimony, it was within trial court's province to determine credit and weight to be given thereto, though plaintiff testified by deposition (Code Civ. Proc. § 1847).

4. Deeds ⇐56(2).

Manual tradition of deed does not constitute "delivery," unless coupled with grantor's intent to divest himself of title.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Walter Perry Johnson, Judge.

Action by Paul A. Belser against the American Trust Company, executor of the last will and testament of Julius Henry Belser, deceased. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

J. E. White, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Heller, Ehrman, White & McAuliffe and McKinstry & Haber-Peirce Coombes, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

WOODWARD, Justice pro tem.

This is an appeal from a judgment for the defendant in an action wherein plaintiff sought to obtain possession of an unrecorded deed of gift executed by his father, Julius Henry Belser, and found after the latter's death in a safe deposit box. The sole question involved is whether said deed was delivered by decedent to appellant.

Stripped of unnecessary minutæ, the facts are: During the month of April, 1925, appellant and his wife, Mary E. Belser, decided to purchase certain real property situate in the county of Alameda and described as lot 26 in block lettered F, Lakewood Park, city of Piedmont. The purchase price of said property was $7,750, of which amount Julius Henry Belser paid $7,000 and appellant $750. Julius Henry Belser took title in his name, and immediately thereafter appellant and his wife were given possession of and lived on the premises until Christmas, 1926, when marital differences arose resulting in a divorce. Shortly thereafter appellant moved to Honolulu, while his wife continued to occupy the property until the death of Julius Henry Belser, which occurred on April 18, 1930. When decedent's safe deposit box was opened, there were found therein the gift deed in question, bearing date of October 19, 1926, and the following letter in the handwriting of appellant: "October 20, 1926. My dear Father: I am mailing you today under separate cover the gift deed from you to me for the Ranleigh Way property which I have been keeping about me for some time. As I have no safe place to keep this will you please put it in your safe deposit box as I am afraid I might lose it or have it stolen some time on my work. Do not record this deed as yet for as long as my affairs are still unsettled from my past business experience I do not want any of these creditors to make any further trouble for me. Your loving son, Paul."

On the ground that it is unsupported by evidence and contrary to his own "uncontradicted" testimony, appellant attacks finding No. 2, which, in substance, is to the effect that Julius Henry Belser signed the deed in question without any intention to convey immediate title thereto, or otherwise; that said deed was never delivered to Paul A. Belser, but was retained by the grantor in his own exclusive possession and control until the time of his death.

Before proceeding to discuss the testimony in detail, it may be observed preliminarily that appellant did testify that there had been a manual tradition of the deed; or, in other words, that his father had personally handed him the instrument which he retained for twenty-four hours, and then returned to his father, at the latter's suggestion, for safekeeping only. It is patent, of course, that the trial court disregarded appellant's testimony entirely, and the novel point is made that since appellant, not being a resident of this country, testified by deposition, the court was not afforded an opportunity to observe his demeanor as a witness, and for that reason was bound by his uncontradicted statements.

As early as 1860, the Supreme Court of this state had occasion to pass upon the right of trial judges to reject testimony of an inherently improbable nature. In the case of Blankman v. Vallejo, 15 Cal. 639, 646, the court declared succinctly and incisively: "We do not understand that the credulity of a court must necessarily correspond with the vigor and positiveness with which a witness swears." In recent years, however, the statement of this rule most frequently quoted is found in the case of Davis v. Judson, 159 Cal. 121, 128, 113 P. 147, wherein the court says: "While it is the general rule that the uncontradicted testimony of a witness to a particular fact may not be disregarded, but should be accepted by the court as proof of the fact, this rule has its exceptions. The most positive testimony of a witness may be contradicted by inherent improbabilities as to its accuracy contained in the witness' own statement of the transaction; or there may be circumstances in evidence in connection with the matter, which satisfy the court of its falsity; the manner of the witness in testifying may impress the court with a doubt as to the accuracy of his statement and influence it to disregard his positive testimony as to a particular fact; and as it is within the province of the trial court to determine what credit and weight shall be given to the testimony of any witness, this court cannot control its finding or conclusion denying the testimony credence, unless it appears that there are no matters or circumstances which at all impair its accuracy." To the same effect: Caldwell v. Weiner, 203 Cal. 543, 264 P. 1100; California-Calaveras Min. Co. v. Walls, 170 Cal. 285, 303, 149 P. 595; Blanc v. Connor, 167 Cal. 719, 722, 141 P. 217; Estate of Tompkins (Cal. App.) 11 P.(2d) 886; Corcoran v. Ward, 115 Cal. App. 180, 182, 1 P.(2d) 455; Cowan v. Hill, 109 Cal. App. 656, 659, 293 P. 871.

In the light of this rule it is manifest, of course, that we cannot control the court's finding denying credence to appellant's testimony, unless there are no matters or circumstances which in any degree impair, or tend to impair, its accuracy.

Paul A. Belser testified that, about a year and a half after the property had been purchased, he received the following undated letter from his father: "Fairmont Hotel. Dear Paul. I had a talk with my lawyer and he told me to have you write me a letter saying that you were asking me to put this Gvt Deed in my safety box, so as to take care of it for you as you not having a safety box to take care of it he says that if that is not done and anything should happen to me your gift deed would be no good and would haft to be put through court and you could not get anything so you better send me that letter right away hope all are well and that you all are getting in shape. Send me also the name of the street you are now on or also the way to get there. With love to all. J. H. Belser." In connection with this letter, which was admitted in evidence, appellant testified that on October 20, 1926, two days after receiving the communication, his father called on him at his place of work and personally placed the deed of gift in his hands; that he put the deed in his pocket, and after returning home from his work on said day, wrote and mailed the letter signed "Paul"; that he did not inclose the deed with the letter because he could not find a large envelope; that on the following day he mailed said deed to his father in San Francisco. So far as the evidence discloses, appellant did not communicate the fact of his father's visit to any one, nor does he claim to have seen the deed again until after the father's death. On cross-examination appellant was asked why he had stated in the letter that he had been keeping the deed "about me for some time," when in fact it bore date of October 19, 1926, and could not have been in his possession for more than twenty-four hours. Appellant's reply was that "the wording of the letter is no consequence," and that "some time is any time." It could scarcely be contended that this reply was convincing or unequivocal. If appellant had the deed in his possession at the time he wrote the letter, as claimed by him, his statement to the effect that he had been keeping the deed for some time called for an explanation. Furthermore, the witness admitted that just after his father's funeral he may have stated to Albert J. Callahan: "I wonder what my father did with the Piedmont property?" Further on in the cross-examination we find these questions and answers:

"Q. Do you remember telling Mr. Callahan at the time that this conversation took place which you state was on your way to the Ferry that you had put $1,000. in your father's property and you were going to get your money back? A. Yes, I do. * * *

"Q. Do you remember at the time this conversation took place between you and Callahan, Callahan's wife asked you that you must have a memorandum or paper of some kind to show your interest in the property? A. She never did.

"Q. Don't you remember that you answered her and said this that you had no such paper; this deal was naturally on a father and son basis? A. No, sir, I do not remember. * * *

"Q. Can you state positively you made no statement to Mrs. Callahan? A. No, I cannot state positively.

"Q. You may have made them? A. I may have."

It may be observed parenthetically that these were singular statements to come from one who had received a deed of gift to real property and had returned it to the grantor merely for safe-keeping.

With reference to the same conversation, Albert J. Callahan testified: "Paul said, 'What did my father do with the Piedmont property?' I told him—Oh, I thought for a minute before answering, and then I said, 'Paul,' I said, 'your father told me of that transaction,' and I said, 'You lost all your equity in that because you failed to live up to your agreement with him,' and he came back and said, 'Well, I paid $2,000.00 into that property and I am going to get it back.' I said, 'Why, Paul, you agreed when you were divorced in 1927 that you would have nothing further to do with that property, and you told your father that he could rent the property to your former wife for $35.00 a month,' and Paul said, 'Well, just before I left for Honolulu in 1928, my father told me that all he wanted to have out of the property was the money he had put into it, and that if he sold the property, then I would get everything over and above that.'" According to this witness the appellant did not, during that conversation, make any allusion to the deed of gift, but, on the contrary declared he had asked his father for some writing "but he wouldn't give me anything."

[1-3] While appellant's silence as to the existence of the gift deed, of which he must have known if he actually had it in his possession at one time, is not, standing alone, inconsistent with delivery, nevertheless his inquiry as to what his father had done with the property in question, his statement to Callahan that his father had freely talked of selling the property, together with other evidence and circumstances, may, and doubtless did, cause the trial court to disbelieve his testimony and conclude that he never saw the gift deed until after the safe deposit box had been opened. We therefore cannot hold that there were no matters and circumstances in evidence which impaired the accuracy of appellant's testimony. It was within the province of the trial court to determine what credit and weight should be given thereto. Nor does the fact that appellant testified by deposition alter or change the rule. A deposition is in character parol, and is to be given the same weight as oral testimony. 9 Cal. Jur. 426; 8 R. C. L. 1165. Moreover, the manner in which a witness testifies is but one of the tests for truthfulness relied on by courts and partially enumerated in section 1847 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The testimony of a particular individual may in itself be so improbable, or rendered so improbable by other evidence, as to warrant rejection, even though the trial court is not afforded an opportunity of seeing and hearing the witness.

[4] This case, of course, does not turn on the question of whether there was a manual tradition of the deed. The physical act of passing a conveyance from grantor to grantee, despite the popular belief of many laymen to the contrary, may be relatively unimportant. "Delivery" is a word of well-defined meaning in law, and implies more than a mere change of possession. It is an indispensable concomitant of manual tradition that the grantor shall intend to divest himself of title. This rudimentary rule of law is clearly and simply set forth in the case of Williams v. Kidd, 170 Cal. 631, 638, 151 P. 1, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 703: "It is essential to the validity of a transfer of real property that there be a delivery of the conveyance with intent to transfer the title, and the true test under which delivery is to be determined is in ascertaining whether in parting with the possession of the conveyance the grantor intended thereby to divest himself of title. If he did, there was an effective delivery of the deed. If not, there was no delivery."

[5] Even if the trial court had been bound by the categorical statement of the appellant that the deed had actually been placed in his hand, there would still be evidence to sustain the finding that there was no intention on the part of Julius Henry Belser to divest himself of title. The letter written by decedent to appellant is suggestive of an attempt to utilize legal form without regard to substance. It was written prior to the execution of the deed. The writer seemed deeply concerned with the disposition of the property in the event of death, and it may be fairly assumed that he executed the conveyance with that thought uppermost in his mind. It is significant that this letter states the kind and character of reply which the writer desired. And it may also be regarded as significant that no mention is made therein of decedent's intention to personally deliver the deed—an act which appellant says occurred two days later. The trial court may well have believed that the gift deed, together with decedent's letter and appellant's reply thereto, prove nothing more than a testamentary scheme wherein decedent made an abortive attempt to transfer his property, effective at death, without a present intent to divest himself of title or to place his deed beyond recall.

Decedent's acts and declarations prior and subsequent to the execution of the deed in question seem entirely consistent with the court's finding as to intent. Mrs. Mary Sagehorn (appellant's former wife) testified that, when the property was purchased in 1925, decedent declared he would take title himself in return for his $7,000, but would execute a deed of gift to appellant; that, as long as he (decedent) lived, the property would have to remain in his name, but at his death the witness or her children would get it without probate. Mrs. Sagehorn testified further that after her divorce she again discussed the property with decedent, and was assured by him that, if she continued her payments of $35 a month, she could occupy the property as long as he lived; that she made such payments regularly out of her alimony, and received receipts designating the payments as rent.

The witness Callahan testified that decedent became seriously ill in December, 1929, and that, accompanied by Mrs. Callahan, he visited him early one morning, at which time the decedent was in tears and declared he should never have bought the Ranleigh property as "Paul failed to live up to his agreement." "Q. He said he bought the property? A. He bought the property. He loaned Paul $7,000.00. I asked him, 'As a mortgage, Grandpa?' He said, 'Oh, no; I haven't a mortgage. I have the property.'"

[6-8] Appellant complains that the court committed error in allowing Callahan over his objection, to relate a conversation he had with decedent in December, 1929, and also in not sustaining an objection to the introduction of certain memoranda found among decedent's personal effects and tending to show his interest in the Ranleigh street property.

We think the point is without substantial merit. Respondent should have laid a better foundation before offering the memoranda, although it is not suggested in appellant's brief that the book entries and other writings were not in the handwriting of decedent. It is true, of course, that, when a grantor has parted with title to property, his acts and declarations in disparagement thereof, made in the absence of the grantee, are inadmissible in evidence; but, whenever in a particular action the issue itself is whether the grantor has parted with title, it is the settled rule of law in this state that his subsequent acts and declarations are admissible as bearing on the question of delivery. Fisher v. Oliver, 174 Cal. 781, 788, 164 P. 800; Williams v. Kidd, supra, 170 Cal. at page 648, 151 P. 1, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 703. We conclude, therefore, that the evidence was pertinent to the issue and properly admitted.

It may be observed that the decision and judgment of the trial court are declared in the findings to be without prejudice to plaintiff to maintain such action as he may be advised, to establish any interest which he may have in the real property in question by reason of any contribution of money made by him as part of the purchase price thereof.

For the reasons herein stated, the judgment is affirmed.

Appeals from Superior Court, San Diego County; Eugene Daney, Jr., Judge.

Separate actions by A. J. Savage and another, doing business as the Middlefield Arms Corporation, against the Norwich Union Fire Insurance Society, Limited, and another. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

Overton, Lyman & Plumb, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Edward J. Kelly, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

MORTON, Justice pro tem.

By stipulation of the respective parties, the two above-entitled actions, tried jointly, were consolidated on appeal. Both actions concern contracts of insurance. Respondents A. J. Savage and Helen M. Savage, husband and wife, were engaged in the gun manufacturing business at La Mesa in San Diego county under the fictitious name of Middlefield Arms Corporation. On or about March 16, 1928, appellant Pacific Fire Insurance Company, through its duly authorized agent in San Diego, M. G. White, issued a policy of fire insurance to respondents covering certain merchandise, gun machinery, tools, materials, and parts manufactured or in the process of manufacturing in respondents' manufacturing plant. Appellant Norwich Union Fire Insurance Society on April 19, 1928, through its duly authorized agent in San Diego, M. G. White, issued to respondent a policy of fire insurance covering the frame factory building, fixtures, office and workshop furniture and equipment. At noon on April 30, 1928, a fire destroyed the building and major portion of the personal property therein. According to the evidence, A. J. Savage immediately notified the insurance agent White, who said: "All right, I'll take care of the matter." Several telephone conversations occurred between White and Savage, and in one of these White told Savage that the matter was in the hands of Mr. Thomas, the Pacific Coast Adjustment Bureau's branch manager, and that it would be safe for Savage to deal with him. White had handled Savage's fire insurance for more than twelve years, and had assisted in adjusting a prior fire loss.

It was stipulated by counsel that an investigation of the fire was made by Thomas on behalf of the appellant companies. Five or six days after the fire Thomas called on Savage, looked over the burned property, asked questions about the machinery, and ordered Savage to care for it until he could send out another man. At his request Savage prepared an inventory of his loss, giving the cost and quantity of each article and amount claimed thereon. At the second meeting Thomas secured from Savage and his wife a nonwaiver agreement to the effect that no action taken by the companies investigating the fire or as to fixing the amount of loss should be construed as a waiver of any rights of any of the parties. A small balance was unpaid on the purchase price of a part of the destroyed machinery which had been bought on an installment contract. Savage testified that Thomas told him he desired to investigate this purchase contract, and for that reason needed the nonwaiver agreement; therefore he and his wife signed it.

A. J. Savage was a mechanical engineering expert, and the machinery destroyed was largely precision instruments. He testified: "My business is designing and engineering and manufacturing fire arms and all different types of devices to go with those products." Because of their peculiar nature, it was difficult to reach an agreement as to values. At one of the conferences with Thomas, about fifteen days after the fire, in order to justify his values on the inventory, Savage brought with him James W. Patten, a gun expert, who knew Savage's plant and had a knowledge of this type of machinery. Regarding this meeting, Savage testified as follows: "Mr. Thomas went into the general and particulars on the loss, and Mr. Patten was a witness and he followed all the details and when it was over I asked Mr. Thomas if there was anything further that he wanted me to do on the papers or the loss or anything and he said, 'Mr. Savage, there is nothing more you need to do. It's all O. K.' and I dismissed the subject because he said that he sent in the report to his home office. * * * There was a dispute between me and Mr. Thomas as to the price items on the inventory. There was no general—particular—I don't remember much in detail. 'Well,' he says, 'this is like a jewelry shop,' he said. 'These are specials.' And Mr. Thomas acted efficiently for his company on that." Savage's testimony was corroborated in full by the testimony of Patten.

Several times Savage called Thomas on the telephone to see how he was getting along with the claim, and was told it was under advisement and to call up occasionally. The last time he called, Thomas told him to see the company's lawyer. Instead, Savage went to his own lawyer. Sixty days had then expired since the fire, and Savage's attorney, finding that no proof of loss had been filed, immediately filed one. Both policies were on the California standard form of fire insurance policy. The provision as to proof of loss in each policy read as follows:

"Duty of Insured in Case of Loss. When a loss occurs the insured must give to this company written notice thereof without unnecessary delay; and shall protect the property from further damage; forthwith separate the damaged and undamaged personal property and put it in the best possible order; and without unnecessary delay make a complete inventory stating as far as possible the quantity and cost of each article, and the amount claimed thereon.

"Within sixty days after the commencement of the fire the insured shall render to the company at its main office in California named herein preliminary proof of loss consisting of a written statement signed and sworn to by him setting forth:— (a) his knowledge and belief as to the origin of the fire; (b) the interest of the insured and of all others in the property; (c) the cash value of the different articles or properties and the amount of loss thereon; (d) all incumbrances thereon; (e) all other insurance, whether valid or not, covering any of said articles or properties; (f) a copy of the descriptions and schedules in all other policies unless similar to this policy, and in that event, a statement as to the amounts for which the different articles or properties are insured in each of the other policies; (g) any changes of title, use, occupation, location or possession of said property since the issuance of this policy; (h) by whom and for what purpose any building herein described, and the several parts thereof, were occupied at the time of the fire.

"If the company claims that the preliminary proof of loss is defective and within five days after the receipt thereof (without admitting the amount of loss or any part thereof) notifies in writing the insured, or the party making such proof of loss, of the alleged defects (specifically stating them) and requests that they be remedied by verified amendments the insured or such party within ten days after the receipt of such notification and request must comply therewith or, if unable so to do, present to the company an affidavit to that effect.

"The insured shall also furnish, if required, as far as it is practicable to obtain the same, verified plans and specifications of any buildings, fixtures or machinery destroyed or damaged; and the insured shall exhibit to any person designated in writing by this company all that remains of any property herein described and shall submit to examination under oath, as often as required, by any such person, and subscribe to the testimony so given and shall produce to such person for examination all books of account, bills, invoices and other vouchers, and permit extracts and copies thereof to be made, and in case the originals are lost certified copies, if obtainable, shall be produced."

Liability under the policies was finally denied by both insurance companies. Plaintiffs filed suit, and alleged that the defendants waived the filing of proof of loss within the time provided by the policies by their statements and their conduct. Each defendant answered, setting up as a special defense the failure of plaintiffs to comply with the terms of the policies by filing the requisite proof of loss, and further that plaintiffs were not the sole and unconditional owners of the property covered by the policies of insurance, and that therefore the policies were void. Judgment was rendered for the plaintiffs, and the defendants appeal.

[1] Appellants contend that in both cases the evidence is insufficient to support the finding that they had waived the filing of formal proof of loss. Respondents pleaded a waiver by appellants of these requirements of the policies. On the general principle of waiver, appellants cite White v. Home Mutual Insurance Co., 128 Cal. 131, 60 P. 666. In that case a waiver was not pleaded. In the instant case the question involved is one of fact to be determined under the law as analyzed and distinguished in Estrada v.

Queen Ins. Co., 107 Cal. App. 504, 290 P. 525, 526. The rule there stated is as follows: "'Any conduct on the part of the insurer which tends to create a belief in the mind of the claimant under the policy that notice need not be given or that proofs of loss will be unnecessary, operates as a waiver of a policy provision requiring such notice or proofs. * * * Thus proof of loss is waived by denial of liability, or by a statement by the adjuster that proofs are unnecessary and that the loss will be adjusted without them, or by a statement by the insurer's agent, after loss, that he would attend to giving notice, followed by the appearance of an adjuster. * * *'" 14 Cal. Jur. 576.

[2] In support of the finding of the trial court, we find evidence that immediately after the fire Savage called White, and White stated to him, "All right, I'll take care of the matter." Shortly thereafter he informed Savage that E. L. Thomas was authorized by both insurance companies to adjust the loss. Thomas inspected the débris from the fire, and ordered Savage to care for it until he sent out another man. He requested a detailed inventory, discussed values of the destroyed machinery, and generally gave the impression that he was conducting a careful, just, and impartial adjustment of the fire loss. Savage furnished him everything he requested, and the only issue between them appears to have been as to values. Finally we have the conversation at which Patten was a disinterested witness. He testified regarding this conversation between Thomas and Savage as follows: "They talked about the fire loss. Mr. Thomas said that he had all he wanted. Mr. Thomas did not state whether or not there was any necessity for Mr. Savage to make any further statements or proofs. He said he had all that was necessary. * * * I remember they were talking about the complete fire loss and that Mr. Savage had filed the statement of loss, which was all that was necessary. When they had talked about the loss Mr. Thomas said that he had all the information necessary and that he would turn in his report to his office the first of the week. All I remember was that Mr. Thomas said that everything was O. K. and that he would turn his report in. I have never seen Mr. Thomas before or since the meeting referred to. I don't remember the date. It was probably about three weeks after the fire at about noon." No question as to the validity of the claim or of the necessary proof arose until after the expiration of the sixty days, when Thomas referred Savage to the company's lawyers. If Thomas did not intentionally mislead Savage, he successfully lulled him into an attitude of reliance and confidence that his rights, as well as those of the companies, were being looked after by him. Appellants did not remain silent and wait for the filing of formal proof of loss. They appointed a representative, who immediately took charge of the situation, requested information, inventories, and never raised the question of formal proof of loss. If the insured must deal with the company's representative at arm's length, the latter should not enter the situation as an impartial adjuster or arbitrator. Savage was assured by White that he could safely deal with Thomas. Savage relied on this assurance, as his testimony shows: "No one was present but Mr. Patten, Mr. Thomas and myself, and Mr. Thomas said, 'Mr. Savage, you needn't do anything more on the matter of these papers.' I didn't file a claim of proof of loss because I trusted Mr. Thomas and relied upon this statement."

The record discloses ample evidence to show that the procedure and conduct on the part of appellants' representative created the belief in the minds of the claimants that the notice and preliminary proof was dispensed with by going on to the determination of the loss and the matter of payment of the claim. Furthermore, he informed claimant that nothing more was required on his part. Carroll v. Girard Fire Ins. Co., 72 Cal. 297, 13 P. 863; Estrada v. Queen Ins. Co., 107 Cal. App. 504, at page 510, 290 P. 525.

[3] Appellants' second point on appeal in the case of Savage v. Pacific Fire Ins. Co. is that respondents misrepresented to appellants as to the ownership of a part of the insured property; therefore the contracts of insurance were void. The policy provided: "Unless otherwise provided for by agreement endorsed thereon, or added thereto, this entire policy shall be void, * * * (b) if the interests of the insured be other than unconditional and sole ownership." The evidence showed the personal property in question to be in the exclusive possession of respondents; only a small balance of the purchase price remained unpaid. Their ownership was actual and substantial. In McCollough v. Home Ins. Co., 155 Cal. 659, at page 662, 102 P. 814, 815, 18 Ann. Cas. 862, we find the rule to be: "An equitable title in the insured is a sufficient compliance with the condition in question. A vendee in possession of property under a valid contract of purchase which he is entitled to enforce specifically, is the holder of such equitable title. * * * And the great weight of authority supports the proposition that such vendee is the 'sole and unconditional owner' within the meaning of the policy, even though a portion of the purchase price may yet remain unpaid."

Under the facts shown, there was sufficient evidence to justify the finding of the trial court on this point.

Judgment affirmed.

Rehearing Denied Sept. 23, 1932. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 24, 1932.

1. Landlord and tenant ⇨231(1).

Under lease conditioning minimum rental on inability to gain permission to excavate gravel, lessor seeking rent must prove effort to gain permission.

2. Landlord and tenant ⇨182.

Under lease conditioning minimum rental on inability to gain permission, by municipal permit or otherwise, to excavate gravel, lessee held not liable for rent while injunction suit was pending against city.

Lease provided that lessor should seek permit from city authorizing lessee to remove sand and gravel, but, if permit were refused and it became necessary to institute legal action to enforce granting thereof, such action should be taken by lessor, and that, if parties were unable to gain permission, either by permit or otherwise, lessee would either begin to pay minimum rental or would quitclaim premises to lessor. Evidence showed that city refused permit, and that Superior Court denied petition for order requiring city to grant permit, after which parties brought suit in federal court and obtained preliminary injunction preventing city from interfering with excavation, and that this suit was pending and undetermined during period for which lessor claimed rent.

CONREY, P. J.

In this action the plaintiff recovered judgment in the sum of $20,000, found to be due as rent under a written lease executed and delivered by plaintiff to defendant, of described real property in the city of Vernon, in Los Angeles county; together with stated interest, attorney fees, and costs. The defendant appeals from the judgment.

The lease was made for a term of ten years, beginning with December 11, 1926, and carried with it the right to excavate and to take from the premises sand and gravel. The rental was to be determined by the quantities of sand and gravel taken, at a stated price per cubic yard, with the understanding that the minimum payments for any calendar year should be $30,000. Among the contract provisions of the lease are the following:

"It is understood that the above royalty shall be net to lessor, and without the deduction of any charge for expense of operation or otherwise. Lessee shall not be required to pay any royalties until four months after the first day of the month succeeding the date of receiving the permit provided for in the next succeeding paragraph, and such time as lessee is prevented from excavating on said premises by inclement weather shall be added to said four months' period; provided, however, that all sand and gravel excavated during said period shall be charged to the lessee and shall be settled for at the time of said first payment.

"3. Lessor shall forthwith seek a permit from the city of Vernon, state of California, whereby and whereunder the lessee, either as lessee of the owner or as its employee, shall be permitted to excavate in accordance with the terms hereof, and lessee will render all reasonable assistance within its power in the obtaining of said permit and will share equally with the lessor the actual expenses in obtaining said permit, but in the event that said permit is refused and it becomes necessary to institute legal action to enforce the granting thereof, all such action shall be taken by the lessor in its own name and at its own expense.

"4. In the event that lessor or lessee is unable to gain permission, either by permit, or as an employee, or otherwise, to excavate said premises as above provided in paragraph 3, after using all due diligence to secure such right to operate, then and in such event the Blue Diamond Company will forthwith commence the minimum rental payments as above specified, or will forthwith quitclaim said premises to lessor."

The controversy between the parties in this action turns upon the foregoing provisions of the lease. It was alleged by the defendant (paragraph II of first affirmative defense) that the plaintiff never, either by itself or through any other person, obtained any permit from the city of Vernon, or "any other commission from any source whatsoever," giving to the defendant permission to excavate either sand or gravel, or any other substance, from said premises, but, on the contrary that such permit was refused by the city of Vernon, and that plaintiff sought through the courts an order requiring the city to give such permit, which order was refused by the courts; and that no permit has ever been given to the defendant under or by virtue of which it was permitted to use said premises for the purposes provided under and by the terms of the lease. By separate affirmative defense it was claimed that, by virtue of a transfer and assignment of the lease on the 7th day of June, 1928, to one Philip S. Ehrlich, which transfer was made by the defendant with the written consent of the plaintiff, the defendant was released from the obligations of the lease, and that in fact no rental ever became due from the defendant.

In its decision the trial court found: "That it is true that plaintiff never, either by itself or any other person, obtained any permit from the said city of Vernon giving to the defendant the permission to excavate either sand or gravel from said premises. That an application for such a permit was filed on February 4, 1927, with the trustees of the said city of Vernon, and was denied by them on April 4, 1927; that plaintiff, in the name and on behalf of defendant, sought through this court an order requiring said city of Vernon to grant said permit; that the petition for said order was denied on April 26, 1927. That defendant was at all times advised of the aforesaid proceedings and of the respective dates of the same." The court further found, and it is conceded to be true, that the defendant has not paid any rent and did not at any time quitclaim said premises to the plaintiff. Respondent rests its right of action for the accrued rent claimed in the complaint upon paragraph 4 of the lease. Its position is concisely stated by counsel for respondent as follows: "Respondent based its complaint upon the proposition that when the permit to excavate was denied by the trustees of the city of Vernon, and when the superior court refused to grant a writ of mandate, and said proceedings were abandoned at the request of appellant, paragraph four of the lease compelled appellant to forthwith quitclaim all rights in the premises or pay rent, and that inasmuch as appellant did not quitclaim, the obligation to pay rent immediately accrued." (Page 7, respondent's reply to appellant's supp. brief.) Appellant, on the other hand (supp. brief, pp. 12 et seq.), contends that the evidence is insufficient to prove that as of May 1, 1927, or as of any other date prior to January 1, 1928, the parties were unable, after completion of all proceedings required by the lease, to obtain the right to operate, and directs attention to the fact that at the end of 1927 litigation was still pending for the purpose of obtaining that right. It may be observed here that by agreement of date January 7, 1928, consented to by both parties to this action, the lease was transferred to a third party, with a reservation that the transfer was without prejudice to any cause of action which respondent might have or claim against appellant by reason of any matter or things which appellant had done or failed to do prior to January 1, 1928, relating to said lease or to any terms and provisions thereof.

Comparing finding X with paragraph 4 of the lease and paragraph 2 of defendant's first affirmative defense, together with plaintiff's allegation that it had done all that was required of it under the lease, it is apparent that the finding does not completely cover the issue as presented by the pleadings. The finding declares that no permit was obtained from the city of Vernon; that an application for the permit was denied by said city on April 4, 1927; and that the plaintiff in the name and on behalf of defendant attempted to obtain from the Superior Court an order requiring that the city grant such permit, and that the petition for said order was denied on April 26, 1927. But as stated in the answer, the defense was not only that no permit was obtained from the city of Vernon and that on the contrary such permit was refused, but also that "plaintiff did seek through the courts an order requiring the said city to give such permit, which order was refused by the courts, and no permit has ever been given to this defendant under or by virtue of which it could or was permitted to use said premises, or any part thereof, for the purposes provided under and by the terms of said lease." It was further alleged that "no permit whatsoever has ever been obtained from any person or authority allowing this defendant to use said premises, as contemplated in said lease." The answer denied performance by the plaintiff, "other than the making of an unsuccessful attempt to get the permit from the city of Vernon, as required by said lease to be obtained by it, the lessor and plaintiff herein."

[1] It should be remembered that the lease not only provided for the obtaining of a permit from the city, but the obligation of defendant to forthwith commence the minimum rental payments or forthwith quitclaim the premises to the lessor was conditioned upon the event "that lessor or lessee is unable to gain permission either by permit, or as an employee, or otherwise, to excavate said premises as above provided in paragraph 3 after using all due diligence to secure such right to operate," etc. Before plaintiff could recover the rent claimed in this action, it was incumbent upon it to prove that it had made all reasonable efforts to gain the necessary permission. Without that proof the plaintiff would have no foundation to sustain the allegation of the complaint that plaintiff had kept and performed its obligations under the lease.

[2] The court did not directly find that as of May 1, 1927, or at all, the parties were unable to gain permission either by permit or otherwise to excavate said premises. The specific finding is limited to the fact of application for the permit, denial of the application; application for an order of court, and denial thereof. In the light of the evidence, taken together with the pleadings, we are of the opinion that appellant should be sustained in its contention that the trial court failed to find upon the issue of inability of the parties to gain permission for appellant to excavate, either by permit or otherwise; and that, according to the evidence which was before the court, we cannot properly say that the court rightly could have found in favor of the respondent upon that issue. Or, if we agree that this issue was covered by the general finding that plaintiff has performed each and all of the covenants, terms, provisions, and conditions of said lease on its part to be kept and performed, then the evidence does not sustain the finding. If the court had decided, as under the evidence it should have decided, that the attempt to obtain a clear right to excavate for sand and gravel on the leased premises was still an active and undetermined matter, and that there remained a reasonable prospect that by pursuing the pending litigation the required permission would be obtained, then it would follow that no rent had accrued for or during the period prior to January 1, 1928, and that the plaintiff's cause of action herein must fail.

The fact that the provisions of the lease did not absolutely call for a "permit" to be issued by authority of the board of trustees of the city of Vernon, but was open to the alternative of legal settlement of the right by litigation instituted against the city in the event of a refusal of the permit, is made plain, not only upon a reading of the lease itself, but also by the practical construction put upon it by the parties in their subsequent conduct. The evidence shows that, in making the lease, the parties had in mind the fact that under certain existing ordinances of the city, if the ordinances were valid, the proposed excavations could not be made without first obtaining a permit from the city trustees for that purpose; that there was some danger or probability that the permit when applied for would be refused; that it might be necessary to apply for a writ of mandate to compel the issuance of the permit; that the court might refuse to issue the writ of mandate for some reason that would not be determinative of the ultimate question; and that finally it might be necessary to apply in some court of competent jurisdiction for a writ of injunction to prevent the city from interfering with the proposed excavation. The evidence leaves no doubt that this entire course of procedure was contemplated by the parties from the very beginning. In accordance with the plan of procedure, they applied for the permit, and, when it was refused, they applied to the Superior Court for a writ of mandate. When in that proceeding the court sustained a demurrer to the petition for the writ of mandate and declined to issue the writ, these parties by mutual consent abandoned their prosecution of that action, apparently without waiting for any formal judgment to be entered against them. They then applied to the United States District Court for a writ of injunction to prevent the city of Vernon and its officers from enforcing against the Sudden Lumber Company and the Blue Diamond Company, or either of them, the ordinances in question relating to or concerning the said leased premises. Pursuant to an order of said court, a writ of preliminary injunction was issued on the 1st day of August, 1927. On the 1st day of February, 1928, that action was still pending. With its further progress we are not concerned here. It is enough to know that, in accordance with the evidence above mentioned, it was established, beyond controversy, that, although no formal permit for such excavation had been obtained from the city of Vernon, the effort to obtain such a permit or its legal equivalent was pending and undetermined. If the court had so found, the necessary conclusion of law would have been that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover the rent claimed in this action. Or if, on the other hand, the issuance of the preliminary injunction on August 1, 1927, was the equivalent of a permit which would protect the lessee in proceeding with the excavations, then under the terms of the lease no rent would accrue until January 1, 1928, and the claim for rent as accrued during the year 1927 could not be sustained.

[3] Respondent contends that the grounds of appeal now relied upon (and which have been considered herein) are entirely different in theory from the actual defense presented at the trial; and that, therefore, appellant is not entitled to have such new and different theory presented in this court. There are, of course, many decisions which declare the rule to which respondent refers. It is said that "to permit a party who has tried his case wholly on a certain theory, which theory was acted upon by the trial court, to change his position and adopt a different theory on appeal, would not only be unfair to the trial court, but manifestly unjust to the opposing litigant." 2 Cal. Jur. 237. In the case at bar, appellant did object to the evidence offered by the plaintiff to show what was done in bringing the injunction suit, and appellant at that time claimed that there was nothing in the lease which provided for anything except a permit. But the court overruled those objections, and allowed the plaintiff to introduce the evidence. Presumably the plaintiff did this for the purpose of showing that it had done all that was required of it by the terms of the lease. In relation to that matter, therefore, the trial was conducted upon respondent's own theory, and appellant is entitled to whatever may result from carrying that theory to its proper conclusion.

The judgment is reversed.

DAVIES v. UNION TRUST CO. OF SAN DIEGO et al.

Civ. 927.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

Aug. 29, 1932.

1. Mortgages ⇐375.

In foreclosure under trust declaration reciting that certain unpaid sum was due, and which was to be paid by beneficiaries to payees, deficiency judgment against beneficiaries held authorized.

Such judgment was authorized in view of the language of the trust declaration reciting that a certain debt was "owing" by the beneficiaries to the payees, "payable" to the payees, as herein designated and containing an unequivocal acknowledgment of a present, existing indebtedness to be paid in certain designated installments, "debt" being defined as that which is due from one person to another, whether money, goods, or services; that which one person is bound to pay to another, or to perform for his benefit; while "owing" is defined as something unpaid, and "payable" meaning to be paid.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Debt," "Owe," and "Payable," see Words and Phrases.]

2. Pleading ⇐36(3).

Allegations regarding credit purchasers acquired on trust declaration indebtedness held not to constitute admission of payment entitling purchasers to release of specified lots covered by trust declaration (Code Civ. Proc. § 1060).

Declaration of trust provided in effect that if no default existed, the parties agreed that parcels or lots might be released by the trustee upon payment by the purchasers of the basic price, and vendor's pleadings admitted that at some time during a certain month the purchasers made a proposal to sell a note and trust deed for a designated credit on the trust indebtedness, which proposal vendors were induced to accept.

3. Appeal and error ⇐931(1).

Appellate court can assume trial court's finding was supported by evidence.

4. Mortgages ⇐310.

Where beneficiaries' right to have lots released from trust declaration depended on demand for release upon trustee, such demand must be made.

JENNINGS, J.

Plaintiff instituted this action on behalf of himself and four other beneficiaries under a certain declaration of trust for the purpose of securing declaratory relief as well as injunctive relief against the trustee in accordance with the provisions of section 1060, Code of Civil Procedure. From a judgment denying the relief sought and in favor of defendants, plaintiff prosecutes this appeal.

The appeal is taken on the judgment roll alone. Therefore, whatever facts may be herein set forth for the purpose of establishing a background conducing to a clearer understanding of the points involved herein are necessarily taken from the findings of the trial court and from the pleadings.

From the record thus provided it appears that prior to August 2, 1926, defendants Harry F. Carling and F. B. Zieglar were the owners of a tract of land in San Diego county. Plaintiff and his four associates proposed to buy the land for the sum of $315,000 intending to subdivide it and hoping that, from the sales of lots and parcels in the subdivision, a sufficient amount would be realized from which to pay the purchase price and yield to them a profit on the undertaking. The owners of the land conveyed the tract to the defendant Union Trust Company of San Diego. No consideration was paid by the company for the conveyance. Thereupon, on August 2, 1926, an elaborate declaration of trust was executed by defendant Union Trust Company and written approval, ratification, and confirmation of its terms were made by the owners of the property and by plaintiff and his associates. In this instrument, the owners, Carling and Zieglar, were designated "Payees," the former being more specifically designated "1st Payee" and the latter "2d Payee." Plaintiff and his four associates were designated "Class B Beneficiaries." It was provided that the class B beneficiaries should enter into possession of the property and embark upon a sales campaign. The enterprise was not attended with the success which had been anticipated. The sum of $33,527 was realized from the sale of lots in the tract but, as time passed, the class B beneficiaries defaulted in the payment of two installments due to be made on the principal of the purchase price. The first of these installments was due on February 2, 1928, and amounted to $61,500. The second installment amounting to $72,500 was due on February 2, 1929. Interest on the principal sum was not paid as provided. County taxes assessed against the property aggregating approximately $83,000 exclusive of penalties were allowed to become delinquent and further taxes, assessed by the irrigation district in which the property is located amounting to approximately $13,900, were not paid and became delinquent. In this state of affairs, the owners of the property elected to utilize the machinery set up by the declaration of trust for foreclosure of the beneficial interest of the class B beneficiaries. On March 16, 1929, they gave written notice of default and exercised their option to declare all sums secured by the declaration of trust to be immediately due and payable. Thereafter, they gave notice of sale, as required by the trust declaration, announcing that on July 1, 1929, all beneficial interest of all beneficiaries would be sold. The present action was instituted about June 13, 1929. By it, in addition to declaratory relief, an injunction was sought, restraining the Union Trust Company as trustee from proceeding with the proposed sale pending the trial of the action. Plaintiff's prayer for an injunction pendente lite was denied and the sale took place. At this sale the beneficial interest of plaintiff and his associates was sold for the sum of $150,000. At the conclusion of the trial of the action, the court found that, at the time the sale was made, the sum of $267,940.26 was due on the principal and interest of the trust indebtedness. The proceeds of the sale amounting, as above noted, to $150,000 was applied on the amount of principal and interest remaining due on the trust indebtedness, leaving a balance of $117,940.26. The court also found that a total sum of $107,827.80, exclusive of penalties, was required to pay the various taxes which had been allowed to become delinquent. Judgment was thereupon rendered denying to plaintiff the relief sought by him and in favor of defendants Carling and Zieglar on their cross-complaint for the sum of $225,767.96.

[1] The first contention advanced by appellant is that the court was not authorized to render a deficiency judgment in any amount against him. It is urged that, to support a deficiency judgment, it must first appear that there is a personal liability on the part of the one sought thus to be charged. This statement is not challenged by respondents. The problem which is here presented, therefore, is to discover whether there is such personal liability. The solution of this problem depends upon the interpretation of the declaration of trust since it appears that no collateral instrument evidencing the indebtedness mentioned in the trust declaration was executed by appellant. This instrument which commences with a recitation that the Union Trust Company of San Diego has received a deed conveying to it certain particularly described land as trustee for which no consideration was paid by it then refers to a certain debt of $35,000 owing to Carling, first payee, from Zieglar, second payee, evidenced by seven promissory notes of $5,000 each, payment of which may be made personally or from proceeds received from sales of the trust property. The instrument then contains the following language: "Whereas, a certain debt in the principal sum and known as the Principal Indebtedness hereunder, of Three Hundred Fifteen Thousand Dollars ($315,000.00) is owing under this Trust by John B. Zeller, John W. Waybright, A. E. Davies, Ed. F. Gilbert and M. Reiss, Class 'B' Beneficiaries hereunder, to Payees hereunder, payable to said Payees as their interest hereafter appear, and as follows: The sum of $61,500.00 on or before eighteen (18) months after the date hereof; The sum of $72,500.00 on or before thirty (30) months after the date hereof; The sum of $72,500.00 on or before forty-two (42) months after the date hereof; The sum of $108,500.00 on or before fifty-four (54) months after the date hereof; with interest on all deferred payments at six per cent (6%) per annum, payable quarterly; and whereas all of the foregoing indebtedness is secured by the Entire Beneficial Interest hereunder as hereinafter provided, said Beneficial Interest being segregated and divided into Class 'A' and Class 'B' * * *." It is not disputed that the above-quoted language amounts to an acknowledgment of indebtedness, but it is said that it is not a promise to pay the amount specified and that no personal obligation to pay can be made out of it. It must be conceded that in the language above quoted and throughout the instrument studious effort was made to avoid a clear covenant on the part of appellant and his associates to pay the indebtedness which is acknowledged to exist. However, in section 4 of the instrument there is an express covenant on the part of all beneficiaries under the declaration to protect the trust property from loss, damage, liability, and expense, to permit no waste or deterioration and to pay for any improvements that may be made outside the purview of a certain road district improvement act. Section 6 of the instrument contains a further covenant expressed in the following language: "Provided further that should said Basic Prices, together with any other payments made to Trustee for Payees not equal the instalments of said principal indebtedness as said instalments become due, then all the Beneficiaries hereunder jointly and severally agree to pay such additional sums to Trustee for Payees as may be necessary in order to enable the payment of such instalment to be made; provided, that all Basic Prices shall be paid to Payees in instalments as received by trustee." In section 10 of the instrument is to be found the following language: "Should said property, or any part thereof, or the proceeds from any sale made become liable for payment of any inheritance, income or other tax, lien or assessment, which beneficiaries hereby jointly and severally agree to pay five (5) days before delinquency, Trustee is authorized to withhold and pay said tax, lien, or assessment out of any moneys in its possession for account of the person whose interests hereunder are so liable, unless the same has been paid." Here again is an example of the studious effort obviously made to avoid a definite promise on the part of beneficiaries to pay the taxes. Nevertheless, despite the evasiveness of the terminology employed, we apprehend that it can hardly be contended that there is not a distinct covenant to pay taxes and assessments five days prior to delinquency. We know of no rule of law that requires an acknowledgment of debt to be expressed in the formal phraseology of a promissory note. The word "debt" has a recognized meaning. In Webster's International English Dictionary it is defined as "that which is due from one person to another, whether money, goods, or services; that which one person is bound to pay to another, or to perform for his benefit." The Century English Dictionary defines the term in language practically identical with that above quoted. Bouvier's Law Dictionary defines it as follows: "Debt. In Contracts—'A sum of money due by certain and express agreement,'" citing 3 Bla. Com. 154. In Perry v. Washburn, 20 Cal. 318, 350, it is said: "A debt is a sum of money due by contract, express or implied * * *. The term 'debt,' it is true, is popularly used in a far more comprehensive sense, as embracing not merely money due by contract, but whatever one is bound to render to another, whether from contract or the requirements of the law." It is to be observed that the language of the trust declaration recites that a certain debt is "owing" by appellant and his associates to payees, "payable" to payees. The word "owing" is defined in Bouvier's Law Dictionary as "something unpaid." The word "payable" means "to be paid." We may therefore paraphrase the language of the instrument as follows: Whereas, a certain sum of money in a specified amount is due and is unpaid by certain named individuals to payees, to be paid to them. Thus paraphrased the language contains an unequivocal acknowledgment of a present, existing indebtedness to be paid in certain designated installments. It is our opinion that the trial court was warranted in construing it as amounting in effect to an agreement to pay the sum specified. We are the more persuaded to this conclusion by the language contained in section 6 of the declaration, wherein the beneficiaries jointly and severally agree that if moneys received by the trustee do not equal the installments of the principal indebtedness as they become due, they will pay such additional sums as may be necessary in order to enable payment of such installment to be made. Here is language susceptible of no other construction than that of a definite covenant and promise to pay. It is conceded that, if the declaration of trust is capable of being interpreted as containing a promise on the part of appellant and his associates to pay the sum specified, a judgment against appellant for the balance due after application of the proceeds of the sale of the beneficial interest of all beneficiaries was warranted.

[2-4] The second contention advanced by appellant is that the judgment of the court denying to appellant recovery of lots having a release value of $43,092.77 or a money judgment in this sum is incorrect since it is maintained that the pleadings of respondents, themselves, show that appellant was entitled to the relief stated. In this connection it is pointed out that respondent Carling, in an amendment to the answer originally filed by him and his codefendant Zieglar, admitted that a credit of $55,000 to be applied on payment of the principal and of $5,000 to be applied on payment of interest was allowed by said respondents to appellant and his associates in the month of November, 1927, and that payment of the sum of $21,700.99 had been made prior to this time. The declaration of trust provides that the first installment of principal in the amount of $61,500 shall be made on or before 18 months from August 2, 1926, the date on which the declaration was executed. The due date of this first installment was therefore February 2, 1928. It is alleged in appellant's complaint that lots having a basic release price of $33,527 were released by respondents and since, as contended, respondents by their pleadings admit receipt of $76,619.77 on account of the principal indebtedness prior to and during the month of November, 1927, at which time there had been no default in payment of any installment, therefore, under the terms of section 6 of the declaration of trust, appellant and his associates were entitled to have released to them lots of a basic value of $43,092.77. Section 6 of the declaration is, in part, in the following language: "Provided no default then exists hereunder, and after all costs, fees, expenses and advances of trustee with interest and all damages sustained by it have first been paid, the parties hereto agree that any and all parcels, lot or lots may be conveyed by trustee free and clear of all obligations upon payment to trustee of an agreed upon sum, known as the basic price, to be calculated for said purpose upon the basis of one hundred twenty-five per cent (125%) of the sum of three hundred fifteen thousand dollars ($315,000.00) for the entire tract of land, said sum to be prorated against the lots of said subdivision according to the area contained therein, it being agreed that said trustee be and it is hereby authorized to convey said lots or parcels of said property upon payment to it for payees of the proportional part of the balance of said basic price." Since, therefore, there had been no default in November, 1927, it is argued that appellant and his associates at that time acquired the right, by virtue of the admitted payment of $76,619.77, to have lots of a basic value, as this term is defined in said section 6, released to them. But it does not so clearly appear that the allegations of the amendment to the answer admit that the payment of $21,700.99 was made prior to November, 1927. The language of the pleading with reference to this payment is as follows: "Deny that said Harry F. Carling * * * have been paid upon the principal of said trust indebtedness owing them, the sum of $76,619.77 or any other sum in excess of $21,700.99." Nor does it conclusively appear that it is admitted in the amendment to the answer that a credit of $60,000 to apply on principal and interest of the trust indebtedness was allowed in November, 1927. It is alleged in the pleading referred to that "on or about November, 1927," appellant and his associates proposed to sell respondents Carling and Zieglar a certain trust deed note and trust deed concerning which certain representations alleged to have been false were made by appellant and his associates upon which representations it is alleged respondents relied and by reason whereof they were induced to enter into the transaction and to accept the note and trust deed at the value of $60,000. While, therefore, it may be conceded that it is admitted by the pleading that, at some time during the month of November, 1927, appellant and his associates made the proposal to sell the note and trust deed for a credit of $60,000, it cannot be conceded that it is therein admitted that the acceptance of the offer by respondents Carling and Zieglar took place in November, 1927. For all that appears it may have taken place at a much later date. It is significant that the court simply found that respondents Carling and Zieglar had acknowledged receipt of payment of the sum of $76,619.77 on account of the trust indebtedness which was derived from proceeds of sales of property under the trust. We are entitled to assume that the court's finding in this regard is supported by evidence presented during the trial of the action. At all events, the contention that the pleadings contain admissions that payment of the specified sum was made at a time when no default existed is not well taken for the reasons suggested. Further, even if it be conceded that appellant's contention in this regard is correct, further difficulty is encountered in arriving at the conclusion that the court erred in refusing to declare that appellant and his associates were entitled to have lots of a release value of $43,092.77 deeded to them or a judgment in money for such amount. In this connection, appellant relies upon the provisions of section 6 of the declaration of trust. The first part of this section, as hereinabove noted, declares that, providing no default exists, the parties agree that any and all parcels, lot, or lots, may be released by the trustee upon payment of the basic price. It is, however, provided in a subsequent portion of section 6 that the trustee is authorized to release any lot or parcel of the property as and when required (italics ours) so to do by the class B beneficiaries. It will be remembered that appellant and his associates were designated in the trust declaration class B beneficiaries. It is clear, therefore, that the class B beneficiaries were required to make a demand for the conveyance of lots as a prerequisite to the establishment of a duty on the part of the trustee to release such lots from the trust. Nowhere in the record is there any indication or suggestion that any evidence of such demand was presented to the trial court. It is alleged in the complaint that appellant, on behalf of all class B beneficiaries, had demanded that the trustee release lots in accordance with the provisions of the trust declaration and that at the time of the demand no default existed under the declaration of trust. The answers filed by respondent Union Trust Company of San Diego and respondents Carling and Zieglar contain specific denials that appellant, either for himself or on behalf of his associates, had demanded a release of lots by the trustee. The court found that no demand for the release of lots had been made by appellant on behalf of the class B beneficiaries or for any other person, or for himself. The fact of demand was therefore a fact in issue at the trial, and we must assume that the court's finding that no demand had been made was supported by the evidence produced at the trial. It is obvious that the right of the class B beneficiaries to have lots released from the trust depended upon their making a demand upon the trustee for such release and the rule is well settled that, under such circumstances, it must be shown that the demand was made. Vickery v. Maier, 164 Cal. 384, 129 P. 273; Danielson v. Neal, 164 Cal. 748, 750, 130 P. 716; Flickinger v. Heck, 187 Cal. 111, 200 P. 1045; California Canneries Co. v. Great Western Lumber Co., 44 Cal. App. 69, 185 P. 1008, 207 P. 908.

MARKS, Acting P. J.

This is a motion to dismiss the appeal because the appellant's opening brief was not filed in time. The record shows that appellant was given to and including July 20, 1932, in which to file his brief; that on the morning of July 21, counsel for appellant applied to this court for a further extension of six days, which was not granted because the notice of motion to dismiss had been filed earlier that morning. The motion to dismiss was noticed for Tuesday, August 9, 1932, at 10 o'clock a. m., at which time appellant filed affidavits setting forth a reasonable excuse for his delay. Appellant's opening brief was delivered to the clerk of this court for filing on July 25, 1932.

Upon the authority of the cases of Righetti v. Monroe, Lyon & Miller, 106 Cal. App. 346, 289 P. 650; Fishman v. Silva, 108 Cal. App. 121, 291 P. 430; Tyner v. Axt, 111 Cal. BEAUMONT, Justice pro tem.

[1, 2] On December 2, 1928, C. Musante was riding in an automobile driven by Ottario Guerrini in a westerly direction on a public highway in Alameda county. Mrs. D. O. Ryan, at the same time, was driving an automobile in the opposite direction on the same highway. As the two machines approached each other, that driven by Mrs. Ryan swerved to the northerly side of the road and collided with that operated by Guerrini. Musante was injured. He brought suit against Guerrini and Mrs. Ryan, and a verdict was rendered in his favor against the latter only. Mrs. Ryan has appealed from the judgment on the grounds of insufficiency of the evidence and errors of the court in giving certain instructions.

Appellant contends that the charge of negligence can be predicated only upon the skidding of the automobile to the northerly (wrong) side of the road, and that this was not evidence of negligence. In our opinion, there is no basis for thus attempting to narrow the view the jury was entitled to take of the evidence or the scope this court has of the issue of negligence in considering the appeal. A person may not shield himself against a charge of negligence merely by showing that an automobile operated by him was temporarily beyond his control due to its skidding, if the skidding was the direct result of his own act of negligence. Respondent alleges in general terms in his complaint that appellant was negligent in the operation of her automobile, and that he was injured as a result. It was proper then to consider the circumstances antecedent to the skidding, as well as the skidding itself, to determine whether or not appellant was negligent as alleged. Davis v. Brown, 92 Cal. App. 20, 267 P. 754; Sullivan v. Lutz, 181 Wis. 61, 194 N. W. 25. This is not a case where an automobile comes suddenly and unexpectedly upon a slippery surface. The evidence discloses that the condition which existed at the moment of the skidding had prevailed during the time appellant had traveled at least five or six miles immediately prior thereto.

The evidence shows that, while appellant was operating her car along the highway at the time and place in question, it was raining, and that the surface of the road was wet and slippery; that, at the time of the collision, rain had been falling about an hour and a half; that there was traffic in each direction on the highway. Appellant testified she was driving at a speed of between twenty-five and thirty miles an hour; that she was following another automobile; that in driving along the highway she had kept at a distance of about three car lengths (about forty-eight feet) behind such car; that while she was so traveling the car in front stopped suddenly, and, to avoid striking it, she immediately applied her brakes. This caused appellant's machine to skid to the wrong side of the road, in front of the approaching car of Guerrini. Appellant testified relative to the condition of the surface of the road as follows:

"Q. Can you recall whether the pavement was wet and slippery all the way from San Francisco? A. I don't know about the entire distance.

"Q. Had it been for a number of miles prior to the accident? A. For a little ways before, but I could not say about the entire distance."

Dennis Ryan, husband of appellant, was riding beside his wife, who was driving. He testified in part as follows:

"Q. What was the condition of the traffic, Mr. Ryan? A. It was very heavy—Sunday evening—and lots of cars on the road. * *

"Q. Were there any cars immediately in front of yours? A. Several of them.

"Q. Any cars immediately behind yours? A. Several.

"Q. About what was the distance between your automobile and the car immediately preceding you? A. In front of us?

"Q. Yes. A. About three car-lengths or a little better maybe.

"Q. For what distance were you traveling along before the accident in that position? A. Well, at least five or six miles. * * *

"Q. What is the make-up generally, of the road? A. It is cement surfaced on the road and oil—

"Q. Between the shoulders what is the character of the pavement? A. Some kind of oil covering the cement.

"Q. Commonly called asphaltum? A. I think that is what it is.

"Q. What is the condition of the highway immediately touching the shoulder of the road? A. Mud and soft dirt. There are ditches on both sides."

Guerrini testified that he was driving on his right-hand side of the highway; that he saw the car traveling immediately ahead of appellant, and that this automobile had just passed appellant's car; that it was traveling at about forty miles an hour, and that it did not slow down or stop; that, after the collision, he talked with appellant, saying, " 'See what you did to me now' "; that she replied: " 'That is my blame and you are a good man and you are going very well otherwise somebody is going to be killed.' " Respondent testified he did not see appellant's car until just before the impact, when it suddenly appeared directly in front of Guerrini's car on the northerly side of the highway.

[3-7] Appellant contends that the record contains no evidence of negligence on her part; that, as stated in her brief on appeal, "Appellant's action in applying the brakes and causing the skidding of her car was not negligent because of the fact that she was confronted with an emergency in the sudden stopping of the automobile immediately preceding her." Appellant cites authority to the effect that " 'one who, without negligence upon his part, is suddenly confronted with imminent danger or seeming imminent danger is not required to exercise that degree of care and skill which is required in the commission of an act after careful deliberation.' " Was there an "emergency" confronting appellant? There was a variance in the testimony as to the circumstances existing immediately prior to the collision. Appellant claimed that the emergency arose because of the sudden stopping of the car immediately in front of her. Guerrini's testimony was that the car did not stop. In view of the conflict of evidence, the question whether appellant was faced with imminent danger or seeming imminent danger was for the jury to decide. Millers Creek R. Co. v. Barnett, 159 Ky. 344, 167 S. W. 402.

Under the evidence herein, the jury, in determining the question of negligence, had a right to consider the speed at which appellant was operating her automobile at the time and place in question. Was she driving at a careful and prudent speed, having due regard to the traffic, surface and width of the highway? Section 113, subd. (a), California Vehicle Act (as amended by St. 1927, p. 1436, § 30). The rate of speed at which a motor vehicle is operated is not alone determinative of whether such vehicle is being driven at a careful and prudent speed. Dam v. Bond, 80 Cal. App. 342, 251 P. 818; Armstrong v. Day, 103 Cal. App. 465, 471, 284 P. 1083. If, under the conditions disclosed by the evidence herein, while driving at a rate of between twenty-five and thirty miles an hour, appellant's car was, upon application of the brakes, reasonably likely to skid and as a result collide with cars of persons lawfully using the same highway, then the jury would have been justified in finding that appellant was not driving at a careful and prudent speed, but that such speed was greater than was reasonable and proper, and consequently in violation of the California Vehicle Act. Davis v. Brown, supra. The implied finding of the jury that appellant was negligently operating her car is amply supported by the evidence, and will not be disturbed.

[8, 9] Appellant complains that the instructions do not properly present to the jury the law regarding proof of negligence, under the testimony. She criticizes instruction XVIII in this respect, claiming, as stated in her brief, she "was entitled to have the jury consider the reasons why her automobile skidded as it did." The instruction thus complained of states, in effect, that driving an automobile in violation of the California Vehicle Act is negligence, and that, if such negligence proximately causes injury, and if the plaintiff is not contributorily negligent, plaintiff without further proof of negligence may recover. Appellant vigorously argues that such instruction directs the jury that, if they find Mrs. Ryan was on the wrong side of the highway, they must render a verdict against her without considering the "facts and circumstances" which caused her to be in such position, and these, she contends, are that she "was faced with an emergency necessitating the sudden stopping of her automobile." The court in other instructions given at the request of appellant fully and clearly instructed the jury upon the very point of which appellant now complains, to wit, the skidding of her automobile and her acts in an emergency, provided such emergency existed. The instructions are to be construed as a whole. There was no error in the giving of this instruction. Leiner v. Eng-Skell Co., 104 Cal. App. 228, 285 P. 905.

[10] Appellant complains of instructions XIX and XX as being ambiguous and misleading. We find no merit in this contention when these instructions are considered with the other instructions of the court. Instructions XIX and XX are inartistically worded, but a judgment will not be reversed because of inartificiality of instructions.

[11] Instruction XXII is as follows: "If you find that both parties were negligent and that their negligence proximately contributed to any injury sustained by plaintiff, then you are not to compare their negligence or determine which was more negligent or which contributed most to the injury, since both would be then jointly and severally liable and the plaintiff could recover against either one of them, provided, of course, he was free from contributory negligence." An instruction substantially the same as the foregoing has been held to be erroneous. Crabbe v. Rhoades, 101 Cal. App. 503, 282 P. 10. If the jury found that the negligence of both drivers proximately caused injury to respondent, then it should have rendered a verdict against both defendants. Crabbe v. Rhoades, supra.

[12, 13] Instruction XXIII is also attacked. It is as follows: "Each of the defendants should receive separate consideration at your hands, and if you find that Mr. Guerrini was not at fault you should return a verdict in his favor irrespective of the verdict that you return against Mrs. Ryan." Appellant contends that the jury was by this instruction directed to return a verdict against her. At the request of appellant, the court instructed the jury: "If you find from the evidence that Mrs. Ryan was not at fault, you must return a verdict in her favor, irrespective of the verdict that you return against Mr. Guerrini." We are of the opinion that appellant is not in a position to complain of the giving of the instruction. In Varley v. Columbia Taxicab Co. (Mo. Sup.) 240 S. W. 218, 221, the court, in discussing an instruction that was attacked because it did not comport with the petition as to the rate of speed under consideration, said: "As to this defendant it will suffice to say that we find in its instruction No. 4 the same rate of speed mentioned. It asked an instruction against its codefendant bottomed upon the speed ordinance, and phrased it just as plaintiff phrased his instruction. So defendant Columbia Taxicab Company is in no position to urge this as error. Its instruction invited the error, if one there was." Without regard to whether or not this instruction comes within the invited error rule, we believe there was no prejudicial error. In other instructions the court stated it was the jury's duty, unaided by any suggestion of the court, to pass upon all questions of fact; that the jury was to understand that the court in no manner expressed, or desired to express, an opinion that any disputed fact had been or had not been proved; that with the questions of fact the court had nothing to do; and that such matters the jury should determine for themselves. It was further instructed, at appellant's request, that, unless the liability of appellant was established by a preponderance of the evidence, the verdict of the jury should be in favor of appellant. These instructions, and others of a general nature not referred to herein, when construed with the first two mentioned in this paragraph, can be said only to instruct the jury that each defendant was to receive separate consideration at the hands of the jury; and it cannot be fairly said that the jury was instructed to render a verdict against Mrs. Ryan.

[14] The court gave the jury fifty-three instructions. The charge covered all the points upon which appellant requested instruction. One of the instructions has been determined erroneous. Others complained of, when considered with the charge as a whole, properly advised the jury upon the matters contained therein. Examining the entire case, including the evidence, we are of the opinion that there was no miscarriage of justice. Article 6, § 4½, Const.

The judgment is affirmed.

BURROUGHS, Justice pro tem.

This action was brought for the specific performance of a contract to convey real property. The court found that the defendant George M. Petty, the vendor named in said contract, could not specifically perform, and in lieu thereof awarded the plaintiffs damages in the sum of $7,500, and the additional sum of $500, paid to said defendant in pursuance of the terms of the contract. The action was upon motion for a nonsuit dismissed as to the other defendants. The defendant Petty has appealed. He brought the record to this court under the alternative method.

[1-3] The first error upon which the appeal is predicated is the claim that neither the original nor the amended complaint states facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. As the original complaint has been superseded by the amended one, it is unnecessary to give further consideration to the former. 21 Cal. Jur. p. 213, § 146. This rule applies even where, as in the instant case, the amended complaint is made to conform to the proof. Dieckmann v. Merkh, 20 Cal. App. 655, 658, 130 P. 27. There has been no demurrer filed to either complaint, and our consideration is therefore confined to the sole question as to the sufficiency of the amended pleading to state a cause of action, which question may be raised at any stage of the case.

[4, 5] It is claimed by the appellant that the complaint is fatally defective because in an action for the specific performance of a contract the plaintiff should allege that the contract is fair, just, and reasonable as to him. There can be no doubt but that such contention is true. The amended complaint does allege, however, "that the said sum of five thousand and no/100ths ($5,000) was an adequate, just, fair and reasonable consideration for said property." Section 3391 of the Civil Code provides that the specific performance of a contract cannot be enforced against a party thereto, "1. If he has not received an adequate consideration for the contract; 2. If it is not, as to him, just and reasonable." In Andersen v. Charles, 52 Cal. App. 290, 198 P. 641, it is held that it is necessary in this character of action that the complaint allege facts showing that the contract is just and reasonable as to the defendant and that the consideration received for the contract is adequate, and an allegation in terms to such effect is but the statement of a conclusion. See, also, 23 Cal. Jur. p. 495, § 53; Salisbury v. Yawger, 184 Cal. 783, 195 P. 682; Miller v. Gusta, 103 Cal. App. 32, 283 P. 946. If at this point we were foreclosed of further inquiry into this question, under the last-mentioned decisions, we would be compelled to order a reversal of this case upon that ground, but in the case of Baker v. Miller, 190 Cal. 263, 266, 212 P. 11, 12, it is said concerning a state of pleadings similar to the one here under consideration: "The only averment in that connection is that 'at or about the date of the contract the estate of said deceased was of the appraised value of $22,753, and said contract was in all respects just and fair and liberal in its provisions in favor of said defendant.' Aside from the statement of the value of the estate, there is not here any attempt to state facts at all—nothing more than the general language of the statute, which amounts to a mere conclusion of law without facts to support it. Joyce v. Tomasini, 168 Cal. 234, 237, 142 P. 67; Stiles v. Cain, 134 Cal. 170, 172, 66 P. 231. If it be contended that the statement of facts in the complaint, including the contract, set out in exact words, together with an allegation of the appraised valuation of the estate, constitute an inferential averment not amounting to an absolute want of facts, the cases relied upon to support the complaint are not in point. They merely hold that if 'no demurrer is interposed, the pleading will be held good after judgment.' Estate of Behrens, 130 Cal. 416, 418, 62 P. 603, 604. Viewed as a whole we feel there is no escape from the conclusion that the complaint is insufficient, and the general demurrer interposed by the defendant should have been sustained." However, after reciting the facts of that case, the court concluded that "the case presented is one which falls squarely within the constitutional inhibition that no judgment shall be set aside for any error as to any matter of pleading, unless after an examination of the entire case, including the evidence, the court shall be of the opinion that the error complained of has resulted in a miscarriage of justice."

[6-8] Although in the case at bar, under the above authorities, the amended complaint is defective, the evidence hereinafter set forth shows that the contract is, as to the defendant, just and reasonable and sustained by an adequate consideration, and the court has so found. After judgment, the amended complaint is sufficient to sustain the action. Objection is also made that the amended complaint is insufficient because it does not allege the value of the property either at the time the contract was made or at the time of its alleged breach. The said complaint does allege the value of the property at the time of the making of the contract as $5,000 and the damage suffered by the plaintiff at the time the contract was breached, as $15,000; this statement we believe, in the absence of a demurrer, inferentially states its value. But we believe that the cause, having gone to judgment, falls within the rule laid down in Baker v. Miller, supra. It is also claimed that there is a failure to allege bad faith; but, taking the entire amended complaint as a whole, it sets forth facts from which bad faith may be inferred. Facts are alleged which show full compliance on the part of plaintiffs, defendant's cancellation of the escrow, and his immediate sale of the property to a third person, thus putting it beyond his power to perform. We think these allegations are sufficient to state a cause of action in that behalf, especially as the evidence is sufficient and there are proper findings of fact.

[9, 10] Objection is also made that material findings and conclusions of law fail to support the judgment. These we will consider after the examination of the evidence.

There is substantial evidence to support the following facts, many of them being uncontradicted: On December 14, 1928, the plaintiffs, as buyers, and defendant Petty, as seller, entered into an agreement whereby the plaintiffs agreed to buy, and the defendant agreed to sell, a certain lot in the county of Los Angeles for the sum of $5,000. The terms of the contract were evidenced by an escrow agreement deposited with the First State Bank of Lawnsdale as the escrow holder. Plaintiffs had paid by check outside of escrow $500 of the purchase price, which was acknowledged in the agreement; $3,000 by check at the time of the execution of the agreement, and under its terms $1,500 was to be paid into escrow on or before January 2, 1929; the balance of the $5,000 was to be used for commissions and other expenses, and was not to be paid into the escrow. The defendant Petty was to deposit in the escrow a deed of the property to be delivered to plaintiffs after recordation upon their payment into the escrow the sum of $4,250; such sum being the total due after deducting the $500 paid out of escrow and a commission of $250. This deed was deposited in escrow within the time limit required. It is provided in the escrow agreement that the holder is the agent of both parties. Under the buyers' agreement it is provided that the buyers give authority to the escrow holder to use all funds deposited by them to carry out the instructions provided that "on or before January 14, 1929, instruments have been filed for record entitling you to procure assurance of title in the form of a guarantee of title issued by California Title Insurance Company. * * *" The foregoing instructions were accepted and approved in their entirety by the seller. The evidence further shows that on Saturday, December 29, 1928, J. C. Wright, one of the parties to the agreement and a respondent herein, deposited with the escrow a check for $1,511, to pay the balance due, the $11 to pay the escrow charges. This last-named check was drawn on the Huntington Park Bank, a branch bank of the Security First National Trust & Savings Bank at Seventh and Spring streets in Los Angeles. On Monday, December 31, 1928, the Lawnsdale Bank, the escrow holder, sent this check, with others, in a cash letter to the above-mentioned First National Bank above referred to, where it was credited to the account of the Lawnsdale Bank and forwarded to the Huntington Park Bank. The account of J. C. Wright, the maker of the check, amounted to between seven and eight hundred dollars in the last-named bank, and, when the check reached it, the officials telephoned the home of J. C. Wright, and Wright being away from home, his wife directed the insertion at the head of the check—Seventh and Spring—the head office of the Huntington Bank, where Wright had a checking account of about $10,000. This was done, and the check was returned to the Seventh and Spring street bank and received on January 4, 1929.

The escrow bank never knew of this error, which occurred through Mr. Wright having checks of both banks in his pocket and inadvertently using the wrong one, nor was the escrow at any time after December 29, 1928, without credit for the full amount due Petty. The bank of Lawnsdale had credit for the check on January 2d and at all times thereafter. That credit was never changed and the funds were there available to their use. The Lawnsdale Bank credited the money to the escrow, but made the distinction that it was not credited to the seller and could not be credited until certain instruments should have been filed for record and certificates returned; and, by the terms of the agreement of escrow, the bank as holder of the escrow had until January 14th in which to perform these acts and complete the escrow. The buyer had paid and the funds had been properly credited, and, before the limit of time in which to complete the escrow had expired, the seller withdrew his papers and refused to complete his contract. On January 4, 1929, the appellant, Petty, called at the Lawnsdale Bank and inquired if the money was there for him, but was told that there had been no report on the check, and it was suggested that he call next day. He was also advised by the said bank that they had not recorded the deed nor received the certificate of title. Petty left the bank and returned later with a written notice signed by him canceling the escrow.

After demand on Petty to fulfill the terms of the escrow, the plaintiffs commenced this action on January 8, 1929, for the specific performance of the contract or damages in case the first-named relief could not be granted. The case came on regularly for trial March 12, 1929, and on the following day it developed that defendant Petty had sold the property involved an hour before this action was filed, to his attorney, W. E. Lady, for the sum of $7,500, with the understanding between them that, after Lady had received from oil profits from said land the amount of the purchase price, Petty and Lady would then divide any further profits between them. The complaint was thereupon amended, and Lady, together with another party, was brought into the case. The evidence further discloses that for some time prior to the date of the execution of the escrow agreement the property in controversy and the land in that vicinity was being prospected for oil; that considerable excitement had prevailed; that the Standard and other large oil concerns were interested; that, at 3 o'clock on the morning of the day the escrow herein was entered into, a well not far distant from this land had actually developed oil, although, according to the evidence, neither party knew at the time of such development. There was testimony that, at the time of the making of the contract, the fair market value of the land was from $4,500 to $5,000, which was a fair price, irrespective of the oil strike near by. From the date of the escrow until January 4, 1929, when the defendant Petty gave notice of cancellation, the price continued to increase until on the last-named date the market value was fixed by witnesses as being between $12,500 and $17,500. The court found that at the date of the agreement the market value was $5,000, and, when breached, it had a market value of $12,500. The court also found that defendant Petty acted in bad faith. We think the court's finding is justified by the evidence that, without waiting for a report or return on the check, without waiting until January 14, 1929, for the recordation of the deed, and without waiting for the receipt of the certificate of title, as he had agreed to do, he attempted to cancel the escrow, and had then sold the property in such a manner as to prevent the enforcement of the agreement and to still retain, for all practical purposes, one-half of the income of the property. In any event, this was a question of fact to be determined by the court. It is true that some of this evidence is disputed, but it was for the trial court to determine the conflict, and, having done so, its findings thereon may not be disturbed by us.

[11] It appears from the foregoing that the consideration for the contract was adequate; that as to the defendant it was just and reasonable; and that the defendant acted in bad faith. In such cases the proper measure of damage is fixed by section 3306 of the Civil Code as follows: "The detriment caused by the breach of an agreement to convey an estate in real property is deemed to be the price paid, and the expenses properly incurred in examining the title and preparing the necessary papers, with interest thereon; but adding thereto, in case of bad faith, the difference between the price agreed to be paid and the value of the estate agreed to be conveyed, at the time of the breach. * * *" Hansen v. Hevener, 69 Cal. App. 337, 231 P. 361. This rule was followed in the present case. The plaintiff was allowed such detriment plus the $500 paid to defendant Petty out of escrow and which he still retains.

A review of the entire record, including all of the evidence, satisfies us that there has not been a miscarriage of justice. Article 6, § 4½, Const. of Cal. The judgment should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

KNIGHT, J.

This action is one of three brought to rescind the sale of corporate stock purchased by plaintiffs from the Reliable Carpet Works, Inc., a Delaware corporation, and to recover the purchase price paid therefor upon the ground that the sales were brought about by fraudulent representations made by the representatives of said corporation; and that the permit issued by the corporation commissioner to sell said stock was under suspension at the time these sales were made. Waldo W. Braren is the plaintiff in the present action, which involves a single sale of stock for the sum of $250; Mary Braren and Edlyn B. Welch are the plaintiffs in the other actions, each of which involves two sales of stock for the sum of $500. The actions were brought against "Reliable Carpet Works, Inc., a Delaware Corporation, Reliable Carpet Works, Inc., a California Corporation, R. D. Cornell, H. L. Cornell, Robert W. Kearney, and H. T. Brookmiller," the individuals named being, so the complaint alleges, "the duly authorized and acting agents" of the Delaware corporation. The California corporation demurred to the complaint in each action, and its demurrers were sustained without leave to amend, and from the rulings made in that behalf plaintiffs have taken these appeals.

[1] The decisions hold uniformly that no appeal lies from an order sustaining a demurrer without leave to amend, and that, if such appeal is attempted, it will be dismissed; that the only method of reviewing such a ruling is by way of appeal from the final judgment, if unfavorable, thereafter entered in the action. Brunson v. Santa Monica, 25 Cal. App. 383, 143 P. 792; Worth v. Witt, 62 Cal. App. 134, 216 P. 90; Riordan v. Zube, 50 Cal. App. 22, 195 P. 65; Sahakian v. City of Los Angeles, 91 Cal. App. 737, 267 P. 571; Bryant v. Kelly, 203 Cal. 721, 265 P. 817; 2 Cal. Jur., pp. 156, 157. In the present cases minute orders were entered on October 1, 1929, the day on which the demurrers were heard, setting forth the trial court's rulings. And later, on October 31, 1929, there was filed in each action a document, signed by the trial judge, entitled "Judgment," which, after reciting that the demurrer came on regularly for hearing, "ordered, adjudged and decreed that the said demurrer be sustained without leave to amend with costs of $3.50." A similar document was reviewed in the case of O'Neill v. Hicks, 101 Cal. App. 374, 281 P. 531, and was held to be lacking in the essentials of a final judgment because it contained no adjudication finally and irrevocably dismissing the demurring party from the action; and for that reason the court refused to entertain an appeal taken therefrom.

[2] Notwithstanding the defect mentioned, we have examined into the merits of the appeals here presented, and find no error in the trial court's ruling because there is nothing whatever alleged in the complaints tending to connect the California corporation directly or inferentially with any of the sales of said stock or with any of the transactions about which plaintiffs complain. On the contrary, it affirmatively appears therefrom that all of the charges of irregularity and fraud are directed against the Delaware corporation and its agents; that the permit which it is claimed was suspended covered only the stock of the Delaware corporation; that plaintiffs negotiated for the purchase of the stock of that corporation only, and that the stock thereof was sold and delivered to them; that all fraudulent representations claimed to have been made pertained exclusively to the business of the Delaware corporation, and it is alleged that the same were made by "the defendants, R. D. Cornell, and H. L. Cornell as the duly authorized agents" of that corporation. The only reference to the California corporation is contained in an allegation made on information and belief to the effect that at the time of its incorporation the Delaware corporation conveyed to it, without any consideration, all of its assets, and that the California corporation carried on the business at the same place, with the same equipment, and under the same officers. In this connection plaintiffs cite several cases, notably Stanford Hotel Co. v. M. Schwind Co., 180 Cal. 348, 181 P. 780, and Strahm v. Fraser, 32 Cal. App. 447, 163 P. 680, to the effect that a corporation may not evade its just debts by reorganizing under a new name and continuing the same business with practically the same stockholders and directors. But it is evident that the rule mentioned has no application here, because the present cases are not founded on any such theory, the sole purpose thereof being to recover from certain alleged tort-feasors the amount of money paid to them by plaintiffs as a result of an alleged fraudulent sale of personal property to plaintiffs by said tort-feasors; and, as stated, nowhere in said complaints was it charged, nor is it now claimed, that the California corporation participated in the slightest manner in any of the transactions relating to the alleged fraudulent sales or in the illegal issuance of the stock sold to plaintiffs; or that it received any benefit whatever therefrom. Therefore the mere fact that it may have succeeded to the business of the Delaware corporation would not in itself serve as legal ground for holding it responsible for certain alleged fraudulent acts previously committed by its predecessor in interest in the sale of the latter's stock.

The purported judgment from which the appeal herein was taken is therefore affirmed.

Motion to dismiss appeal.

In support of its motion to dismiss the appeal herein for failure to file a transcript of the record within the prescribed time, respondent has filed the certificate of the county clerk as required by rule VI of the Rules of the Supreme Court and District Courts of Appeal. Burglary ⇐41(1).
Robbery ⇐24(1).

Evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction under information charging burglary and robbery.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; R. M. Rankin, Judge.

H. F. Hopkins, Frank Digiovanni, and another were convicted on an information charging burglary and robbery, and defendant last named appeals.

Affirmed.

W. T. Kendrick, Jr., of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

IRA F. THOMPSON, J.

The defendants were accused in an information containing two counts, filed by the district attorney of Los Angeles county, with the crimes of burglary and robbery. The defendant Digiovanni was also accused of the prior conviction of a felony, which he admitted. The jury found all the defendants guilty, but Digiovanni alone prosecutes this appeal from the judgment and from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

Appellant's counsel presents two reasons why we should reverse the judgment. They are: (1) Insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict, and (2) misconduct on the part of the district attorney.

There can be no dispute about the following essential facts: On the evening of September 28, 1931, between 9:15 and 10 o'clock p. m., appellant's codefendants walked into a cider mill located at 2820 East Anaheim street in Long Beach. The two stood on opposite sides of the employee in charge and each pressed the muzzle of a gun against his body, commanding him to get the money. He told them it was in a drawer, whereupon one of them ripped part of the drawer off and took its contents, amounting to between $2 and $3. The employee was then taken out into an alley back of the store and released. In other words, there is no question raised concerning the commission of the crime or participation in it by the defendants Hopkins and Brown. But was Digiovanni a participant? For the purpose of answering this question we now set down the testimony connecting appellant with the offenses.

About the same time that the robbery occurred one Harold Nixon observed a Nash sedan going down Anaheim street without any lights. Approximately fifteen minutes later the witness saw the same automobile parked in front of a café next door to the cider mill. He also testified that after observing the owner of the shop and talking to him for a moment he started for a pool hall a short distance away and noticed two men on the inside of the shop and one in a car—the Nash sedan; that the sedan then moved away from the curb and drove east on Anaheim to Gladys street, at which place it made a "U" turn, coming back west on Anaheim. The license number of the car was 8T2573. Nixon then, in company with one Baumgardner and officer Halford, in another car, followed the Nash around as it continued its apparently aimless circling in the neighborhood of the robbery. They lost sight of it on two or three occasions, but it reappeared. Finally they stopped the Nash on Orizaba street between Tenth and Eleventh, at which time appellant was driving and the defendant Brown was a passenger.

Officer Halford testified that at the time of the arrest appellant was driving and that on the way to the police station the defendant Brown remarked that "he would have to get in communication with Eddie Roberts." At the station the appellant and Brown were questioned by officer Springer. The last named testified that appellant first gave his name as Frank De Young and stated that he had known the defendant Brown for about six years; also that he had borrowed the Nash automobile from one Eddie Roberts, whom he had known for about two months, who was doing "a little bootlegging" and who lived at about 860 South Burlington street, in Los Angeles. He also stated that he (the appellant) owned a model A Ford sedan which he had left at Roberts' home. This Ford was found parked on Miramar street in Los Angeles, alongside of the property at 250 South Burlington—in front of which was parked a Ford automobile belonging to the defendant Brown. The evidence discloses further that the Nash sedan had been purchased by the defendant Hopkins under the name of Joe Stone. Hopkins had a key to the premises, and no person by the name of Eddie Roberts was discovered thereabouts.

We are satisfied that the evidence recited is ample justification for the jury's conclusion that appellant was a participant. First, there was the aimless driving around of the automobile in the neighborhood of the crime during the time that it was being committed. Second, the appellant was driving one of the identified defendants immediately after the commission of the crime. Third, was the untruthful statement by appellant concerning the ownership of the Nash sedan; and fourth is the fact that the automobiles of both Brown and appellant were found parked near the house rented and occupied by the defendant Hopkins. The jury undoubtedly concluded, as was its right, that the three men had met at this house earlier in the evening, had gone to the scene of this offense in the Nash sedan and that appellant had been elected by them to do the driving and aid them in their "getaway." As was said in People v. Moe, 116 Cal. App. 740, 3 P.(2d) 354, 359: "Every juror knows that to make a quick and therefore a successful 'getaway' the active perpetrators of a crime must have some person, more passive than they in his connection with the offense, occupying and in charge of the car which has brought them to the scene. This is true for the reason that the motor must be started upon the appearance of the direct perpetrators, or must be kept running during their absence. The car must be occupied by such a person to the end that it be not hemmed in by other cars if the scene be in a heavily traveled district, that no occurrence or mishap of any other character shall impair or render inefficient the instrumentality provided for a getaway, and that the occupant of the car may keep a lookout for a possible interference by the police, or for other untoward events likely to interfere with a consummation of the crime and lead to an arrest of the active participants in it, and by some concerted signal apprise them of the danger. These passive but handy participants in the commission of crime are so necessary a part of the paraphernalia of criminal machinery that they have names which distinguish them from those for whom they act as chauffeurs, being called lookouts, lookees or doormen." The jury was warranted in the present case in concluding, as they undoubtedly did, that appellant acted in the capacity so designated.

Nor do we find anything upon which to base a conclusion that the district attorney was guilty of misconduct. The witness who added to his answer that appellant had told him that "he had done time for section 146 C. V. A." was immediately cautioned by the court and the objectionable part of the answer stricken and the jury admonished. We cannot indulge the presumption that the district attorney knew that the revolver could not be identified. Perhaps he had good reason to believe otherwise. Furthermore, after the court had ruled upon the objection the judge instructed the jury to treat the gun as though they had never seen the object. So far as the argument of the prosecution is concerned, we fail to see that it extended beyond the limits of legitimate argument.

Judgment and order affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Samuel R. Blake, Judge.

Action by the Monterey Park Commercial & Savings Bank against the Bank of West Hollywood and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

Reversed.

Superseding opinion in 10 P.(2d) 112.

David E. Fulwider, of Hollywood (Harold A. Fendler, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellants.

Goudge, Robinson & Hughes and David A. Sondel, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMISON, Justice pro tem.

This was an action to cancel a certain deed from plaintiff to defendant Leslie Miller for a certain tract of land containing ten acres in Yucaipa Valley and also to cancel a deed conveying the same land from said Leslie Miller to defendants George W. Miller and Elizabeth Miller, or in the event that title to said land cannot be decreed to plaintiff that it recover from defendants the sum of $7,200, that being the reasonable value of said lands.

Judgment was rendered for plaintiff canceling the said deeds and requiring said Millers to reconvey said land to plaintiff within thirty days after its rendition, and in the event of their failure to do this that plaintiff have judgment against them and the defendant Bank of West Hollywood for the sum of $8,000. All of the said defendants filed motions for new trials, and said motions having been denied, they have appealed.

No judgment was taken against defendant Alice A. Dodd.

In October, 1926, defendant Alice Dodd and her husband conveyed to respondent by their deed a five-acre tract of land known as block 82, hereafter also referred to as tract No. 1, and also a tract of land known as block 70, hereafter also referred to as tract No. 2.

Thereafter on January 4, 1927, the said Alice Dodd, acting through her husband, J. D. Dodd, entered into an escrow with appellant Leslie Miller by which she agreed, in exchange for certain property to be deeded to her by said Miller, to convey to him the ten-acre tract designated as tract No. 2.

On January 14, 1927, appellant Leslie Miller and said Alice Dodd entered into another escrow known as escrow No. 258 in which she agreed to convey to said appellant the said five acres embraced in tract No. 1 in exchange for certain property to be conveyed to her by said Miller. Both of these escrows were deposited with appellant Bank of West Hollywood as escrow holder.

On March 25, 1927, respondent wrote a letter to said Bank of West Hollywood, inclosing therewith a deed, wherein respondent was named as grantor and the said Leslie Miller as grantee, conveying to the said Miller the said five acres described as block 82, in which referring to escrow 251A the following instructions were given to appellant: "You are at liberty to use this deed in accordance with instructions from Mr. J. D. Dodd which I understand he has given you in connection with the above mentioned escrow and escrow No. 1058 at the Wilshire National Bank, when you are able to remit to this Bank the sum of $4,000.00, together with two Trust Deeds, one in the amount of $2,000.00 on property located near the town of Artesia, Los Angeles County, the other for $1200.00 on property located on Bentley Avenue, North Pico, Blvd., in the City of Sawtelle."

On April 11, 1927, appellant Bank of West Hollywood wrote respondent as follows, referring to escrow 251A: "We are returning herewith deed from yourselves to Leslie Miller, covering Block 82, according to Map of Subdivision 3 of a part of Yucaipa Valley, County of San Bernardino, State of California, except portions thereof, as this property is being placed in another escrow, and withdrawn from our escrow," and returned therewith respondent's deed to Miller for said block 82. On April 12, 1927, respondent sent this deed to the Wilshire National Bank with instructions similar to those given the Bank of West Hollywood.

On April 14, 1927, appellant Bank of West Hollywood wrote respondent inclosing a deed from respondent to Leslie Miller for the ten acres described as block 70 and, referring to escrow No. 251A, said: "As the report on condition of title covering property shown in enclosed deed shows title in your Bank we would ask that you have same executed and returned to us. Trusting you will give this matter your attention as we are ready to close the escrow."

On April 25, 1927, the said deed having been signed and acknowledged by the officers of respondent bank, it returned said deed to the Bank of West Hollywood with the following letter, referring to escrow 251A: "Enclosed herewith Corporation Grant Deed executed by the Monterey Commercial and Savings Bank in favor of Leslie Miller, a single man. Trusting you will find same correct and satisfactory we are."

One of the officers who signed and acknowledged the last-named deed in behalf of respondent bank was O. R. Clanton, the vice president thereof. He testified that when he signed the said deed he supposed it contained the same description that was contained in the deed sent to the West Hollywood Bank on March 25, 1927, nor had he at any time received any information, from any source, that a deed containing any other description than that contained in the deed of March 25, 1927, had been requested or required of respondent bank.

W. L. Parslow, who was the secretary of respondent bank and as such signed and acknowledged said last-named deed, testified substantially to the same facts as those testified to by witness Clanton.

Upon the receipt by it of said last-named deed, the Bank of West Hollywood caused said deed to be recorded, and delivered it to said Leslie Miller when said escrow No. 251A was closed.

The escrow in the Wilshire Bank was never closed, but was abandoned and the said deed of appellant to Leslie Miller was never delivered to him, but was returned through the mail to respondent.

Respondent never received any consideration for its deed conveying to Leslie Miller the said block 70, consisting of the ten-acre tract.

On February 9, 1927, appellant Bank of West Hollywood wrote the said Alice A. Dodd stating that it had talked with her husband advising him that it would be necessary to have a deed from respondent to close escrow 251A, and also a copy of its articles of incorporation for filing in San Bernardino county, and on March 4, 1927, a copy of said articles was sent appellant bank by respondent for use in connection with said escrow No. 251A.

On or about August 1, 1927, the said Leslie Miller conveyed said block 70 to his parents, George W. Miller and Elizabeth F. Miller. This deed was recorded on August 11, 1927. Respondent claims that it had no knowledge regarding the delivery of its deed for block 70 to Leslie Miller until in January, 1928, and that on the 28th of that month it wrote the Bank of West Hollywood to return said deed or transmit to it the said $7,200 in cash and mortgages. Appellants contend that the findings are not supported by the evidence.

One of the findings is that the Bank of West Hollywood intentionally misled respondent into believing that the deed to the ten acres in block 70 sent it on April 14, 1927, was in fact the deed for the five-acre tract in block 82. We find no support in the evidence for this finding. Nor are the findings that the Bank of West Hollywood at all times knew or should have known that respondent at no time intended to deposit with the Bank of West Hollywood its deed for the said 10 acres in block 70, nor to permit any conveyance of said 10 acres to be made to said Miller, and that the Bank of West Hollywood concealed from respondent the fact that said deed covered the said 10 acres in block 70 instead of the 5 acres in block 82 and concealed from respondent that Leslie Miller had executed a deed to the 10 acres in block 70 to George W. Miller and Elizabeth F. Miller are not supported by the evidence. There are other findings of the court which the evidence fails to support, but we will limit our discussion of them to one more only.

The court found that the conveyance from Leslie Miller to George W. Miller and Elizabeth F. Miller was executed without any good or valuable consideration and that said conveyance was received by them with full knowledge of respondent's rights. That each and all of said Millers, at the time the said deed from respondent to Leslie Miller was recorded, knew that said deed had been deposited with the Bank of West Hollywood upon condition that respondent should receive therefor the said sum of $4,000 and the said trust deed prior to its delivery to Leslie Miller and that at all times the said Millers knew that respondent had received nothing of value for said deed. We find no evidence supporting these findings.

Respondent contends that the deed from it to Leslie Miller for the ten acre tract in block 70, escrow No. 251A, was never delivered to him. While the court found that this deed was delivered by the Bank of West Hollywood to Leslie Miller, there is no finding whether or not respondent delivered said deed to Leslie Miller or caused it to be delivered to him.

The Bank of West Hollywood claims that having informed respondent that escrow No. 251A was ready to be closed and that said deed was necessary for that purpose, and inasmuch as respondent, in its letter enclosing said deed, attached no conditions to its delivery to Leslie Miller in completing the closing of said escrow, it was authorized to make the delivery. Some color is given to this claim of appellant Bank of West Hollywood from the fact that in its letter of February 9, 1927, to Alice A. Dodd it stated to her that it would be necessary to have a deed from respondent for the said ten-acre tract before escrow No. 251A could be closed, and there is a presumption that respondent had knowledge of the contents of this letter from the fact that in this same letter a request was made for a copy of respondent's articles of incorporation and on March 11, 1927, respondent sent a copy of said articles to be used in connection with said escrow No. 251A.

[1, 2] Respondent contends that there was not a delivery of the deed executed by it to Leslie Miller and cites authorities to the effect that a deed placed in escrow is not an absolute delivery, but these cases are not in point for the reason that in all of them a condition was attached to the delivery and it was held that a delivery could not be made until there was a compliance with the conditions.

In the instant case no conditions were attached to the delivery of the deed to Leslie Miller. Respondent had notice that escrow 251A was ready to be closed and that its deed was necessary to close same, without attaching any conditions to its delivery to Leslie Miller it executed the deed and returned it to the Bank of West Hollywood to be delivered to the grantees. The true test under which delivery is to be determined is in ascertaining whether in parting with the possession of the conveyance the grantor thereby intended to divest himself of title. If he did there was an effective delivery of the deed. Williams v. Kidd, 170 Cal. 631, 151 P. 1, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 703; Hotaling v. Hotaling, 193 Cal. 368, 224 P. 455, 56 A. L. R. 734; Kimbro v. Kimbro, 199 Cal. 344, 249 P. 180. It was stipulated that the deed from respondent to Leslie Miller was duly executed by respondent. Section 1933 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that the execution of an instrument is the subscribing and delivering of it, with or without affixing a seal. And it has been held that execution includes delivery. Williams v. Kidd, supra; Worthley v. Worthley, 33 Cal. App. 473, 165 P. 714; Van Valkenburgh v. Oldham, 12 Cal. App. 572, 108 P. 42.

[3] Appellants Miller contend that as they are innocent purchasers for value without notice, that judgment should have been rendered in their favor. To entitle one to protection as a bona fide purchaser he must aver and prove that he purchased in good faith, without notice and for a valuable consideration. 25 Cal. Jur. 844; Kenniff v. Caulfield, 140 Cal. 34, 73 P. 803; County Bank of San Luis Obispo v. Fox, 119 Cal. 61, 51 P. 11. The evidence fails to show that appellants George W. Miller and Elizabeth F. Miller paid a valuable consideration, and that their purchase of the ten-acre tract was made in good faith and without notice. Nor is there evidence that Leslie Miller paid a valuable consideration for said tract. The burden was upon them to prove these facts. Kenniff v. Caulfield, supra.

[4] Respondent claims that the deed for the ten-acre tract was signed and executed by two of its officers by mistake; that they thought they were signing a deed for the five-acre tract. It appears that this deed for the ten-acre tract was in the possession of respondent for upwards of ten days before it was sent back to the Bank of West Hollywood. Ample opportunity was therefore given it to learn just what tract was contained in the description of the land. In the absence of fraud or undue influence a party cannot rely upon his own negligence or carelessness. Placer County Bank v. Freeman, 126 Cal. 90, 58 P. 388.

In the case of Greve v. Taft Realty Co., 101 Cal. App. 343, 281 P. 641, 645, Mr. Justice Plummer, delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The third proposition which we have to consider is whether the testimony of two of the officers, that they did not read the agreement and did not intend to bind the corporation, can be given any legal effect. The authorities all seem to be in the negative, a few of which we will cite." He thereupon cited, among others, Silva v. Silva, 32 Cal. App. 115, 162 P. 142; Knox v. Modern Garage, etc., Shop, 68 Cal. App. 583, 229 P. 880; and Gridley v. Tilson, 202 Cal. 748, 262 P. 322.

[5] Respondent had judgment for $8,000. The prayer was for $7,200 only. A judgment for damages in excess of the amount prayed for is erroneous.

We are of the opinion that for the reasons heretofore set forth the judgment should be reversed and it is so ordered.

Special constitutional or statutory provision on one branch of subject controls general provision relating thereto.

3. Municipal corporations ⇐46.

Effect of election, at which electors voted to relinquish city's control over public utilities to railroad commission, was to surrender all of city's powers over them in conflict with commission's powers (Const. art. 12, § 23, as amended in 1911 and 1914; St. 1911, Ex. Sess., p. xlviii).

4. Municipal corporations ⇐57.

Constitutional amendments and statute held not to revest in municipalities powers of control over public utilities (Const. art. 12, § 23, as amended in 1911 and 1914; St. 1911, Ex. Sess., p. xlviii; St. 1915, p. 1274, § 2 (b).

Const. art. 12, § 23, as amended in 1914, provides that powers of counties, cities, etc., respecting public utilities shall cease after passage of laws conferring such powers on railroad commission so far as conflicting with latter's powers, but that section shall not affect such powers relating to local, police, sanitary, and other regulations as majority of municipality's electors vote to retain, while St. 1915, p.

1273, repealing the Hewitt Act (see St. 1911, Ex. Sess., p. xlviii), defines "powers of control" in section 2 (b) (St. 1915, p. 1274, § 2 (b), as all such powers of municipalities to supervise and regulate relationship of such utilities with their customers, but not with general public in matters affecting latter's health, convenience, and safety.

5. Constitutional law ⇐23.

Constitutions must be considered prospective, not retrospective, in operation, unless contrary intention clearly appears.

6. Street railroads ⇐72.

Whether one-man cars shall be operated on traction lines, constituting unified service in several cities and counties, held not "municipal affair" beyond railroad commission's control, though such cars are operated over line wholly within one city only (Const. art. 12, § 23, as amended in 1914).

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Municipal Affairs," see Words and Phrases.]

7. Municipal corporations ⇐70.

State has control of public streets and highways, except in so far as relinquished to municipalities.

8. Municipal corporations ⇐70.

Doubt as to whether regulation of use of public street is municipal affair must be resolved in favor of state's legislative authority.

9. Municipal corporations ⇐661(1).

Municipality may regulate operation of vehicles on public streets, in absence of affirmative action by state Legislature or railroad commission exercising power to regulate public utilities, but cannot enact regulations conflicting with those of Legislature or commission.

10. Street railroads ⇐72.

Power to regulate number of men operating street car is germane to subject of regulation and control of public utilities by railroad commission (Const. art. 12, § 23, as amended in 1911 and 1914; St. 1911, Ex. Sess., p. xlviii; St. 1915, p. 1274, § 2 (b).

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Warren V. Tryon, Judge.

Suit by the Key System Transit Company, a corporation, against the City of Oakland and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, the city and certain other defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

C. Stanley Wood, City Atty., Homer W. Buckley, Asst. City Atty., John W. Collier, Deputy City Atty., and Preston Higgins, former City Atty., all of Oakland, for appellants.

Brobeck, Phleger & Harrison, of San Francisco, Chapman, Trefethen & Chapman, of Oakland, and Frank S. Richards, of San Francisco (James S. Moore, Jr., and Kenneth Ferguson, both of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

An appeal by defendant city of Oakland, a municipal corporation, and certain of its officers from a judgment enjoining the enforcement of ordinance numbered 4240, N. S., adopted October 1, 1928, which required all persons operating electric street cars within the city to maintain upon each of said cars while containing passengers a motorman and a conductor.

On December 19, 1928, the district attorney of Alameda county instituted a prosecution against the plaintiff and one of its employees, charging a violation of the ordinance in that they operated a one-man street car on what is known as the "Twenty-Third Avenue street car line," which is wholly within the municipality. A plea of not guilty was entered, and the present action was brought to enjoin the prosecution on the grounds that the municipality was without power to pass the ordinance, and that, assuming it had jurisdiction to regulate the manner of operating cars, the ordinance was an unreasonable exercise of the police power.

The material provisions of the ordinance are:

"Section One. Every person, company or corporation operating street cars within the city of Oakland by means of electricity shall provide and maintain upon each of such cars while containing passengers at least two employees, to wit, a motorman and a conductor, during all the time said car is in motion within said city, each of said employees to be an adult not less than eighteen years of age excepting as hereinafter provided.

"Section Two. The council may grant by ordinance permission to operate one-man street cars over such lines and upon such conditions as it may prescribe after an application made therefor."

The trial court found that plaintiff operates a street railway within the municipality and elsewhere in the counties of Alameda and Contra Costa; that its system is a unified service, operating under franchises granted by various cities and towns, and that different traction division lines, of which the line hereinbefore mentioned was one, together with plaintiff's bus lines, transfer passengers to others both in and without the incorporated area served; further, that on October 15, 1928, plaintiff filed with defendant city its application requesting authority to continue to operate one-man cars over its Twenty-Third avenue and other lines, which the court found it had been doing for several years previous to the adoption of the ordinance, and that the application was denied on November 13, 1928; that on October 16, 1928, the plaintiff also filed an application with the railroad commission for authority to continue such operation, and on November 3, 1928, after a hearing at which defendant municipality was represented, the commission made its order permitting one-man cars to be operated on said Twenty-Third avenue line and other lines of the company. It was also found that on February 17, 1914, pursuant to the provisions of chapter 40 of the Statutes of California, Extra Session 1911, page 168, defendant municipality submitted to its qualified electors the proposition whether it should retain its powers of control over public utilities; that on that date at an election duly and regularly held a majority of said electors voted not to retain such control, but that the same should be vested in the railroad commission; and thereafter on February 25, 1914, in accordance with the statute a certified copy of the order declaring the result of the election was duly filed with the commission. The trial court concluded that jurisdiction to regulate the operation of railways within the municipality vested exclusively within the railroad commission; that the regulation of plaintiff's lines was a general, not a local, matter; and that consequently the ordinance was void. The court expressly declined to pass upon the second objection made to the validity of the ordinance.

[1, 2] Defendants contend, as stated in their brief, that "the provisions of section 23 of art. 12 of the Constitution of the State of California (prior to its amendment in 1914) and the 'Hewitt Act' (chap. 40, Statutes Extra Session 1911) cannot be held applicable to cities operating under freeholders' charters; in other words, they were designed and intended to apply to all cities other than those having freeholders' charters," and that "sec. 23 of art. 12 of the Constitution, even though by its provisions specifically declared not subject to or limited by any other provision of the Constitution, is nevertheless limited by sections 6 and 8 of art. 11 thereof relating to charter cities." Said section 23, as amended October 10, 1911, provided that the railroad commission should have such power to regulate public utilities as should be conferred upon it by the Legislature, authority to confer such power being declared therein "to be plenary and to be unlimited by any provision of this Constitution"; and that after the passage by the Legislature of laws conferring powers upon the commission respecting such public utilities all powers respecting such public utilities vested in municipal councils or other governing bodies of the cities of the state existing at the time of the passage of such laws should cease so far as such powers conflicted with the powers so conferred upon the commission.

The section contained the provision that "this section shall not affect such powers of control over any public utility vested in any city and county, or incorporated city or town as, at an election to be held pursuant to laws to be passed hereafter by the legislature, a majority of the qualified electors voting thereon of such city and county, or incorporated city or town, shall vote to retain, and until such election such powers shall continue unimpaired; but if the vote so taken shall not favor the continuation of such powers they shall thereafter vest in the railroad commission as provided by law." (See St. 1911, Ex. Sess., p. xlviii.)

Section 82 of the Public Utilities Act (St. 1911, Ex. Sess., p. 62) contains the same proviso; and it has been held that as the result the powers of control over existing public utilities vested in any city were still retained and did not pass to the commission until at an election held for that purpose pursuant to the statute the qualified electors of the city voted not to retain such powers. Title Guarantee, etc., Co. v. Railroad Commission, 168 Cal. 295, 142 P. 878, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 738.

The charter of defendant city grants to the council the power to regulate utilities within the municipality; and it has been held that the provisions of section 8 of article 11 of the constitution with regard to the amendment of freeholders' charters are exclusive. Blanchard v. Hartwell, 131 Cal. 263, 63 P. 349; In re Pfahler, 150 Cal. 71, 85, 88 P. 270, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1092, 11 Ann. Cas. 911; Garver v. Council of City of Oakland, 96 Cal. App. 560, 274 P. 375.

Defendants contend that to give effect to section 23 of article 12 and the Hewitt Act, where a municipality is operating under a freeholders' charter which grants power to its governing body to regulate public utilities, would result in an amendment of the charter in a manner not sanctioned by the Constitution. But section 23 makes provision for the surrender for a specific purpose by the act of its qualified electors of a power vested in a municipality, no distinction being made between cities organized under general laws and those operating under freeholders' charters; and it is manifest from a reading of the two sections that it was not the intention to use the comparatively cumbrous procedure provided for the amendment of charters in ordinary cases rather than the more direct method of determining the will of the electors as provided by section 23. That such was the fact was assumed, if not decided, in the following cases: Oro. Elec. Corporation v. Railroad Commission, 169 Cal. 466, 147 P. 118; City of San Jose v. Railroad Commission, 175 Cal. 284, 165 P. 967. And, while not controlling, such has been the construction placed thereon by the railroad commission over a long period. Long Beach Chamber of Commerce v. Pacific Elec. Ry. Co., 2 C. R. C. 455; Id., 3 C. R. C. 611.

A special provision on one branch of a subject controls a general provision relating thereto, and will prevail in its application to the subject-matter so far as coming within its particular provisions (Bateman v. Colgan, 111 Cal. 580, 44 P. 238; Civic Center Ass'n v. Railroad Comm., 175 Cal. 441, 449, 166 P. 351); and it is our conclusion that section 23 of article 12 of the Constitution and the Hewitt Act were intended to apply to cities governed by a freeholders' charter as well as to others. This section was amended on November 3, 1914, and provides that: "From and after the passage by the Legislature of laws conferring powers upon the Railroad Commission respecting public utilities, all powers respecting such public utilities vested in * * * the several counties, cities and counties, cities and towns * * * shall cease so far as such powers shall conflict with the powers so conferred upon the Railroad Commission; provided, however, that this section shall not affect such powers of control over public utilities as relate to the making and enforcement of local, police, sanitary and other regulations other than the fixing of rates vested in any city and county, or incorporated city or town, as at an election to be held pursuant to law, a majority of the qualified electors * * * shall vote to retain; and until such election such powers shall continue unimpaired. * * *" On June 7, 1915, chapter 646 of the Statutes of 1915 (St. 1915, p. 1273) was approved. This act, which became effective August 8, 1915, repealed the Hewitt Act, and provided the method to be followed in determining whether the powers of control retained by incorporated cities should be surrendered to the commission. Section 2(b) of the statute provided that: "The term 'powers of control,' as used in this act * * * means all powers of control vested in such municipality or municipalities to supervise and regulate the relationship between such public utilities, or such class or classes of public utilities, and their present or prospective customers, consumers or patrons, but said term shall not be construed to include the powers of control vested in any municipality or municipalities to supervise and regulate the relationship between such public utilities, or such class or classes of public utilities, and the general public in matters affecting the health, convenience and safety of the general public, including matters such as the use and repair of public streets by any public utility, the location of the poles, wires, mains or conduits of any public utility, on, under or above any public streets, and the speed of common carriers operating within the limits of the municipality."

[3, 4] There can be no doubt but that the effect of the election was to surrender all powers of control over public utilities in so far as they conflict with the powers conferred upon the commission; but appellants contend that it may reasonably be concluded from the language of the act of 1915 that in adopting that portion of the constitutional amendment of 1914 which reads "* * * such powers of control over public utilities as relate to the making and enforcement of local, police, sanitary and other regulations, * * *" the people intended to give the words "powers of control" used in the amendment of 1911 the same meaning as that given in said section 2(b) of the Statute of 1915. As stated, the amendment of 1911 declared the right of the Legislature to confer powers upon the commission respecting public utilities to be plenary, and that after the passage of laws conferring such powers "all powers" respecting the same vested in the governing bodies of municipalities should cease in so far as they conflicted with those conferred upon the commission, provided that the section should not affect powers of control over utilities vested in the municipalities which the electors should vote to retain; but if a vote should not favor such retention the same should vest in the commission as provided by law. With this exception neither the amendment of 1911 nor the Hewitt Act referred to the powers to make or enforce local police, sanitary, or other regulations by municipalities. The Statute of 1915 is not as broad as the constitutional provision. It made no attempt to define the term "powers of control" used in the Constitution, but expressly provided that "as used in this statute" the term should have the meaning therein stated. The term as used in the Hewitt Act and in the Constitution both before and after the amendment is plain and unambiguous, and there is nothing in any of the provisions mentioned, whether constitutional or statutory, which indicates an intention to revest in the municipalities any of the powers which had previously been surrendered to the commission.

[5] Constitutions, like statutes, are to be considered prospective and not retrospective in their operation unless a contrary intention clearly appears. 5 Cal. Jur., Constitutional Law, § 12, p. 561. As is said in Cooley on Constitutional Limitations: "This rule is one of such obvious convenience and justice that it must always be adhered to in the construction of statutes unless in cases where there is something on the face of the enactment putting it beyond doubt that the legislature meant it to operate retrospectively. Retrospective legislation, except when designed to cure formal defects, or otherwise operate remedially, is commonly objectionable in principle and apt to result in injustice and it is a sound rule of construction which refuses lightly to imply an intent to enact it; and we are aware of no reasons applicable to ordinary legislation which do not on this point apply equally well to constitutions."

[6-8] As stated, the trial court found in effect that the plaintiff's traction lines constituted a unified service extending and operating through several cities and counties, and the question whether one-man cars should be operated thereon was not a municipal affair. Whether a surrender of powers previous to the constitutional amendment of 1914 resulted in a relinquishment of all power to make and enforce local police and sanitary measures affecting the health or safety of the general public which might incidentally or indirectly affect the acts of public utilities we need not decide, for while it appears to have been taken for granted in the following cases that an order by the commission within the powers conferred upon it by the Public Utilities Act controls, without regard to the question whether the matter sought to be regulated constituted a municipal affair: Oro Electric Corporation v. Railroad Commission, 169 Cal. 466, 147 P. 118; City of Los Angeles v. Central Trust Co., 173 Cal. 330, 159 P. 1169; Civic Center Association v. Railroad Commission, supra, it has been held that where it is a state and not a municipal affair, and the power conferred upon the commission is cognate and germane to the regulation of public utilities, the commission has exclusive jurisdiction, City of San Bernardino v. Railroad Commission, 190 Cal. 562, 213 P. 980. It has also been held that the term "municipal affair" is not a fixed quantity, but fluctuates and changes with conditions (18 Cal. Jur., Municipal Corporations, § 96, p. 785; Helmer v. Superior Court, 48 Cal. App. 140, 191 P. 1001), and that if a matter is of general concern to the inhabitants of the state outside of such city it is not a municipal affair within the meaning of the constitution. Whyte v. Sacramento, 65 Cal. App. 534, 224 P. 1008; Gadd v. McGuire, 69 Cal. App. 347, 231 P. 754; Sloane v. Hammond, 81 Cal. App. 590, 598, 254 P. 648. The state in its sovereign capacity has the original right to the control of public streets and highways; and except in so far as that control is relinquished to municipalities it remains with the Legislature (Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Hopkins, 160 Cal. 106, 116 P. 557); and while the regulation of the use of public streets is of special interest to the people of a municipality, it does not follow that such regulation is a municipal affair; and if there is a doubt it must be resolved in favor of the legislative authority of the state. Ex parte Daniels, 183 Cal. 636, 192 P. 442, 21 A. L. R. 1172.

In the case last cited it was held that the regulation of traffic upon the streets of a city is not a municipal affair within the meaning of section 6 of article 11 of the Constitution; and in Re Murphy, 190 Cal. 286, 212 P. 30, that the regulation and control of travel and traffic along public roads, streets, and highways of the state, if ever it was such, has ceased to be a matter of local concern. Atlas, etc., Co. v. City of Burbank, 202 Cal. 660, 262 P. 334. See, also, Rafferty v. City of Marysville, 207 Cal. 657, 280 P. 118; Sincerney v. Los Angeles, 53 Cal. App. 440, 200 P. 380; Whyte v. City of Sacramento, supra. So the regulation of the manner of constructing crossings of streets and railroads within municipalities has been determined to be a state and not a municipal affair; and the same is true of the operation of railroads extending beyond the municipality. Civic Center Association v. Railroad Commission, supra; Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Hopkins, supra; City of San Bernardino v. Railroad Commission, supra.

In City of Los Angeles v. Central Trust Co., supra, 173 Cal. at page 327, 159 P. 1169, 1170, it was said that: "The opening, laying out, and improving of streets within a city, and the regulation of the manner of their use, are matters of much greater concern to its inhabitants than to the people of the state at large, and they are clearly municipal affairs, * * *" citing Sinton v. Ashbury, 41 Cal. 531; People v. Holladay, 93 Cal. 241, 29 P. 54, 27 Am. St. Rep. 186; Hellman v. Shoulters, 114 Cal. 136, 44 P. 915, 45 P. 1057; Byrne v. Drain, 127 Cal. 663, 60 P. 433. But neither the quoted decision nor the cases cited therein involved the question of the regulation of the use of streets for traffic purposes, and are not in conflict with the other cases hereinabove cited.

[9, 10] In the absence of any affirmative action by the Legislature, or by the commission acting in the exercise of a power to supervise or regulate public utilities, a municipality may of course adopt regulations respecting the manner of operating vehicles upon public streets; but where the field is occupied by the Legislature, or by the commission acting within its powers, a municipality may not enact regulations which conflict therewith. Ex parte Daniels, supra; In re Murphy, supra; Atlas, etc., Co. v. City of Burbank, supra; Switzler v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co., 104 Cal. App. 138, 285 P. 918. Here the line over which the one-man street car was operated is wholly within the city of Oakland; but this fact is not decisive, as regulations respecting the number of men to be employed in the operation of such cars as well as those governing the speed, or prescribing other precautions to avoid accidents, are essentially regulations controlling travel and traffic on public streets; and, in accordance with the rulings in the above cases, are not matters of purely local concern. Furthermore, the power to so regulate is manifestly "cognate and germane to the subject of regulation and control of public utilities." East Bay, etc., District v. Railroad Commission, 194 Cal. 603, 229 P. 949, 953.

The further claim was made by plaintiff that the ordinance is unconstitutional in that it deprives the company of its property and the use thereof in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment of the Federal Constitution; and this contention finds support in the recent case of Shreveport Railways Co. v. City of Shreveport (D. C.) 37 F.(2d) 910; Id. (C. C. A.) 38 F.(2d) 945; Id., 281 U. S. 763, 50 S. Ct. 462, 74 L. Ed. 1172, involving facts similar to those in the case at bar. This ground of complaint, however, was not passed upon by the trial court; and, we being satisfied for the other reasons stated that the ordinance is void as against plaintiff, it will be unnecessary to consider this question.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. FACTOR.

Cr. 2221.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California.

Aug. 31, 1932.

1. Robbery ⇐24(1).

Evidence held sufficient to support conviction for robbery.

2. Criminal law ⇐1159(5).

Sufficiency of state's witness' identification of defendant and weight to be given testimony of alibi witnesses were fact questions which appellate court could not review.

3. Robbery ⇐23(1).

In robbery prosecution, value of property taken was immaterial, so that inquiry regarding value on cross-examination was properly excluded (Pen. Code, § 211).

4. Witnesses ⇐383.

Witness cannot be impeached by contradicting him upon collateral matters.

5. Witnesses ⇐383.

Where complaining witness in robbery prosecution had stated on cross-examination that he had not been in financial difficulties, excluding question whether relative had not assisted witness before robbery held not error.

6. Witnesses ⇐318.

Where evidence showed defendant spent night preceding robbery at apartment of divorced wife, evidence regarding where defendant slept that night held properly excluded where character of divorced wife, defendant's witness, was not in issue (Code Civ. Proc. § 2053).

7. Criminal law ⇐1170(1).

Sustaining objection to question regarding defendant's removal of coat when returning to apartment on morning of robbery, but not asking directly whether defendant was armed, held not reversible error.

8. Criminal law ⇐785(8).

Instruction that character of witnesses as shown by evidence should be considered in determining credibility held not erroneous.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Stanley Murray, Judge.

Morris Factor was convicted of robbery, and he appeals.

Affirmed.

William I. O'Shaughnessy, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Seibert L. Sefton, of San Francisco, for the People.

TAPPAAN, Justice pro tem.

The appellant, Morris Factor, was charged by an information with the crime of robbery, duly tried before a jury, and found guilty. He appeals from the judgment entered upon the verdict and from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

[1, 2] The facts, as disclosed by the record, are briefly as follows: On the morning of November 2, 1931, one Anderson, a wholesale jeweler's agent, was alone in his office in an office building in the city of Los Angeles. At about the hour of 9:45 a. m., in response to a knock upon his office door, he unlocked and opened the door and was confronted by two men with drawn guns. They entered the office, closed the door, and forced Anderson to open the safe in the office. One of the men kept Anderson covered with a gun, while the other removed jewelry to the value of some thousands of dollars from the office safe. The men were in the office for some fifteen minutes and a large electric light was lighted during a great part of the time that they were in the office. Anderson was required to sit in a chair, and one of the men, whom Anderson afterwards identified as appellant, sat in a chair some few feet away, unmasked, while the jewelry was being removed from the safe. The robbers bound and gagged Anderson and made good their escape. One of the robbers, the one afterwards identified by Anderson as appellant, carried, while in the office, a gun of somewhat unusual type, a Derringer. A gun of this type was found in appellant's bag when he was arrested some days later in San Francisco, and the box in which the gun had been inclosed; it had the number of the gun upon it; and shells which fitted the gun were found in appellant's trunk in his apartment in Los Angeles. Appellant after his arrest, made various admissions to police officers which could reasonably have been construed by the jury to have been of an incriminating nature. Appellant at the trial denied that he took part in the robbery and attempted to prove an alibi. To this end appellant introduced the testimony of a number of witnesses, which if the jury had elected to believe, would have tended to establish appellant's alibi. There is ample and sufficient evidence in the record to support the jury's verdict finding appellant guilty. The question of the sufficiency of Anderson's identification of appellant and the weight to be given to the testimony of alibi witnesses is one of fact which an appellate court is not at liberty to review upon appeal.

[3, 4] Appellant's first specifications of alleged error present two questions of similar nature, and they can therefore be considered together. Appellant contends that the trial court erred in refusing to permit an inquiry into the value of the goods stolen; not permitting reference to testimony in that regard given at the preliminary hearing; and in refusing to permit examination as to the actual value of the goods stolen when that actual value had been ascertained. It appears from an examination of the record that the matter of the value of the goods stolen was inquired into, both upon the direct examination of the witness and upon cross-examination by appellant's counsel, the ruling to which appellant objects was made during the cross-examination of the witness, when he had been recalled to the witness stand at a later stage of the trial. If it was appellant's theory in the propounding of the question as to value merely to test the credibility of the witness, there is no justification in appellant's contention, as the matter had been inquired into when the witness had previously been examined. If it was appellant's idea to establish a ground of impeachment of the witness, the inquiry was one directed to an immaterial and collateral matter, and, therefore, not proper foundation for his impeachment. The value of the property taken under the circumstances of the instant case was immaterial. Section 211 of the Penal Code which defines robbery contains no requirement relative to the value of the personal property taken. So long as some or any personal property is feloniously taken, the crime is committed, provided that all other elements are present. People v. Stevens, 141 Cal. 488, 489, 75 P. 62.

In the case of People v. Dye, 75 Cal. 108, at page 112, 16 P. 537, 539, the court makes this statement which is pertinent to this subject: "A party cannot cross-examine his adversary's witness upon irrelevant matters for the purpose of eliciting something to be contradicted; and if such matters are drawn out, the court should stop the inquiry there. It is well settled that a witness cannot be impeached by contradicting him upon collateral matters."

[5] Appellant's next ground of appeal involves a ruling of the court sustaining an objection to the following question asked of the complaining witness upon cross-examination by appellant's counsel: "Q. Is it not a fact that one of your relatives, Mr. Pantages, had assisted you materially in the months preceding this robbery?" The witness had just stated in answer to a question of appellant's counsel that "he had not been in financial difficulties at any time since" he had been in Los Angeles. This answer of the witness directly denying that he was in "financial difficulties" was sufficient to enable appellant, if he elected so to do, to question the truth of the witness' statement by competent evidence, and permit the introduction of evidence of the character introduced in the case of People v. Neal, 75 Cal. App. 428, 243 P. 52, cited by appellant. The record fails to show that appellant made any attempt to avail himself of this privilege.

[6] There is no merit in appellant's contention that the court erred in the exclusion of testimony as to where appellant slept on the night preceding the robbery. The evidence shows that appellant spent the night at the apartment of a Mrs. West, who was one of appellant's witnesses on the question of his alleged alibi. Mrs. West was the divorced wife of appellant. It is appellant's contention that this ruling of the court deprived him of the right of showing that no "illicit relations existed between the witness and the appellant" and that "should color her testimony in his favor." The character of the witness was not in evidence or issue, and the prosecution had not sought to impeach her in the proceeding. The court properly excluded the evidence. Code Civ. Proc. § 2053.

[7] The court sustained an objection to a question propounded by appellant's counsel to Mrs. West having to do with whether or not appellant removed his coat, when he returned to her apartment on the morning of the robbery. Appellant avers that by this ruling he was debarred from showing that he was unarmed at this time. The question to which the objection was sustained was "State what he did in that regard," and referred directly to appellant's removal of his coat. Appellant's counsel never asked the direct question as to appellant's being armed at the time. Under the circumstances there was no reversible error in the ruling as made.

An examination of the record fails to disclose any prejudicial comments or statements made by the court during the trial.

[8] Appellant attacked a part of a general instruction given by the court where the following words were made use of: "The character of the witnesses as shown by the evidence, should be taken into consideration for the purpose of determining their credibility * * *." The question, as presented by appellant, is fully answered in the case of People v. Mohammed, 189 Cal. 429, 208 P. 963, where a similar instruction is upheld.

From an examination of the entire cause, as presented here, we are of the opinion that the record presents no error justifying a reversal of the judgment.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

We concur: CONREY, P. J.; YORK, J.

AMORE et al. v. DI RESTA.

Civ. 8361.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California.

Aug. 19, 1932.

Rehearing Denied Sept. 17, 1932. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 17, 1932.

1. Automobiles ⇐244(8).

Evidence supported verdict for plaintiffs in action for death of railway groundman crushed to death against tower truck when struck by automobile.

2. Appeal and error ⇐979(1).
New trial ⇐70.

Trial court may exercise wide discretion in granting new trials for insufficiency of evidence, and its order will not be disturbed, in absence of abuse of discretion.

3. New trial ⇐76(5).

$1,000 held, under evidence, inadequate damages for death of railway groundman killed when struck by automobile.

4. Trial ⇐119.

In action for death of railway groundman struck by defendant's automobile, remark of defendant's counsel to jury that railway was paying widow compensation held improper (St. 1917, p. 854, § 26, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1213).

5. Appeal and error ⇐977(2).
New trial ⇐9.

Ordinarily, whether issues are severable or so inseparably blended as to require that new trial be granted as to all issues is question for trial court, whose determination will not be disturbed, unless abuse of discretion appears.

6. New trial ⇐9.

In death case, that trial court granted new trial on issue of damages alone held not abuse of its discretion (Code Civ. Proc. § 377, and § 657 as amended by St. 1929, p. 841, § 2).

Granting new trial on issue of damages alone did not constitute an abuse of discretion in death case under Code Civ. Proc. § 377, which provides for the award of such damages as under all the circumstances of the case may be just, since the words "all the circumstances" have reference only to the circumstances bearing on the damage sustained by plaintiffs, such as the age of the deceased, his earning power, his probable expectancy, the relationship and extent of dependency of his heirs, and have no reference to the circumstances surrounding the killing.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Walter Perry Johnson, Judge.

Action by Josephine Amore and others against Joe Di Resta. Verdict in favor of plaintiffs. From an order granting plaintiffs a new trial, defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Redman, Alexander & Bacon and Herbert Chamberlin, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

William M. Abbott, K. W. Cannon, Cyril Appel, and Ivores R. Dains, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

SPENCE, J.

This is an appeal by defendant from an order of the trial court granting plaintiffs a new trial "upon the issue of damages alone upon the ground of irregularity in the proceedings of defendant Di Resta by which plaintiffs were prevented from having a fair trial, and also upon the ground of insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict in respect of its amount."

The action was brought to recover damages for the wrongful death of one Joe Amore, who was the husband of plaintiff Josephine Amore, and the father of the two minor plaintiffs, Angelo Amore and Antonio Amore. The Market Street Railway Company had become liable for the death benefit provided by the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act and joined as a party plaintiff. The jury returned a verdict in favor of plaintiffs in the sum of $1,000, and the trial court thereafter granted a new trial upon the grounds above mentioned.

[1] Appellant contends that the trial court erred in granting the motion for new trial upon any ground, as "the record does not disclose a case of liability against defendant." Appellant apparently takes the position that the evidence was insufficient as a matter of law to support a verdict in favor of respondents. This contention is entirely without merit. It is unnecessary to do more than briefly outline the testimony given by the numerous witnesses called on behalf of respondents. On March 26, 1929, Joe Amore was employed by the railway company as a member of one of its overhead line crews. He was a "groundman," charged with the duty of remaining on the ground to pass up materials to those working aloft and to divert traffic away from the large tower truck which was used by the crew in working on the overhead lines. The truck was painted a very bright red and had a large sign on the rear—"Danger. Keep Back 50 Feet." On the above date, at about 2:45 p. m., the truck was standing on the westerly street car track on Mission street just north of Sickles avenue. It was headed south in the direction of Daly City. Three members of the crew were working aloft while Amore was on the street 15 or 20 feet directly behind the truck facing away from the truck or in a general northerly direction. It was a clear sunny day. Appellant was driving his automobile in a southerly direction along the westerly track at a speed of 30 to 40 miles per hour, although the speed was slightly decreased upon approaching the truck. Amore waved with his left hand for appellant to turn so as to pass the truck on the west side, but appellant continued on, striking Amore, carrying him some 15 to 20 feet, and crushing him to death against the rear end of the tower truck. Amore had attempted to step aside when appellant's automobile was a short distance from him, but failed to get clear of appellant's car. Appellant testified that he did not see Amore or the tower truck until he had struck Amore. He attempted to explain the accident by stating that there was a truck traveling in front of his automobile which obstructed his view of the highway. He testified that this truck turned to the right to avoid a safety zone, and this necessitated his turning to the left to avoid the safety zone and the truck. It is at once apparent that there was ample evidence to support a verdict in favor of respondents. Appellant's explanation relating to another truck obstructing his view was contradicted by many other witnesses, but, even if true, it would not follow that he was absolved from liability. On the contrary, we are of the opinion that the only rational conclusion which the jury could have reached was that the death of the deceased was proximately caused by the negligence of appellant and without fault on the part of the deceased.

[2, 3] We will next consider appellant's contention that it was error to grant the motion on the ground of "insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict in respect of its amount." It is well settled that the trial court may exercise a wide discretion in granting new trials on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence and that its order granting or denying a new trial will not be disturbed, in the absence of a showing of abuse of discretion. Minor v. Foote, 100 Cal. App. 441, 280 P. 197; Tumelty v. Peerless Stages, 96 Cal. App. 530, 274 P. 430; Townsend v. Briggs, 88 Cal. 230, 26 P. 108; Mariani v. Dougherty, 46 Cal. 26; 2 Cal. Jur. 908. Although appellant argues that the award of $1,000 was adequate, the trial court was of the opinion that it was not. The evidence showed that Amore was a young man 30 years of age who had been steadily employed by the railway company since 1923 when he arrived from Italy. He came to this country to obtain work to support his family, having the intention of becoming a citizen and bringing his family here to live. He was a kind and loving husband and father, and "was very impatient to have his family with him." He went to Italy to visit his family in 1927 and returned in 1928. His wife was 30 years of age, and his sons were 8 years and 2 years of age respectively. He wrote to his wife twice a week while in this country, and sent her money every month for the support of herself and the children. He was earning the sum of $33.50 per week at the time of his death. The assistant superintendent of overhead lines for the railway company described Amore as a bright and energetic young man in perfect health and a steady worker. The American Experience Tables of Mortality show an expectancy of 35.33 years. It was stipulated that the funeral expenses were $150. We believe that the trial court was correct in its conclusion that the award was entirely inadequate. It necessarily follows that the trial court cannot be said to have abused its discretion in granting a new trial upon that ground.

[4] The conclusion we have reached makes it unnecessary to discuss appellant's contention that there was no prejudicial misconduct. It may be pointed out, however, that the main charge of misconduct arose out of a remark of appellant's counsel during his argument to the jury. He there stated, "Now, the Market Street Railway Company, this big soulless corporation, has paid or is now paying as workmen's compensation to this widow and these minor children the sum of about $5,000." This remark was wholly irrelevant and improper. Section 26, Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act, Stats. 1927, c. 702, p. 1213; Baroni v. Rosenberg, 209 Cal. 4, 284 P. 1111. We mention it merely because it undoubtedly misled and confused the jury. The inadequate verdict probably resulted, despite the admonition of the court, from a belief on the part of the jury that the widow and minor children would receive the amount awarded by their verdict in addition to the compensation.

[5, 6] The further contention is made that "the trial court abused its discretion in limiting a new trial to the issue of damages alone." By the amendment of 1929 to section 657 of the Code of Civil Procedure (St. 1929, p. 841, § 2), statutory approval was given to the general rule theretofore recognized that a trial court had the power to grant a new trial on the issue of damages alone. Tumelty v. Peerless Stages, supra. Ordinarily, the question of whether the issues are severable or so "inseparably blended" as to require that a new trial, if granted at all, be granted as to all the issues, is a question committed to the discretion of the trial court, and its determination of that question will not be disturbed, unless an abuse of discretion appears. Tumelty v. Peerless Stages, supra. It is appellant's contention, however, that such severance of the issues constitutes an abuse of discretion in death cases under section 377 of the Code of Civil Procedure which provides for the award of such damages "as under all the circumstances of the case may be just." The purport of appellant's argument is that the words "all the circumstances" include the circumstances giving rise to the death as well as the circumstances relating to the damage sustained, and that the issues are therefore "inseparably blended," and cannot be severed. As broad as the language of the section may be, we cannot agree with the appellant's construction. In our opinion, these words have reference only to the circumstances bearing upon the damage sustained by plaintiffs such as the age of the deceased, his earning power, his probable expectancy, the relationship and extent of dependency of his heirs and so forth, and have no reference to the circumstances surrounding the killing. To hold otherwise would mean that an award of damages in a death case might be made to include exemplary damages if the circumstances surrounding the killing were such as to incline the jury to award such damages. The history of said section 377 negatives the propriety of a construction which would permit such an award. As appointed out in Lange v. Schoettler, 115 Cal. 388, 47 P. 139, 140, the present wording of that section relating to damages was adopted in 1874 when the words "pecuniary and exemplary" previously used in the section were deleted. It was held in that case that, under the present wording of the section, exemplary damages could not be allowed, the court saying that the recovery is limited to the "probable pecuniary value of the life of the deceased to the relatives." We are therefore of the opinion that there is nothing in the wording of section 377 of the Code of Civil Procedure which leads to the conclusion that the issues are any more "inseparably blended" in a death case than are the issues in an action brought by an injured person to recover for his injuries. In the present case the trial court exercised its discretion by granting a new trial on the issue of damages alone, and we find nothing to indicate an abuse of discretion.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

DILLER et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY.

Civ. 8443.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California.

Aug. 26, 1932.

Rehearing Denied Sept. 23, 1932. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 24, 1932.

Prohibition ⇐13.

Where insurer paid insurance into court, other defendants could not restrain court from hearing action pending appeal from order dismissing insurer.

Facts were that petitioners, together with insurance company and others, were made defendants in action on policy issued by insurer wherein certain contractors sought to recover for services and materials furnished in reconstruction of buildings on which petitioners held a mortgage; that insurer was granted leave to deposit in court amount in controversy, and was dismissed from action, and appeal was taken from such order. But the order was not a final determination of any issue before trial court, and petitioners could not be injured by hearing the question presented for decision.

Application by William Diller and another for a writ of prohibition against the Superior Court, in and for Los Angeles County.

Alternative writ discharged, and peremptory writ denied.

Willcox & Judson, of Los Angeles, for petitioners.

Everett W. Mattoon, County Counsel, and S. V. O. Prichard, Deputy County Counsel, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, J.

The petitioners, together with an insurance company and others, were made defendants in an action upon a policy issued by said company wherein certain contractors sought to recover for services and materials furnished in reconstruction of buildings upon which the petitioners held a mortgage. The insurer at the time of the trial was granted leave to deposit in court the amount in controversy, with interest, and was dismissed from the action, from which order an appeal was taken. The petitioners thereafter objected to the introduction of evidence upon the ground that an appeal was pending, which objection was overruled. They instituted this proceeding in prohibition, praying that the Superior Court be restrained from hearing and determining the action until such appeal be decided. The respondent interposed a demurrer to the application, and it is here contended that the appeal so taken does not constitute a bar to a trial of the issues between the remaining parties upon the merits as to the ownership of the funds.

It is not made to appear that the defendant company had or may have any other interest in the controversy before the trial court than as above stated, nor is it contended that its retention in the case would affect the question as to ownership of the insurance moneys or the amount, if any, which may be due to the plaintiffs or to either of the defendants. It must follow that the order was not, and was not intended to be, a final determination of any issue before the trial court, that it left the issues framed by the pleadings for determination and the entry of final judgment, and that the petitioners could not be injured by the hearing of the question presented for decision below, following which the parties might resort to such other available remedies as the ultimate event might suggest. Appeal from Superior Court, Tehama County; H. S. Gans, Judge.

L. J. O'Rourke was convicted on a charge of operating a motor vehicle without having a legal and unrevoked license, and he appeals.

Affirmed.

A. H. Ludeman, of Red Bluff, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PLUMMER, J.

[1, 2] The defendant appeals from a judgment of conviction based upon a verdict following a trial wherein the information filed against him charged an offense in the following language (omitting title): "L. J. O'Rourke is accused by the District Attorney in the County of Tehama, State of California, by this information, of the crime of violation of the provisions of section 74 of the California Vehicle Act, committed as follows: The said L. J. O'Rourke, on or about the 9th day of January, A. D. 1932, at and in the County of Tehama, State of California, prior to the filing of this information, did wilfully and unlawfully drive and operate a motor vehicle upon the public highway, without having at said time, a legal and unrevoked operator's license authorizing him so to do; that prior to the 9th day of January, 1932, on or about the 17th day of November, 1931, the Department of Motor Vehicles of the State of California, did revoke the operator's license of L. J. O'Rourke, which license was numbered 240,486; contrary to the form, force and effect of the statute in such cases made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of The People of the State of California."

To this information the appellant interposed a demurrer, setting forth several grounds, to wit: That the facts stated in the information are not sufficient to constitute a public offense; that the information does not substantially conform to the requirements of sections 951, 952, and 953 of the Penal Code. The demurrer then attempts to raise the question that the information does not set forth facts showing that the department of motor vehicles lawfully revoked the operator's license theretofore issued to the appellant. A mere reading of the information shows that it is sufficient to notify the defendant of the offense with which he was charged. The language is plain, simple, and readily understandable, and that is all that the sections of the Penal Code require.

[3] Defendant is informed that he was driving an automobile, not having an operator's license authorizing him so to do. He is also informed of the revocation of the operator's license theretofore issued to him. Whether it was legally revoked was a question to be determined by the evidence introduced at the trial. The fact of revocation and the time of revocation was definitely stated.

[4] The record shows that on or about the 17th day of October, 1931, the defendant pleaded guilty of the violation of section 112 of the California Vehicle Act, in that he drove an automobile upon one of the highways of the state of California while in an intoxicated condition. Following the judgment rendered upon the defendant's plea of guilty, as just stated, the department of motor vehicles proceeded to revoke the license theretofore issued to the appellant, and notified the appellant of the action taken. The record shows that the notice sent to the appellant was made a part of the records of the department of motor vehicles, and constituted the form of action taken by the department in the matter of such revocation. We quote the same in full:

"November 17, 1931.

The record further shows that the appellant received the notification, but did not surrender his revoked operator's license. The California Vehicle Act does not describe any particular form to be followed by the department in effecting a revocation of an operator's license, but section 72½ of the act (as added by St. 1929, p. 523, § 25) does provide that notice shall be given thereof, and that the service of notice may be made by means of the United States mails. The provisions of section 72½ of the act appear to have been followed in all their details in giving the notice of revocation, and need not further be elaborated upon.

[5] The contention is made upon this appeal that the department should have followed the provisions of section 73 of the act (as amended by St. 1929, p. 560, § 4); that notice should have been given to the defendant of a time and place of hearing; that a hearing should have been held by the department, and then action taken thereon after such hearing. In making this contention, the appellant misconstrues the provisions of section 73. The section, if it were applicable to this case, would uphold the action taken by the department. That section provides: "The division shall forthwith revoke the license of any person, for a period of twelve months, upon receiving satisfactory evidence of the conviction, or of the entry of a plea of guilty and sentence thereupon, or of the forfeiture of bail of any such person, charged with the commission of any of the following crimes: (1) Manslaughter, resulting from the operation of a motor vehicle. (2) Any crime constituting a felony under the 'California vehicle act' or of any other felony in the commission of which a motor vehicle is used. (3) Convictions upon three charges of reckless driving all within a period of twelve months from the time of the first conviction." The remainder of the section applies only to cases where a complaint has been filed before the department, charging an operator of a motor vehicle with certain specified acts, and also with being incompetent to operate a motor vehicle. Under these conditions notice must be given to the person complained against, a hearing had, evidence taken, and the action of the department based thereon.

Section 58 of the California Vehicle Act (as amended by St. 1927, p. 1427, § 15) provides it shall be unlawful for any person to drive a motor vehicle upon a public highway in this state without first having obtained an operator's license. Section 74 (as amended by St. 1929, p. 567) provides that, when any person drives a motor vehicle after his operator's license has been revoked or suspended for certain specified reasons, and then also for any other reason provided in the act, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.

Section 156 of the California Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 567), as it has read for several years, requires the justice of the peace or police court wherein the conviction is had to forward an abstract thereof to the department, and also directs that the clerk of any court of record, within five days after final judgment of conviction of any violation of the provisions of the act, shall send to the division a certified copy of the conviction.

[6, 7] While counsel have called attention to the sections of the act to which we have referred, and based arguments thereon, the section by which this cause must be determined is numbered 73½ (as added by St. 1931, p. 2110, § 19¼), and reads as follows: "Whenever any person shall be convicted upon a charge of violation of any of the provisions of sections 112 or 141 of the California vehicle act, and time for an appeal shall have elapsed without an appeal having been taken, or after any said appeal has been taken and judgment of conviction affirmed, the clerk of the court in which said judgment was rendered, shall immediately report the facts to the division of motor vehicles, and the division of motor vehicles shall thereupon suspend the operator's or chauffeur's license of the person so convicted, and such suspension shall remain in effect unless and until the person so convicted and whose license is suspended shall give proof of financial responsibility in accordance with the provisions of sections 36½ and 36¾ of the California vehicle act." That the provisions of this section relative to furnishing proof of financial responsibility before a license can be reissued, though not directly involved in this action, are constitutional, appears by the reasoning found in the case of Watson v. State Division of Motor Vehicles, 212 Cal. 279, 298 P. 481, where a somewhat similar provision found in section 73 of the California Vehicle Act is upheld as being a constitutional exercise of legislative power. This being true, there appears to be no valid objection to any of the provisions of section 73½, and its controlling power of this cause sustained, and the appellant's argument as to the invalidity of any action of the division of motor vehicles based upon the third paragraph of section 112 of the act (as amended by St. 1929, p. 537, § 44), as being the imposition of an additional penalty after judgment by the court, and also as a judicial act, may be disregarded.

[8] Realizing the indisposition in some cases to revoke or suspend an operator's license, the Legislature, by an act approved June 18, 1931 (St. 1931, p. 2099), in re-enacting and amending a number of the sections of the California Vehicle Act, added section 73½, which we have heretofore set forth. The language of section 73½, and also of the provisions of section 73 which we have quoted, are mandatory in form. Section 73 reads: "The division shall forthwith revoke the license of any person, for a period of twelve months." Section 73½ reads: "The division of motor vehicles shall thereupon suspend the operator's or chauffeur's license of the person so convicted," and that the suspension shall remain in force, etc.

The Legislature did not use the permissive word "may," but even that word, where the public interests are involved by the action of a ministerial officer, is often construed to take on the mandatory form. County of Los Angeles v. State of California, 64 Cal. App. 290, 222 P. 153; Stockton Plumbing & Supply Co. v. Wheeler, 68 Cal. App. 592, 229 P. 1020.

In 57 C. J. p. 548, the word "shall" is defined where it relates to a ministerial act from which it distinctly appears that the word is mandatory if the public interests are involved. It is there said: "In common, or ordinary parlance, and in its ordinary signification, the term 'shall' is a word of command, and one which has always, or which must be given a compulsory meaning; as denoting obligation. It has a peremptory meaning, and it is generally imperative or mandatory. It has the invariable significance of excluding the idea of discretion, and has the significance of operating to impose a duty which may be enforced, particularly if public policy is in favor of this meaning or when addressed to public officials, or where a public interest is involved, or where the public or persons have rights which ought to be exercised or enforced, unless a contrary intent appears; but the context ought to be very strongly persuasive before it is softened into a mere permission," etc.

In the instant case the record shows that the appellant pleaded guilty of the offense of driving an automobile while in a state of intoxication; that a record of the conviction was forwarded to the division of motor vehicles, and the division of motor vehicles thereupon entered the order which we have set forth, and notified the defendant thereof. The circumstance of drunken driving is a fact sufficient to show that the construction of the word "shall" should not be "softened into a mere permission." The public interests and the public safety demand giving to the word "shall," in the sections we have quoted, a mandatory and imperative meaning. The department has no discretion in the matter. It is the duty of the department, upon receiving an abstract of the judgment, to perform the ministerial duty of revocation or suspension; it is in no sense a judicial act; it is purely ministerial and an obligation that cannot be legally avoided. It requires only a recital of the facts to show that public policy and public interest demand the construction which we are giving. Every intoxicated driver of a motor vehicle is a potential killer. The record of deaths on the highways from this cause evidences the insecurity of every man, woman, or child who happens to be there, when confronted by a driver whose judgment is clouded, and tendency to reckless driving immeasurably increased by the use of alcohol. Under such circumstances to hold that the word "shall" is only permissive and requires further investigation after receiving an abstract of judgment showing a violation of section 112 of the California Vehicle Act would amount to a legal travesty. The revocation or suspension of the operator's license is not the imposition of an additional penalty to the judgment of conviction. It is a part and parcel thereof, and under both sections 73 and 73½ of the act, in so far as they are applicable here, constitutes only that part of the legal penalty which the law inflicts as a part of the judgment of conviction.

The judgment is affirmed.

NOURSE, P. J.

Plaintiff sued for damages for personal injuries. The cause was tried with a jury and plaintiff had a verdict for $9,000. From the judgment on the verdict defendant has appealed on typewritten transcripts.

Acting upon instructions from the chief of police, employees of the city of Alameda were engaged in marking out pedestrian lanes at the four crosswalks at the intersection of Park street and Santa Clara avenue in the downtown business section of the city; these lanes were being marked by painting eight-inch lines upon the street pavement, defining each lane nine feet in width. At about 10 o'clock a. m. of February 21, 1930, the lane crossing Park street on the northerly side of Santa Clara had been completed, and, while these employees were marking a similar lane across Santa Clara, and, while the first lines of paint were still wet, the plaintiff crossed this lane over Park street, and, as she reached a point near the easterly curb of Park street, she stepped over the lane and upon the line of wet paint. She slipped upon this paint and fell to the pavement. For the injuries resulting from this fall she sought to hold the city under the provisions of the act of 1923, St. 1923, p. 675 (Deering's General Laws, 1931, Act No. 5619).

On the appeal from the judgment, the defendant emphasizes two points—that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law in stepping outside of the marked lane and upon the lines defining the pedestrian traffic, and that she failed to prove notice of the condition as required by the act of 1923. We will limit our consideration to the second point.

Section 2 of that act places a liability for negligence upon counties, cities, and school districts "in all cases where the governing or managing board of such county, * * * or other board, officer or person having authority to remedy such condition, had knowledge or notice of the defective or dangerous condition of any such street, * * * and failed or neglected, for a reasonable time after acquiring such knowledge or receiving such notice, to remedy such condition or failed and neglected for a reasonable time after acquiring such knowledge or receiving such notice to take such action as may be reasonably necessary to protect the public against such dangerous or defective condition."

The complaint upon which this action is based alleged upon information and belief that the city council and the superintendent of streets had knowledge and notice of the existence of the wet paint upon the intersection, and that, prior to the accident, they took no action to remedy the dangerous and unsafe condition of the street, nor to warn or protect the public therefrom. In support of the allegation it was shown that the superintendent of streets instructed the employees to paint the crossing lanes under the orders from the chief of police and from this fact alone plaintiff contended, and the trial court so instructed the jury, that the knowledge and notice required by the statute should be implied to the municipality.

[1] It must be remembered that the provisions of section 2 of the act of 1923 imposing a liability upon public corporations for negligence are a departure from the general rule. Theretofore the settled rule was that such corporations were not liable in such cases while engaged in work in the course of a strictly governmental capacity. Perkins v. Blauth, 163 Cal. 782, 789, 127 P. 50; Winbigler v. Los Angeles, 45 Cal. 36, 38; South v. San Benito County, 40 Cal. App. 13, 16, 180 P. 354. Time and again our courts have held in accord with the general rule that such liability could arise only from statutory enactment and that leave to sue therefor could be given only by governmental consent. Hence, when the Legislature enacted this statute it was creating a liability where none existed before, and the act was a special statute modifying a general rule of law. As such it requires a strict interpretation—one which gives meaning to all the exceptions and conditions under which the right to sue is granted.

This being so we cannot overlook the express limitations upon this right found in the portions of the act italicized in the quotation above. The reasonableness of these restrictions is apparent. The general rule of nonliability was made necessary because of the facility with which feigned claims were made against the public corporations and because of the insufficient and ineffective supervision over all the public employees whose negligence might cause injuries to others. It was based somewhat upon the old theory that public employees, though paid a compensation, were, nevertheless, engaged in a public service for the benefit of the public. Partly for the purpose of avoiding spurious claims for injuries and partly for the purpose of enabling the public authorities to discover and correct the acts of incompetent employees these limitations were placed in the 1923 act requiring knowledge and notice with a reasonable opportunity to remedy before the corporation itself should be liable. In other words, this statute continues the old principle that a public corporation is not liable for every act of negligence on the part of its servants and agents while engaged in its purely governmental capacity and therein is the all-important distinction between the rules of liability applicable to public and private corporations under the doctrine of "respondeat superior."

[2] The Legislature having the power to withhold the right to sue these public corporations it may, of course, impose restrictions upon the exercise of that right when it confers it. This having been done, it is not for the courts to say that these restrictions are unreasonable, and that, therefore, a party may sue without compliance with the conditions. It is rather for the courts to say that, if those restrictions and conditions are unreasonable, the right to sue was nevertheless granted subject to them and that no right has been granted independent of those conditions.

[3] With this in view, we find that the record here discloses that there was no proof, and no attempt to prove, that any officer "having authority to remedy such condition" had any knowledge or notice of the defective or dangerous condition of the street. The evidence discloses merely that the superintendent of streets, acting upon orders of the chief of police, ordered the painting done. The law presumes that he and his servants performed the work in a careful manner. There is nothing in the evidence to rebut this presumption. Respondent's case seems to be that the city's servants were negligent in failing to erect barriers or warning signs to enable pedestrians to avoid danger. This assumes that the "construction" was inherently dangerous, and that such warning signs were necessary. Neither of these is a fair assumption. The marking of the pedestrian lane was done for the protection of the public and we cannot assume that it was done in a careless manner; that those in charge had reason to believe that pedestrians would depart from the designated lane and walk upon the outer lines; that the freshness of the bright orange colored paint was not in itself a warning to pedestrians; or that any other "sign" would have avoided the accident. It is a matter of common knowledge that a warning that paint is wet is but an invitation to the public to test the truth of the statement.

But, in its final analysis the point is that the statute under consideration imposes a liability under certain restrictions where none before existed, and that, before recovery can be had under it, the claimant must plead and prove a compliance with those conditions. These conditions require that the municipal authorities have a reasonable opportunity after notice or knowledge of the dangerous condition to remedy it. Concededly if this condition arises while work is being done by the city which is inherently dangerous, or when the character of the work is such that it would be reasonably certain that injury would occur, such notice or knowledge may be inferred. Likewise when the defect or dangerous condition had existed for a considerable length of time they may establish constructive notice. Dawson v. Tulare Union High School, 98 Cal. App. 138, 142, 276 P. 424; Rafferty v. City of Marysville, 207 Cal. 657, 280 P. 118; Hook v. City of Sacramento (Cal. App.) 5 P.(2d) 643. Neither of these conditions is present here. We cannot say as a matter of law that the painted lines were inherently dangerous unless we should hold as a matter of law that the city should have anticipated that pedestrians would depart from the safe lane provided for them and attempt to walk upon the fresh paint. And there is no evidence tending to show how long before the accident the lines had been painted, but it is fair to assume from the evidence that it was a matter of but a few minutes.

The judgment is reversed.

Affirmed in part, and reversed in part, with directions.

Raymond E. Hodge, of San Bernardino, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and James S. Howie, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

MARKS, Acting P. J.

In an information filed by the district attorney of San Bernardino county, appellant was accused of the crimes of (1) forging the will of Charles Wellington Scott, deceased; (2) causing the forged will to be filed of record in the office of the county clerk of San Bernardino county; (3) offering the forged will in evidence in a probate proceeding entitled, "In the matter of the Estate of Charles Wellington Scott, deceased." In an amended information, in addition to these three accusations, appellant was charged with two prior convictions of felonies which he admitted. He was found guilty on all three counts of the information, and is here on appeal from the judgment and from the order denying his motion for new trial.

Charles Wellington Scott and appellant had been friends for several years. Scott had come to California because of ill health. He first lived with a relative near Owensmouth in Los Angeles county, later moving to the town of Cucamonga, where he purchased a residence, he and appellant living there together until January 3, 1931, when Scott was removed to a hospital in Los Angeles. He died January 16, 1931.

Appellant caused to be filed in the office of the county clerk of San Bernardino county, and offered for probate, a purported olographic will of deceased dated January 2, 1931. It was admitted to probate on March 2, 1931, and letters testamentary issued to appellant. While the record is not clear upon this point, it would seem that a contest was later instituted and probate of the questioned will denied upon the ground that it had not been wholly written, dated, and signed in the handwriting of the testator. This prosecution followed, with the results which we have indicated.

[1] After the jury had been impaneled and two witnesses had testified, the district attorney offered in evidence the olographic will of January 2, 1931. Counsel for appellant objected to its admission because of a variance between the will and the copies set forth in the information. The district attorney asked and was given leave to file an amended information correctly setting forth the purported olographic will. There was no error in this ruling, as the amended information merely corrected typographical errors in the copies set forth in the first information. Appellant was not misled nor prejudiced by the amendments. Furthermore, he was granted time in which to prepare and continue his defense. This procedure is now authorized by law. Section 1008, Pen. Code; People v. Jensen, 82 Cal. App. 489, 255 P. 781; People v. Foster, 198 Cal. 112, 243 P. 667.

[2] Appellant complains of the introduction in evidence of a purported will of deceased which had been drawn on December 23, 1930, basing his objection upon the ground that it was "incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial and as having no bearing upon any of the issues of the case." In view of the state of the record at that time, this objection was correctly overruled by the trial judge. The information charged that the will of January 2, 1931, was forged by appellant with the intent to defraud Lorraine Beulah Scott, the daughter, and Robert Johnson, the brother, of deceased. The will of December 23d made several specific bequests, among which was one to Robert G. Johnson, the same person as Robert Johnson. It also contained a residuary clause dividing the remainder of his estate "among all the heirs," which would include his daughter as a residuary legatee. The olographic will of January 2d bequeathed to Robert G. Johnson $100 and a gold watch, much less than he would have received under the former will, and left nothing to the daughter. It was a part of the people's case to prove, as alleged in the information, that the forgery of January 2d was committed with the intent to defraud the half-brother and the daughter. The will of December 23d was typewritten. It had been prepared by Barbara Wentworth and witnessed by herself and Mrs. J. M. Chadwick. If properly executed and entitled to probate, it became material to prove the terms of this will which was revoked by the forged will in order to prove the intent to defraud.

[3] Miss Wentworth was called as a witness in the court below. From her testimony it was apparent that the will had been properly executed and was entitled to probate. It was then offered and admitted in evidence. Later Mrs. Chadwick was called and testified that she did not sign the will in the presence of deceased nor at his request, and that he did not declare to her that it was his last will. Under this testimony, if taken as true, as it seems to have been by all counsel in the court below, the will had not been duly executed and could not be probated. We have carefully searched the extensive record, and cannot find that appellant moved upon any specific ground to strike the will of December 23d from the record. In fact, during the later days of the trial, in commenting on its introduction in evidence, counsel for appellant said: "It is hearsay, nothing but hearsay, yet I think it is proper hearsay testimony because it goes to a state of mind of the decedent." Again speaking on the same subject, he said: "Technically, I think my objection was wrong, * * * first it (the earlier will) is a part of the res gestæ, and second, that it shows a state of mind of the deceased." This shows an abandonment in the court below of the objection to the introduction of the will of December 23d, and for that reason the overruling of the objection should not be urged as error here.

[4, 5] Appellant complains of the refusal of the trial court to permit him to introduce in evidence a typewritten letter dated December 14, 1930, addressed to him, and which he maintains was written and signed by the deceased. The letter is not in the record, and in its absence we cannot determine its materiality nor whether or not its rejection was error. We cannot presume error. The record on appeal must make error appear affirmatively.

[6] Appellant complains of several rulings of the trial court whereby evidence of the friendly and cordial relations between himself and deceased, the confidence and trust reposed in him by deceased, and the services which he performed for deceased, was excluded. Even if we assume these rulings erroneous, they were not prejudicial. There is ample evidence in the record to show these relations, and the time, care, and attention which appellant gave deceased. The evidence excluded was cumulative of testimony amply showing these relations, which were not denied by the people.

[7] Appellant complains of a ruling of the trial court in refusing to strike the testimony of R. G. Johnson, the half-brother of deceased, that Lorraine Beulah Scott was the daughter of deceased and lived at Corona, N. Y. The witness was permitted to testify to these facts on direct examination without objection. On cross-examination it was developed that he had never seen the daughter. He had seen her picture and had received a telegram from her after her father's death. Appellant moved to strike this testimony on the ground that it was hearsay. This motion was denied. Appellant did not develop any evidence to show that the testimony sought to be stricken was not based on "a declaration, verbal or written," of the deceased. Section 1870, Code Civ. Proc.; Estate of Paulsen, 179 Cal. 528, 178 P. 143. There is other evidence in the record to establish the fact that Lorraine Beulah Scott was the surviving daughter of deceased. It is to be found in the testimony of appellant and in his petition to probate the will of January 2d.

Appellant bitterly complains of the admission in evidence of testimony of a deputy district attorney detailing conversations between the deputy and appellant, and also of testimony of a justice of the peace as to one of these conversations. The evidence of the deputy district attorney contains the following:

"Q. And during the course of that investigation did you have a conversation with the defendant, W. Donald Wignall? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Where was that conversation? A. The first conversation was in the office of Mr. Mussell, the District Attorney, on November 16th, 1931.

"Q. Who was present? A. Mr. Wignall, the defendant; Mr. Mussell, the District Attorney; Deputy Sheriff Locke and myself.

"Q. Will you please state what that conversation was?

"Mr. Hodge: Objected to on the ground no proper foundation has been laid.

"Mr. Weller: It does not call for a confession, your Honor; it calls for the conversation and acts of the parties in respect to the conversation in question.

"The Court: Very well; on the representation of counsel the objection is overruled. A. Mr. Wignall had been arrested on Thursday, November 12th, and I had brought him down into the District Attorney's office on November 16th, the following Monday, Monday afternoon, about 3 o'clock in the afternoon. As soon as Mr. Wignall was brought in, I told him to sit down in a chair and I said, 'You understand, Mr. Wignall, a complaint had been filed in the Justice Court here in San Bernardino charging you with forging a will. We have not gone into the complete facts of the case as yet; we are just beginning to go to work on the case, and I want to talk to you about the matter, and if you will assist us in determining just what the facts are in connection with the case. We have no desire to prosecute you, or to take any action against you, if you are not guilty, and there is no one that can help us to better determine your guilt or innocence than you can, and we haven't at this time very much of your handwriting, and if you will give us some of your handwriting, it will be a very easy matter to determine whether you are guilty or innocent of the forging of this will.' I said, 'Have you an attorney?' And he said, 'I am making some arrangements; I have not any yet.' I said, 'If you have an attorney, I want him to be here.' I said, 'Understand we are investigating this criminal charge against you. Are you willing to help us as much as you can?' He said, 'What do you want?' I said, 'I will tell you what I will do. If you will sit down here at the desk and write out in your own handwriting the contents of this will, and allow us to submit that to a handwriting expert to determine whether you are guilty or innocent, that will assist us a great deal in determining whether you are guilty or innocent in the matter.' He said he didn't care to do that. I said, 'I will tell what I will do further. Clark Sellers is the handwriting expert employed by you in the will contest. I will go this much further, if you will write this will out in your own handwriting and allow us to submit the matter to Mr. Sellers —'

"Mr. Wissburg: We object to this testimony. It is an attempt at least to lead up to a confession of some sort, an attempt to get the handwriting which will be used against a party if the handwriting met the conditions required by Mr. King.

"Mr. King: I will lay the proper foundation. At the time he was in our office on this particular conversation and discussion, there was no force of any kind used against Mr. Wignall. There was no promise of immunity.

"Mr. Wissburg: Object to that line of testimony.

"The Court: Objection overruled. A. There was no promise of immunity or reward of any kind made to him. Everything that he said and everything that was done in that conversation was free and voluntary upon the part of Mr. Wignall. With that foundation I will proceed with the conversation I had with him. Going back a little bit—I said to Mr. Wignall, 'If you will sit down here and write out in your own handwriting the contents of this will, we will submit the handwriting to Mr. Clark Sellers of Los Angeles, and if he will give us an opinion that that handwriting and that will is not your handwriting, we will dismiss the case immediately and you will be released.'

"Mr. Wissburg: We further object on the ground that he did offer a reward or promise. Out of counsel's own mouth he condemns himself. He states he said, 'If you will do certain things we will do certain things,' and it comes within the exception of the rule as applied to this particular line.

"Mr. Weller: That could not possibly be considered a reward in the sense it is mentioned in the Penal Code.

"Mr. Wissburg: It was an inducement, if he would write out those things, 'We will do certain other things.'

"The Court: That is not the proposition. If he would write out a copy of the will in question, the same to be submitted to Mr. Sellers, and Mr. Sellers pronounced the will not in the handwriting of defendant, the case would be dismissed.

"Mr. Wissburg: We submit this as an inducement for the purpose of getting him to write out the will, and if perchance there might be some resemblance he would either be dismissed or prosecuted. It comes absolutely within the rule.

"The Court: Objection overruled. A. He refused to do that. I said, 'Mr. Wignall, I will make one more proposition to you. If you will sit down here and write out in your own handwriting the contents of that will, we will submit that handwriting to any three recognized handwriting experts in the state, we will allow you to pick the experts, and the state will pay the bill for the investigation and it will cost you nothing, and if any one of those three experts say it is not in your handwriting, we will release you and dismiss the case.' He refused to do it. He said, 'If you will put that down in black and white, in writing, I might do it.' I said, 'You know mighty well if we tell you here we will do that, we will do it; and furthermore, there are too many witnesses for us to back up on a proposition of that kind.' He absolutely refused to do it.

"By Mr. Weller: Did you later have another conversation with Mr. Wignall concerning the same subject matter? A. Yes. The next day I was in the Justice Court before Judge Holbrook in the morning around nine or ten o'clock, and at the conclusion of the hearing that took place there at that time, Mr. Wignall, in an informal way—court had adjourned, and Mr. Wignall and myself and the Judge and the reporter were around the Judge's desk, and Mr. Wignall was proclaiming his innocence, and I said 'Judge, I will tell you the proposition I made to him and see what you think about it.' At that time there was no promise of immunity and no threats, and everything that was done was done freely and voluntarily. I said, 'Judge, here is the proposition I made to Mr. Wignall, and I make the proposition to him again at this time in your presence.' I said, 'Mr. Wignall, if you will stand here before the Judge and write in your own handwriting the contents of this will, we will have myself, the Judge, or yourself, submit that to your own handwriting expert, Mr. Sellers, that you employed in the will contest, and if Mr. Sellers will give us an opinion that that will is not in your handwriting, I will ask the court right now to dismiss the case upon Mr. Sellers' opinion.' He said, 'You will not put that in writing?' And I said, 'Here is the court reporter that can take down everything I say,' and I said to the reporter, 'You take down exactly what I say,' and I said, 'I will say it to you again.' I said, 'Mr. Wignall, if you will give me the contents of this will in your handwriting, and you pick any three handwriting experts in this state, I don't care who they are, I will let you do the picking, and I will let your attorney take the writing and submit it to those experts, and if any one of these three say this will is not in your handwriting, we will dismiss the case and release you at once, and I will now ask the judge to release you upon the receipt of an opinion from any one of those handwriting experts that this will is not in your handwriting.' Judge Holbrook then took it up and said, 'Anything the District Attorney's office says in that respect I know they will carry out, and if they don't, I will, and if Mr. King won't do it, the Court will see that this case is dismissed upon that condition.' And Mr. Wignall turned around and backed out, and said he wouldn't do it."

[8, 9] A study of the testimony quoted leaves the strong impression that at the time of these conversations the deputy district attorney was not satisfied as to the probable guilt of appellant, and, to assist in the investigation of the charges then pending in the justice's court, wanted to secure a copy of the will in appellant's handwriting. We know of no rule of law that would require the appellant to copy the will under the circumstances existing at that time. He had not then offered himself as a witness in his own behalf. People v. Chapman, 55 Cal. App. 192, 203 P. 126; People v. Mayen, 188 Cal. 237, 205 P. 435, 24 A. L. R. 1383; sections 688, 1323, Pen. Code. It should be observed that, on at least one of the two occasions on which the conversations were had, "Mr. Wignall was proclaiming his innocence." Where a defendant denied his guilt, accusatory remarks made in his presence are not admissible for any purpose. People v. Lapara, 181 Cal. 66, 183 P. 545; People v. Goltra, 115 Cal. App. 539, 2 P.(2d) 35; People v. Ayhens, 16 Cal. App. 618, 117 P. 789. The testimony of the district attorney should not have been offered in evidence. People v. Teshara, 134 Cal. 542, 66 P. 798; People v. Goltra, supra. Counsel for appellant did not make his objections to this testimony upon proper grounds. The trial court is entitled to have the precise legal ground of the objection to evidence specified in the objection as, "The efficacy of an objection, as a general rule, depends upon the precision with which it is made." 8 Cal. Jur., § 517, at page 503. "The defendant is deemed to have waived all grounds of objection not stated by him." People v. Sellas, 114 Cal. App. 367, 300 P. 150, 155.

[10] We have carefully examined the entire record, and find that there is ample evidence to support the verdicts of guilty under the first two charges in the information. The evidence of appellant and that of Mrs. Marie Budd, one of his principal witnesses, tends strongly to support the judgment on these counts. They both testified that they were familiar with the handwriting of the deceased, and that they had never seen any of his handwriting that looked anything like that of the forged will.

There is no merit in any of the other contentions of appellant relating to the two charges of forging the will and offering it to be filed in the office of the county clerk. There has been no miscarriage of justice in the conviction of appellant under these two charges.

[11] There is no evidence in the record sustaining his conviction on the third count wherein he is charged with offering the forged will in evidence in the probate proceeding. This is not mentioned in the testimony of any witness and is not covered by any admission or stipulation of counsel. A copy of the forged will is before us. It contains no indorsement which would even tend to indicate that it had ever been introduced in evidence in any probate proceeding. Its only indorsement is "Filed Feb. 16, 1931 Harry L. Allison Clerk By M. L. Aldridge, Deputy." This is the date it was filed with the petition for its probate. This date is material under the second charge of filing, but not under the third, of offering it in evidence.
